1.0 OBJECTIVES

In this unit, we shall give you a general introduction to varieties of prose as well as to different prose forms. If you read this unit carefully, you should be able to:

- distinguish between prose and poetry;
- define descriptive, narrative and expository prose;
- describe fictional prose forms such as the short story and novel and non-fictional prose such as the essay, letter, travelogue, biography and autobiography, diary and speeches.
- recognise various figures of speech.

1.1 INTRODUCTION

As you know, the present course is divided into two parts. The first deals with varieties of prose while the second concentrates on different prose forms. This unit aims to provide a general introduction to the varieties and forms of prose. We shall discuss descriptive prose at some length in the next three units in this block. A detailed study of each variety and form of prose will be provided in subsequent blocks. In short, the first unit of this block gives a general introduction to the whole course. Units 2-4 deal specifically with descriptive prose.

In this unit, we shall first examine the difference between prose and poetry.

This will be followed by a discussion of three varieties of prose. We shall then give you a brief introduction to the forms of prose that you will read in greater detail later in the course.

Figurative language is used extensively by most writers. We have defined some figures of speech so that you will be able to identify these in your critical appreciation of literary prose.

You may like to skim through the unit first and then tackle each section in detail. We would advise you to read each section carefully before attempting the exercises. These are fairly simple and you should complete them before looking at the answers given at the end.

1.2 PROSE AND POETRY

The word 'prose' is taken from the Latin 'prose' which means 'direct' or 'straight'. Broadly speaking, prose is direct or straightforward writing. In poetry, which is generally written in verse, a lot of things may be left to the imagination of the reader.

In ordinary prose, the aim is to communicate one's thoughts and feelings. What is important then is (a) what one wants to say, and (b) how one chooses to say it. What is said is the topic or subject of the composition. How it is said is the style or manner in which the topic is expressed. The style, of course, greatly depends upon who we are writing for and what sort of personality we have. There are different topics and different styles. Whatever the number of topics, they all come under one or another variety of prose and each variety may have a distinct style of its own.

What then are the different varieties of prose? For purposes of analysis we have categorised them as (a) descriptive, (b) narrative and (c) expository. But these three are not mutually exclusive. Sometimes you find more than one variety in a piece of work. It depends on the skill and intention of the writer. For example, in a novel or short story, we are likely to find all these varieties of prose worked together in interesting and innovative combinations.

1.2.1 Difference between Prose and Poetry

A French poet and critic, Paul Valéry, compared prose to walking and poetry to dancing. We walk in order to go from one place to another. We do it for a particular purpose. When we walk for exercise, we do it for the improvement of our health. In other words, walking is utilitarian, that is, it is something that we do with a purpose in view. We are talking about ordinary prose and not literary prose. Ordinary prose is like walking. We use words to give information, to get something done, to make someone do what we want him/her to do, and so on. In ordinary prose, what is important is the message. But this is not the primary consideration in literary prose. What is important also is how language is used, how ideas and emotions are communicated and how the style suits the content.

When you go to see a dance, you are not interested in seeking information. When you see a good dance, you enjoy it. In other words, the objective is enjoyment and not mere information or instruction. When you like a particular dance, you go and see that dance over and over again because every time you see it, you get a new aesthetic experience. In the case of poetry and literary prose, you have what you call your favourite poem or passage. You read it several times and are not tired of it. If it is an ordinary prose passage, the moment you understand the meaning, you don't want to read it again. In literary prose as well as in poetry, it is not just the meaning that is important, but also the medium. It is often difficult to say what is more important, the form or the content. There is, however, an inseparability between the two, a togetherness. This is exactly the meaning of the Hindi term 'Sahitya'. 'Sahitya' literally means 'togetherness'. It is the togetherness of the sound and the sense, it is the togetherness of form and content. This is what is unique to great literature.

In dancing, every gesture is important for the position that it occupies in that particular dance. No one posture is more important or less important than another. Each gesture contributes to the total effect of the dance. In the same way, in a good poem or a piece of literary prose, every word is important for the position it occupies in it, and contributes to its total effect. Again, in a good dance, when the dance is on, you cannot distinguish the dancer from the dance. In any great poem or passage of literary prose, it will be difficult to separate the effect of the medium from the effect of the message. We do paraphrase a poem, but the paraphrase of a poem is not the poem. A prose piece can be paraphrased, summarised but not a poem. The meaning of the poem is the meaning that you experience every time you read the poem and you cannot say of any poem that you've exhausted it. The 'literariness' of a particular poem or prose piece lies partly in this quality. A literary piece usually has layers of meaning, for the writer works through suggestion, allusion, imagery and other such devices. The use of literary devices alone does not make a piece "literary". What is important is the way in which they contribute to the unity and thereby the final effect of the piece. Every time you go to it, you get a new meaning, a new aesthetic delight. This is mainly because of the connotation of the words in poetry.

1.2.2 Denotation and Connotation

Words have a denotative and also a connotative meaning. Denotation is the literal meaning of a word. For example, when you say 'This is a stone', you are referring to an object which is a stone. It is a clear statement. There is no other meaning of this sentence. On the other hand, if we say 'she has a heart of stone' the meaning changes. What does it mean? It simply means that she is cruel or hard-hearted. In fact, it refers to all the qualities you associate with the stone. This is what we mean when we say that a word has several connotations. The word 'home' means a place where one lives with one's family. This is its primary meaning. But it suggests warmth, intimacy, family security, comfort, affection. A house is also a place where one lives. Does it have the same connotations of the word 'home'? No. Poetry is full of connotations and our appreciation of poetry stems a great deal from the connotations of words used in it. Now that we have discussed the difference between denotation and connotation let us discuss the different varieties of prose. But before doing so, it would be a good idea to work out a few exercises.

1.3 VARIETIES OF PROSE

Now that you have seen the general difference between poetry and prose, let us turn to the varieties of prose. Let us examine the nature and characteristics of descriptive, narrative and expository prose briefly. These varieties will be discussed in detail in subsequent units. Here we only aim to give you a general introduction.

1.3.1 Descriptive Prose

Descriptive writing describes things as they are or as they appear to be. It can be the description of a person or a landscape or an event. In descriptive writing, we are able to see things as they are or were seen or heard or imagined by the describer. A good description translates the writer's observation into vivid details and creates an atmosphere of its own. Through his/her description, the author tries to recreate what she has seen or imagined. A fine description is a painting in words. Here is a description of Mr. Squeers in Charles Dickens' Nicholas Nickleby (1838-39):

Mr. Squeers' appearance was not prepossessing. He had but one eye, and the popular prejudice runs in favour of two. The eye he had was unquestionably useful, but decidedly not ornamental: being of a greenish grey, and in shape resembling the fan-light of a street door. The blank side of his face was much wrinkled and puckered up, which gave him a very sinister appearance, especially when he smiled, at which times his expression bordered closely on the villainous. His hair was very flat and shiny, save at the ends, where it was brushed stiffly up from a low protruding forehead, which assorted well with his harsh voice and coarse manner. He was about two or three and fifty, and a trifle below the middle size; he wore a white neckerchief with long ends, and a suit of scholastic black; but his coat sleeves being a great deal too long, and his trousers a great deal too short, he appeared ill at ease in his clothes, and as if he were in a perpetual state of astonishment at finding himself so respectable.

Glossary

prepossessing:	inspiring
puckered up:	full of folds and wrinkles sinister:	wicked, evil protruding:	jutting out, projecting scholastic:	formal/ academic

This is a graphic description of the appearance of Mr. Squeers. The details are so sharp that we can easily visualize the person. We are told about his height, his eye, his face, hair, forehead and dress. A successful description, it enables us to picture the person vividly. It is also a very enjoyable passage. Did you notice the irony in 'He had but one eye, and the popular prejudice runs in favour of two'? The irony and subtle humour continue throughout the passage so that the reader cannot help smiling to her/ himself. The eye is further likened to 'the fan-light of a street door'— a very interesting and unusual analogy. You must also have noticed how carefully Dickens chooses his words so that we can 'see' the hair that was 'very flat and shiny', 'hear' his 'harsh voice' and so on. These then are some of the devices that you will find used effectively in literary prose.

Here is another descriptive passage:

Ishtiaq Ali is a thin man of medium height. He looks older than his age -- he is about 50....Even after a long service, his salary remains meagre. An unlettered man, his family expanded in a big way -- he has nine children. (Pushp K. Jain, 'On the Ofttrodden Tracks', The Times of India, April 27, 1989).

Does this delight us in the same way that the previous passage did? Perhaps not. Although it certainly does give us some information about Ishtiaq Ali. Where is the difference? It is in the use of language. Here the language is purely functional with bald statements aimed at providing information rather than delight. In the earlier passage, it is a pleasure to read the sentences again and again savouring their suggestiveness.

As we have seen, successful description makes you visualize the scene or the person. Generally, description is not an independent form of writing, that is, a whole book will not consist of descriptions alone. It is often used as an aid to narrative or expository writing. Its main purpose is to describe a sense impression or a mood. We will discuss this in greater detail in the next three units of this block.

1.3.2 Narrative Prose

A narrative tells us what happens or happened. It deals mainly with events. In other words a narrative is a description of events. It may deal with external or internal events. By internal events, we mean the thoughts, feelings and emotions of individuals. Narrative writing tries to recreate an actual experience or an imaginary one in a way that we are able to experience it mentally. We lose ourselves in the characters and events of the narrative temporarily. Narratives can deal with the facts or fiction. Autobiographies, biographies, letters, travelogues, diaries and speeches are narratives of fact. The short story and novel come under the category of narrative fiction.

In a narrative, we are carried along the stream of action. When we narrate a story, we concentrate on the sequence of events. It is the action that grips the attention of the reader. The Ramayana and the Mahabharata are examples of narrative writing. Narration is concerned with action and actors, it may make use of description but description is secondary. Action, characters and setting are the elements that are woven into a pattern to make the narrative interesting. Rudyard Kipling mentioned the ingredients of a narrative in the following verse:

I keep six honest-serving men
They taught me all I know:
Their names are What and Why and When
And How and Where and Who

What happens? Why does it happen? When does it happen? How does it happen? Where does it happen and to whom does it happen? All these questions are answered satisfactorily in a narrative. What makes a narrative interesting is not just what is said but the way it is said. Look at this passage from Charles Dickens' novel Oliver Twist (1837). Here we shall read about the trial of the Artful Dodger when he is produced in court on charges of pick-pocketing.

It was indeed Mr Dawkins, who, shuffling into the office with the big coat sleeves tucked up as usual, his left hand in his pocket, and his hat in his right hand, preceded the jailer, with a rolling gait altogether indescribable, and, taking his place in the dock, requested in an audible voice to know what he was placed in that ere disgraceful situation for.

'Hold your tongue, will you?' said the jailer.

'I'm an Englishman, ain't I?' rejoined the Dodger; 'where are my privileges?'

'You'll get your privileges soon enough,' retorted the jailer, 'and pepper with □em.'

'We'll see wot the Secretary of State for the Home Affairs has got to say to the beaks, if I don't', replied Mr Dawkins. 'Now then! Wot is this here business? I shall thank the madg'strates to dispose of this here little affair, and not to keep me while they read the paper for I've got an appointment with a genelman in the city, and as I'm a man of my word and very punctual in business matters, he'll go away if I ain't there to my time, and then pr'aps there won't be an action, for damage against as kept me away. Oh, no, certainly not!'

At this point the Dodger, with a show of being very particular with a view to proceedings to be had thereafter, desired the jailer to communicate 'the names of them two files as was on the bench', which so tickled the spectators, that they laughed almost as heartily as Master Bates could have done if he had heard the request.

'Silence there!' cried the jailer.

'What is this?' inquired one of the magistrates.

'A pick-pocketing case, your worship.'

'Has the boy ever been here before?'

'He ought to have been, a many times,' replied the jailer. 'He has been pretty well everywhere else. I know him well, your worship.'

'Oh! You know me, do you?' cried the Artful, making a note of the statement. 'Wery good. That's a case of deformation of character anyway.'

Here there was another laugh, and another cry of silence.

'Now then, where are the witnesses?' said the clerk.

'Ah! That's right,' added the Dodger. 'Where are they? I should like to see □em.' This wish was immediately gratified, for a policeman stepped forward who had seen the prisoner attempt the pocket of an unknown gentleman in a crowd, and indeed take a handkerchief therefrom, which, being a very old one, he deliberately put back again, after trying it on his own countenance. For this reason, he took the Dodger into custody as soon as he could get near him, and the said Dodger being searched, had upon his person a silver snuff-box, with the owner's name engraved upon the lid. This gentleman had been discovered on reference to the Court Guide, and being then and there present, swore that the snuff-box was his, and that he had missed it on the previous day, the moment he had disengaged himself from the crowd before referred to. He had also remarked a young gentleman in the throng particularly active in making his way about, and that young gentleman was the prisoner before him.

'Have you anything to ask this witness, boy?' said the magistrate.

'I wouldn't abase myself by descending to hold no conversation with him,' replied the Dodger.

'Have you anything to say at all?'

'Do you hear his worship ask if you have anything to say?' inquired the jailer, nudging the silent Dodger with his elbow.

'I beg your pardon,' said the Dodger, looking up with an air of abstraction. 'Did you redress yourself to me, my man?'

'I never see such an out-and-out young wagabond, your worship,' observed the officer with a grin. 'Do you mean to say anything, you young shaver?'

'No,' replied the Dodger, 'not here, for this ain't the shop for justice; besides which, my attorney is a-breakfasting this morning with the Vice-President of the House of Commons; but I shall have something to say elsewhere, and so will he, and so will a very numerous and respectable circle of acquaintance as'll make them beaks wish they'd never been born, or that they'd got their footmen to hang 'em up to their own hat-pegs afore they let 'em come out this morning to try it on upon me. I'll –'

'There! He's fully committed!' interposed the clerk. 'Take him away.'

'Come on,' said the jailer.

'Oh, ah! I'll come on,' replied the Dodger, brushing his hat with the palm of his hand. 'Ah! (to the Bench), it's no use your looking frightened; I won't show you no mercy, not a ha'porth of it. You'll pay for this, my fine fellers. I wouldn't be you for something! I wouldn't go free, now, if you was to fall down on your knees and ask me. Here, carry me off to prison! Take me away!'

This is a hilarious passage that tells us about the Artful Dodger's defiant conduct at his trial ('I'm an Englishman: ain't I?...where are my priweleges?'). We respond at one level to the hilarious situation but at another we also wonder: what should the poor do against such oppressive judicial systems? ('This aint the shop of justice'). We also get a clear picture of the Artful Dodger: his 'coat-sleeves tucked up', his 'hand in his pocket' and his 'rolling gait' are described vividly at the outset. What then follows is a dialogue full of ironical, witty and quick rejoinders by this habitual offender. This is alternated with third person narration: "At this point the Dodger, with a show of being very particular with a view to proceedings to be had thereafter, desired the jailer to communicate 'the names of them two files as was on the bench'; which so tickled the spectators, that they laughed almost as heartily as Master Bates could have done if he had heard the request". In short, what we wish to point out is that narrative writing makes use of narration as well as description. In order to dramatize the situation, dialogues and conversations are introduced so that the writer is able to recreate the situation and communicate the experience.

1.3.3 Expository Prose

Expository writing deals in definition, explanation or interpretation. It includes writing on science, law, philosophy, technology, political science, history and literary criticism. Exposition is a form of logical presentation. Its primary object is to explain and clarify. It presents details concretely and exactly. Expository writing is writing that explains. But we are not interested in writing that merely explains. We are interested in expository writing that can be read as literature. The following is a piece of expository prose:

In the leg there are two bones, the tibia and fibula. The tibia or shin-bone is long and strong and bears the weight of the body. The fibula or splint bone is an equally long but much slenderer bone, and is attached to the tibia as a pin is to a brooch.

(Leonard Hill, Manual of Human Physiology)

This piece clearly defines the two bones, the tibia and the fibula. But can this be read as literature? Now let us look at another piece of expository prose.

Now mark another big difference between the natural slavery of man to Nature and the unnatural slavery of man to man. Nature is kind to her slaves. If she forces you to eat and drink, she makes eating and drinking so pleasant that when we can afford it we eat and drink too much. We must sleep or go mad: but then sleep is so pleasant that we have great difficulty in getting up in the morning. And firesides and families seem so pleasant to the young that they get married and join building societies to realize their dreams. Thus, instead of resenting our natural wants as slavery, we take the greatest pleasure in their satisfaction. We write sentimental songs in praise of them. A tramp can earn his supper by singing Home, Sweet Home.

The slavery of man to man is the very opposite of this. It is hateful to the body and to the spirit. Our poets do not praise it; they proclaim that no man is good enough to be another man's master. The latest of the great Jewish prophets, a gentleman named Marx, spent his life in proving that there is no extremity of selfish cruelty at which the slavery of man to man will stop if it be not stopped by law. You can see for yourself that it produces a state of continual civil war—called the class war-between the slaves and their masters, organized as Trade Unions on one side and Employers' Federations on the other.

There is a clear difference between the two passages. Shaw puts across his argument logically and convincingly. He first talks about the natural slavery of man to Nature by giving a series of examples. He then contrasts this with the unnatural slavery of man to man. By use of contrast, this argument is further strengthened. The result is that difficult concepts like freedom and slavery are readily understood. What is, however, remarkable is that his use of simple language, tongue-in-cheek manner and conversational style immediately strikes a sympathetic and receptive chord in the reader. These two passages must have given you some idea about the difference between literary and non-literary expository writing. The different varieties of expository writing will be discussed in greater detail in Block 3.

- i) Read the following passages and name the dominant variety of prose that you find in each, descriptive, expository and narrative:
 - (a) Sambo of the bandy legs slammed the carriage-door on his young weeping mistress. He sprang up behind the carriage. 'Stop!' cried Miss Jemima, rushing to the gate with a parcel. 'It's some sandwiches, my dear', said she to Amelia.

‘You may be hungry, you know; and Becky, Becky Sharp, here’s a book for you that my sister — that is, I — Johnson’s Dictionary, you know; you must not leave us without that. Good-bye. Drive on, coachman God bless you.’

And the kind creature retreated into the garden, overcome with emotions. But, lo! and just as the coach drove off, Miss Sharp put her pale face out of the window, and actually flung the book back into the garden.

- (b) Miss Brooke had that kind of beauty which seems to be thrown into relief by poor dress. Her hand and wrist were so finely formed that she could wear sleeves not less bare of style than those in which the Blessed Virgin appeared to Italian painters; and her profile as well as her stature and bearing seemed to gain the more dignity from her plain garments, which by the side of provincial fashion gave her the impressiveness of a fine quotation from the Bible, -- or from one of our elder poets, -- in a paragraph of today’s newspaper.

George Eliot, Middlemarch (1871-72)

- (c) The general mistake among us in Educating our Children is that in our Daughters we take care of their persons and neglect their minds, in our Sons, we are so intent upon adorning their minds, that we wholly neglect their bodies. It is from this that you shall see a young body celebrated and admired in all the Assemblies about Town; when her elder Brother is afraid to come into a Room. From this ill Management it arises that we frequently observe a Man’s life is half spent before he is taken notice of, and a Woman in the prime of her years is out of fashion and neglected.

(You must have noticed that certain words are written in capitals. Steele often followed this convention for emphasising those particular words).

1.4 FORMS OF PROSE

The division of prose into three kinds – descriptive, narrative and expository, is a rough one. You may find good description in narrative writing. When you explain, you may also describe and narrate to make your explanation effective. The three divisions are not rigid. A good writer may use a little description here, a little narration there, and a bit of exposition in another place. A knowledge of the three varieties is useful in that you can appreciate how the writer makes use of one or more of them effectively. You would realize that they are very often used in combination and they rarely exist alone.

Having discussed the different kinds of writing, let us discuss briefly the different literary forms in prose. Some of the prose forms are the novel, short story, essay, letter, travelogue, biography and autobiography, diary and speeches. Let us look at each of these forms briefly now. They will be discussed in detail in subsequent blocks.

1.4.1 Short Story

A short story is not a novel in an abridged form. A short story is complete in itself. Therefore a short story writer must have great skill to achieve an impression of completeness in a few pages. The characters and incidents are sketched in a few effective strokes. A short story thus has intensity and a singleness of purpose. There is no single acceptable definition of a short story. All that we can say is that it is short, has a plot and character(s) and has a beginning, a middle and an end. According to one definition, a short story is 'a relatively short narrative which is designed to produce a single dominant effect and which contains the elements of drama'. The aim of a good short story is to make the reader feel, to make him/ her enter into the experience of the characters. You must have read short stories in magazines as well as in anthologies. For a more detailed discussion of the short story as a literary form, please turn to Block IV, Unit 12.

1.4.2 Novel

Like the short story, it is difficult to define a novel. When we talk about a novel, we usually mean a piece of fiction, written in prose and of a certain length. A novel is an individual vision of the novelist. It is a picture of life as viewed by the writer. It has a story which tells us what happened and a plot which tells us how it happened. E.M. Forster, an English novelist, said this of the difference between a story and a plot: 'The King died and the Queen died' is a story. 'The King died and then the Queen died of grief' is a plot. The difference is quite clear from this example, in the sense that there is a cause and effect situation.

The plot and characters in a good novel leave a lasting impression on the reader. A good novel gives us an insight into the world and ourselves; it is full of vitality and humanity and appeals to human sensibilities. The style varies from one novelist to another. Each novel bears the signature of the novelist. A good short story is like a small garden. A fine novel is like a forest. We will discuss the characteristics and types of novels in Block 5, Unit 17.

1.4.3 Essay, Letter, Travelogue

An essay is a piece of prose composition usually of moderate length. The word 'essay' derives from the French word essai or attempt. It "attempts" to throw some light on the subject under discussion.

There are two kinds of essays. One is informal or personal and the other is formal. You can say anything you like in an informal essay so long as it is interesting and pleasing to the reader. It is written in a light style. Its purpose is to delight and entertain the reader. The style of the essay is generally familiar and conversational. The subjects can often be light such as in 'Apology for Idlers', 'On Tremendous Trifles', 'On Bores' and so on.

A formal essay is a serious one and it weighs, evaluates and judges. It discusses the merits and the demerits of the topic in question. The style is objective and serious. A good essay however, is balanced, thoughtful and not biased. The judgement is based on facts.

You will read three different essays in Block 6.

Letter

Another form of non-fictional prose is the letter. On a personal level, a letter is a spontaneous expression of one's self and on a social level, letters hold up a mirror to the age in which they are written. Letter writing came to be recognized as a literary form in England during the Renaissance when critics came in touch with the works of Seneca, Cicero and Guevara. A good public letter is a literary piece of work that explores an issue, idea, impression or interpretation. It has a focused point and has both informative value and aesthetic appeal.

Travelogue

What is a travelogue? It is a piece of writing about travel. It is written in a style that is both interesting and informative. The passion for knowledge and about other countries has always driven men to embark upon land travels and sea-voyages to distant lands, the accounts of which have been left by them for posterity. Hence the history of travelogues is as old as the history of man's travels. These accounts serve as important documents about the life, culture and history of the places they are written about.

1.4.4 Biography, Autobiography, Diary and Speeches

A biography is the story of the life of an individual. Our concern here is with biography as a piece of literature. A good biography usually tries to project an objective picture of the life of a particular person. It avoids the temptation either to praise too much or to be too severe and critical. In this kind of writing, the writer selects the salient features of a particular life and gives them a shape. It tries to make the reader share the hopes, the fears, the interests and aspirations of that person.

In an autobiography, the writer attempts to reveal selected experiences of his/her own life in retrospect. Here the picture presented is necessarily subjective. It presents the events and impressions of the past as recollected by the writer at the time s/he is writing the autobiography. It cannot be a complete account of one's life, as the future has still to be lived.

The autobiographies of Gandhiji and Nehru are good examples of this form of writing. In Block 7, you will read excerpts from famous biographies and autobiographies.

Diary

A diary belongs to the autobiographical genre of writing. It is a literary form in which the writer maintains a regularly kept record of his or her own life and thoughts. As a genre it has been practiced for over five hundred years. The diary is also a valuable historical document of an individual life and gives us written evidence of the historical, social and political circumstances of a particular period.

Speeches

A speech is a spoken communication or expression of thought in prose addressed to an audience. It presents the personal viewpoint of the speaker in a convincing manner, on a subject that is of universal importance. A good speech is not delivered with the aim to excite or rouse the audience. Rather it is made to inspire and persuade the hearers to think along the lines the speaker wishes them to. A power-packed speech is one that is charged with the sturdy conviction the speaker has in his/her beliefs.

1.5 FIGURES OF SPEECH

Let us now discuss some of the more commonly used figures of speech. This will help you identify them when you are analysing a particular passage. Is it enough to identify figures of speech? No. We must also be able to say why the writer has used them and to what effect.

Figures of Speech

Let us consider this scenario. Deeply in love, a young man tells his friend: 'My girlfriend is very beautiful'. Without going into the question of whether the young lady in question was indeed beautiful or not, let us consider the sentence. It is clearly a straightforward statement. On the other hand, Robert Burns (1759-96), a Scottish poet, says the same thing but in more poetic words: 'My love is like a red red rose'. This is what we would call figurative use of language. In other words, the poet is making use of a figure of speech, a simile in this case, which we shall discuss a little later. First, let us be clear about what figurative language is. By comparing the above sentences, you must have got an idea about what a figure of speech is. The first statement gives us the literal meaning whereas in the second, words are used in a way that is different from their literal meaning.

Why do writers use figurative language? In order to draw attention to the language and to communicate the experience more effectively. For example, when we read 'My love is like a red red rose', the sentence evokes images of a beautiful red rose and a very young rosy-cheeked girl who is as beautiful as this exquisite flower. Do poets alone use figures of speech? No. Figures of speech are used in all types of writing: prose, poetry, drama. In fact, we too use figurative language in our daily conversation. When we say, 'He drinks like a fish' or 'It's raining cats and dogs', we are using figurative language.

We shall now briefly discuss some of the more common figures of speech: simile, metaphor; image; symbol; personification; metonymy; synecdoche; apostrophe; hyperbole; understatement; irony.

Simile

A simile is a comparison between different terms belonging to different classes for the purpose of describing one of them. The comparison is usually made by the use of connectives such as 'like' or 'as'. For example, when we say 'as sweet as honey' or 'white like snow', we are using similes. But if we say 'Ram is like Shyam', is this a simile? No. Because Ram and Shyam belong to the same class, i.e., male human beings.

Metaphor

Broadly speaking, a metaphor is also a comparison. But here there is no direct comparison as in a simile. Nor are any connectives such as 'like' and 'as' used. The writer uses an expression which describes one thing by stating another. For example, we can say 'The road snaked its way up the mountain'. Here the word 'snaked' is used metaphorically. The word snaked suggests a winding path. You must have noticed that there is no direct comparison between the snake and the course of the road. The comparison with the snake is indirect and implied.

Image

An image is a visual picture evoked by the use of either a word or phrase. Writers use imagery to make descriptive writing more effective; Does an image only refer to the visual? No, an image can also refer to the sense of taste, smell, touch and hearing. An image is usually written in the form of a simile or metaphor. For example:

There is a garden in her face,
Where roses and white lilies grow.

What a beautiful and vivid word-picture is evoked by these lines! Do you think this is a simile or metaphor? It is a metaphor, isn't it?

Symbol

An image is a description that enhances the significance of a literary work. A symbol is something that stands for something else. A dove is a symbol of peace. It is a concrete expression of an abstract concept such as peace. A literary symbol is not simply descriptive like an image. It usually has a range of meanings. In Bleak House, a novel by Charles Dickens, we have 'Fog everywhere. Fog up the river, fog down the river.....' Fog here is the symbol of confusion, obscurity and the endless delays caused by outdated legal practices.

Personification

This involves giving human characteristics, powers or feelings to objects or to abstract qualities. As in a metaphor, a comparison is implied. The purpose is to make the description more vivid and concrete. The writer speaks of something which is non-human as it were human. For example, 'The sun traced his footsteps across the sky' is a more poetic way of expressing the passing of a day. Joseph Conrad has personified the West Wind in The Mirror of the Sea, 'The West Wind reigns over the seas surrounding the coasts of these kingdoms....' Conrad then goes on to conceive of the West Wind as a despotic ruler with the capacity for doing good as well as evil.

Metonymy

Let us look at this sentence; 'I enjoy listening to Ravi Shankar'. What does this mean? Ravi Shankar is the name of a great musician and when we say 'I enjoy listening to Ravi Shankar', we mean that we enjoy listening to his music. Here the person's name is substituted for that of his music. In short, metonymy means 'change of name'.

Synecdoche

You may have heard the expression 'Doctor on wheels'. What does this mean? Wheels here stand for transport and the doctor in question certainly has this facility. Synecdoche then is a figure of speech in which we use a word referring only to a part of something instead of the whole ('wheels' instead of a vehicle).

Apostrophe

This is an address to a person or thing that is absent and not listening. As Charles Lamb says; 'Waters of Sir Hugh Middleton – what a spark you were like to have extinguished for ever!'

Hyperbole

A deliberate exaggeration for the sake of effect. For example, we often say 'I nearly died of laughing'. We often use hyperbolic expressions without realizing it. Here is another example from Thoreau: 'The blue bird carries the sky on his back'.

Understatement or Litotes

This is the opposite of hyperbole. Instead of exaggeration, the author expresses him/herself with restraint. The British are known for their habit of understatement. If someone is looking extremely ill, the Englishman may just say 'You do look a bit under the weather!' Or for a person who died of a bullet shot 'He stopped a bullet last night, poor chap'.

Irony

This is one of the most important figures of speech in English. Irony is saying one thing while meaning another. In short irony occurs when a word or phrase has one surface meaning and another different meaning beneath this surface. The reader must be able to understand the hidden meaning. Charles Dickens describes Mr. Squeers in his novel Nicholas Nickleby: 'He had but one eye, and the popular prejudice runs in favour of two. The eye he had was unquestionably useful, but decidedly not ornamental....' Irony usually gives pleasure or relief and must not be confused with sarcasm which deliberately inflicts pain.

This list is by no means exhaustive. However, we hope it will be useful not only in analysing the prose passages in this course but will also help you with your reading of poetry and drama.

1.6 LET US SUM UP

In this unit, we have discussed:

- the general difference between poetry and prose;
- how words have denotations as well as connotations;
- how descriptive prose describes things as they are seen or imagined;
- narrative prose recreates an actual or imaginary experience or sequence of events;
- expository writing deals in definition, explanation or interpretation;
- the novel, short story, essay, letter, travelogue, biography, autobiography, diary and speeches as forms of prose;
- the different figures of speech used by writers to convey their feelings and thoughts more effectively.

1.7 ANSWERS TO EXERCISES

Check Your Progress I

- i) If you haven't been able to answer this, you should read sub-section 1.2.1 once again and then it will be easy to attempt the question. Prose is direct or straightforward writing. Here the writer communicates his/ her thoughts or feelings as clearly and precisely as possible. On the other hand, poetry which is generally written in verse leaves a lot of things unsaid and to the imagination of the reader. Prose is like walking – that is, it is functional and provides information. Poetry on the other hand, is like dancing, and aims to delight. A prose piece can be paraphrased or summarized but not a poem. We can and do paraphrase a poem, but the paraphrase of a poem is not the poem. In prose, what is important is the message but in a poem what is important is the experience conveyed rather than any meaning or information.

- (ii) Words, as we know, have a denotative as well as a connotative meaning. Denotation is the literal meaning of a word whereas the connotation is the meaning it has gained by association. For example a snake as we know is a reptile – but it is also very dangerous. So, if we call a human being a snake we mean that that person is dangerous. Similarly the word rose denotes a flower but because it is such a beautiful flower, if we call anyone a rose, we are referring to that person's beauty.

2.0 OBJECTIVES

In this unit, we shall introduce you to different varieties of descriptive prose. We shall do this by outlining the characteristics of descriptive prose and then giving you two passages to read.

If you read this unit carefully and complete the given exercises, you will be able to:

- summarise the passages;
- analyse and appreciate their stylistic features;
- become more perceptive readers of other descriptive passages.

2.1 INTRODUCTION

It is not always easy to distinguish between descriptive and narrative prose. One way of making a distinction (as Herbert Read, for example, does) is to group them both together and to say that descriptive prose is "passive" and narrative "active". This means that descriptive prose is concerned mainly with seeing things as they are, recording the impressions received by our senses: what we see, hear, touch, smell and taste. Narrative deals with what actually happens, that is, with events. This may not be true in every case, and may very well be an over-simplification, as we shall see in the course of the lessons that follow.

But, all the same, this distinction can be useful up to a point. Essentially, describing people and places and objects and narrating what happened to them are two related and complementary activities; indeed very often writers do both in the course of the same sentence. However, description and narration need to be examined separately for the sake of training ourselves in looking at and recognising the different functions of language. Various kinds of methods and techniques are employed by writers for describing and narrating. The real distinction between the two is one of focus; and focus can keep shifting from one to the other, according to the writer's purpose and design. If the writer's purpose is to introduce us to an important character in a story, the author can attempt this introduction in any one of these ways or by using a extract in combination of several techniques. Take, for example, the case of the Martian in our very first extract in this unit. H.G. Wells does not directly present the Martian to us. He does this through another character in the novel, who narrates the story as well as describes what the Martian looks like.

2.2 PASSAGE FROM H.G. WELLS' THE WAR OF THE WORLDS

Descriptive writing, as you will see, may be either purely fictional as in H.G. Wells' The War of the Worlds or it may present factual details as in the passage from Isak Dinesen's Out of Africa. You will notice that the presentation techniques will differ in both cases. In your first passage, the Martian is not like any human being that anyone has seen before. The author, therefore, goes about this difficult task using many subtle tricks of the writer's craft. Describing and narrating might very well be considered two sides of the same coin. Both descriptive and narrative elements are found throughout this passage. In describing the Martian in The War of the Worlds, Wells has to make his description convincing, giving it the illusion of reality. The Martian who exists only in the writer's imagination must be presented to the reader in such a way as to make him/ her believe that the Martian is real. Let's see how the writer accomplishes this task.

H.G. Wells' The War of the Worlds is a book of science fiction published in 1898 long before man had landed on the moon. The passage describes what happened after the Martians arrived inside a cylinder which landed on the earth with such great force that it made a large crater in the ground. The person who describes it returns to the site after a brief interval. In the mean time, a big crowd had collected around the crater. This extract has a few narrative elements but the main focus is on the writer's description of the Martian. Let us now take up this passage for discussion. The first thing to do is to read it carefully two or three times if necessary. Words and phrases that are unfamiliar or difficult should be looked up in a good dictionary. In the case of this passage, some of the words and phrases that are likely to be unfamiliar have been given in the glossary at the end of the passage.

There are several myths or stories about the Gorgon sisters and we can find a number of references and allusions to them in literature. They had live writhing snakes on their heads instead of hair and anyone who saw their faces directly, was instantly turned to stone. If you look up a classical dictionary, you will get to know all about the Gorgon sisters.

After you have made sense of all the strange and not so familiar words whose meanings you are not sure of, you should look up the references and allusions in the passage. In this case the references to the Gorgons is of crucial importance to the understanding of the passage, because it is intended to suggest something equally terrifying and deadly.

I saw a young man, a shop assistant in Working I believe he was, standing on the cylinder and trying to scramble out of the hole again. The crowd had pushed him in.

The end of the cylinder was being screwed out from within. Nearly two feet of shining screw projected. Somebody blundered against me, and I narrowly missed being pitched on to the top of the screw. I turned, and as I did so the screw must have come out, and the lid of the cylinder fell upon the gravel with a ringing concussion. I stuck my elbow into the person behind me, and turned my head towards the thing again. For a moment that circular cavity seemed perfectly black. I had the sunset in my eyes.

I think everyone expected to see a man emerge – possibly something a little unlike us terrestrial men but in all essentials a man. I know I did. But, looking, I presently saw something stirring within the shadow—greyish billowy movements, one above another, and then two luminous discs like eyes. Then something resembling a little grey snake, about the thickness of a walking stick, coiled up out of the writhing middle, and wriggled in the air towards me – and then another.

A sudden chill came over me. There was a loud shriek from a woman behind: I half turned, keeping my eyes fixed upon the cylinder still, from which other tentacles were now projecting, and began pushing my way back from the edge of the pit. I saw astonishment giving place to horror on the faces of the people about me. I heard inarticulate exclamations on all sides. There was a general movement backward. I saw the shopman struggling still on the edge of the pit. I found myself alone, and saw the people on the other side of the pit running off, Stent among them. I looked again at the cylinder, and ungovernable terror gripped me. I stood petrified and staring.

A big greyish, rounded bulk, the size perhaps, of a bear, was rising slowly and painfully out of the cylinder. As it bulged up and caught the light, it glistened like wet leather. Two large dark-coloured eyes were regarding me steadfastly. It was rounded, and had, one might say, a face. There was a mouth under the eyes, the brim of which quivered and panted, and dropped saliva. The body heaved and pulsated convulsively. A lank tentacular appendage gripped the edge of the cylinder, another swayed in the air.

Those who have never seen a living Martian can scarcely imagine the strange horror of their appearance. The peculiar V-shaped mouth with its pointed upper lip, the absence of brow ridges, the absence of a chin beneath the wedge-like lower lip, the incessant quivering of this mouth, the Gorgon groups of tentacles, the tumultuous breathing of the lungs in a strange atmosphere, the evident heaviness and painfulness of movement, due to the greater gravitational energy of the earth – above all, the extraordinary intensity of the immense eyes – culminated in an effect akin to nausea. There was something fungoid in the oily brown skin, something in the clumsy deliberation of their tedious movements unspeakably terrible. Even at this first encounter, this first glimpse, I was overcome with disgust and dread.

Suddenly the monster vanished. It had toppled over the brim of the cylinder and fallen into the pit, with a thud like the fall of a great mass of leather. I heard it give a peculiar thick cry, and forthwith another of these creatures appeared darkly in the deep shadow of the aperture.

At that my rigour of terror passed away. I turned and, running madly, made for the first group of trees, perhaps a hundred yards away; but I ran slantingly and stumbling, for I could not avert my face from these things.

There, among some young pine-trees and furze-bushes, I stopped, panting, and awaited further developments. The common round the sand-pits was dotted with people, standing, like myself, in a half-fascinated terror, staring at these creatures, or, rather, at the heaped gravel at the edge of the pit in which they lay. And then, with a renewed horror, I saw a round, black object bobbing up and down on the edge of the pit. It was the head of the shopman who had fallen in, but showing as a little black object against the hot western sky. Now he got his shoulder and knee up, and again he seemed to slip back until only his head was visible. Suddenly he vanished, and I could have fancied a faint shriek had reached me. I had a momentary impulse to go back and help him that my fears overruled.

2.2.2 Glossary

concussion:	violent blow, shock; sound caused by it.
Terrestrial:	of or related to the earth (rather than some other planet)
billowy movements:	swelling out like sails
writhing:	twisting the body (like a snake)
wriggled:	twisted from side to side
tentacles:	long snake-like boneless limbs without joints
petrified:	in a state of shock or fear, losing all power of thought or action; to become like a stone bulged up:	swelled out (came out)
heaved:	rose and fell regularly
pulsated:	shook rhythmically
convulsively:	unnaturally and violently
lank:	hanging loosely and without strength
tentacular:	like tentacles (explained above) appendage:	a thing hanging from something larger brow ridges:	eyebrows that project (the Martian had no eyebrows)
wedge-like:	V-shaped incessant:	never stopping
fungoid:	like fungus, a fast growing variety of plant growth generally considered a disease nausea:	a feeling of sickness and desire to vomit
furze-bushes:	wild bushy plants with prickles and yellow flowers.
common:	area of grassy land.

2.2.3 Discussion

When we read the passage carefully we notice that the author employs several devices (or artifices, if you like) to avoid a direct description because the subject is so unfamiliar that the reader's credibility has to be built up step by step. So Wells does not describe the Martian directly, the way perhaps an ordinary man or woman or an event could have been described. The person who describes the Martian in the book keeps reminding us that he is part of the crowd, and comes back again and again to the reactions of the others with him. His own reactions, of course, are also recorded. If we pay particular attention to the words, phrases and sentences in the passage we can see that the man takes his own time in coming to the actual description of the Martian. This delayed description heightens suspense and arouses our expectations.

At the end of the first paragraph, he reveals his inability to see things clearly: "For a moment that circular cavity seemed perfectly black. I had the sunset in my eyes." In the second paragraph, he gradually arouses the reader's curiosity, without really, satisfying it. "I think everyone expected to see a man emerge..... I know I did....." In the third paragraph, he describes his own reactions and those of the crowd. "A sudden chill came over me. There was a loud shriek from a woman behind.... I saw astonishment giving place to horror on the faces of the people about me.... and saw the people on the other side of the pit running off.... and ungovernable terror gripped me. I stood petrified and staring." It is only after all this that he attempts to say what the Martian looks like. In the fourth paragraph, the point of view shifts again. It is now assumed that all those present have become familiar with the sight of the Martian and their reactions are now commented upon.

Note the clever repeated use of the definite article. "The peculiar V-shaped mouth.....the absence of a chin, the incessant quivering of the mouth....." In fact all these have not been described before, only mentioned; but the reader is made to believe that these features are already familiar to the people who have by now become acquainted with the sight of the strange creature. It is necessary for a discerning reader to get behind the mass of words and sentences and paragraphs with which the literary artist constructs his elaborate verbal edifice, the product of his imagination.

From the discussion so far, we realise how important it is for us to consider the point of view of the describer and what he does or does not describe and to what extent we are to take what he says literally as 'the truth', or 'the actual reality'. Because, after all, the fictional world is the product of the writer's own creative imagination.

2.3 PASSAGE FROM ISAK DINESEN'S OUT OF AFRICA

We shall now look at a passage containing a description of African birds by Isak Dinesen, who lived in Africa for a long time. Her book Out of Africa has recently been made into an outstanding film.

Descriptive writing, whether it is imaginative or factual, faces the problem of selection as well as of presentation. Too much detail can be confusing or bewildering just as inadequate or haphazard choice of detail will result in disorganised and blurred presentation.

The passage is an excellent model for study and analysis from this point of view: it depends on objective facts (in the sense that we can see them and recognise them in reality). Although other writers might write very different descriptions about the same things, they cannot often distort reality beyond the bounds of credibility. Degrees of objectivity are of course bound to differ from writer to writer, depending on his/ her perceptions and purpose. Writing about African birds, the author makes deliberate choices, relating both to inclusion and exclusion, since exhaustiveness is neither possible nor necessary. In presenting them, the writer also decides consciously the order in which they are to be introduced, their distinguishing individual characteristics, and the nature of the emotions or attitudes that the writer wishes to project. Let us see what happens in this passage.

The passage is to be read two or three times slowly and deliberately. Difficult words and phrases should be underlined. The next thing is to bring out the significance of the words and phrases in the context in which they occur in this passage with the help of a good dictionary/encyclopedia. You will find the glossary useful.

2.3.1 Text

Just at the beginning of the long rains, in the last week of March, or the first week of April, I have heard the nightingale in the woods of Africa. Not the full song: a few notes only -- the opening bars of the concerto, a rehearsal, suddenly stopped and again begun. It was as if, in the solitude of the dripping woods, someone was, in a tree, tuning a small 'cello. It was, however, the same melody, and the same abundance and sweetness, as were soon to fill the forests of Europe, from Sicily to Elsinore.

We had the black and white storks in Africa, the birds that build their nests upon the thatched village roofs of Northern Europe. They look less imposing in Africa than they do there, for here they had such tall and ponderous birds as the Marabout and the Secretary Bird to be compared to. The storks have got other habits in Africa than in Europe, where they live as in married couples and are symbols of domestic happiness. Here they are seen together in big flights, as in clubs. They are called locust-birds in Africa, and follow along when the locusts come upon the land, living on them. They fly over the plains, too, where there is a grass-fire on, circling just in front of the advancing line of small leaping flames, high up in the scintillating rainbow-coloured air, and the grey smoke, on watch for the mice and snakes that run from the fire. The storks have a gay time in Africa. But their real life is not here, and when the winds of spring bring back thoughts of mating and nesting, their hearts are turned towards the North, they remember old times and places and fly off, two and two, and are shortly after wading in the cold bogs of their birth-places.

Out on the plains, in the beginning of the rains, where the vast stretches of burnt grass begin to show fresh green sprouting, there are many hundred plovers. The plains always have a maritime air, the open horizon recalls the sea and the long sea-sands, the wandering wind is the same, the charred grass has a saline smell, and when the grass is long it runs in waves all over the land. When the white carnation flowers on the plains you remember the chopping white-specked waves all round you as you are tacking up the Sund. Out on the plains the plovers likewise take on the appearance of Sea-birds, and behave like Sea-birds on a beach, legging it, on the close grass, as fast as they can for a short time, and then rising before your horse with high shrill shrieks, so that the light sky is all alive with wings and birds' voices.

The Crested Cranes, which come on to the newly rolled and planted maize-land, to steal the maize out of the ground, make up for the robbery by being birds of good omen, announcing the rain; and also by dancing to us. When the tall birds are together in large numbers, it is a fine sight to see them spread their wings and dance. There is much style in the dance, and a little affectation, for why, when they can fly, do they jump up and down as if they were held on to the earth by magnetism? The whole ballet has a sacred look, like some ritual dance; perhaps the cranes are making an attempt to join Heaven and Earth like the winged angels walking up and down Jacob's - Ladder. With their delicate pale grey colouring, the little black velvet skull-cap and the fan-shaped crown, the cranes have all the air of light, spirited frescoes. When, after the dance, they lift and go away, to keep up the scared tone of the show they give out, by the wings or the voice, a clear ringing note, as if a group of church bells had taken wing and were sailing off. You can hear them a long way away, even after the birds themselves have become invisible in the sky: a chime from the clouds.

Hornbill

The Greater Hornbill was another visitor to the farm, and came there to eat the fruits of the Cape-Chestnut tree. They are very strange birds. It is an adventure or an experience to meet them, not altogether pleasant, for they look exceedingly knowing. One morning before sunrise I was woken up by a loud jabbering outside the house, and when I walked out on the terrace I saw forty-one Hornbills sitting in the trees on the lawn. There they looked less like birds than like some fantastic articles of finery set on the trees here and there by a child. Black they all were, with the sweet, noble black of Africa, deep darkness absorbed through an age, like old soot, that makes you feel that for elegance, vigour and vivacity, no colour rivals black. All the Hornbills were talking together in the merriest mood, but with choice deportment, like a party of inheritors after a funeral. The morning air was as clear as crystal, the sombre party was bathing in freshness and purity, and, behind the trees and the birds, the sun came up, a dull red ball. You wonder what sort of a day you are to get after such an early morning.

The Flamingoes are the most delicately coloured of all the African birds, pink and red like a flying twig of an Oleander bush. They have incredibly long legs and bizarre and recherche curves of their necks and bodies, as if from some exquisite traditional prudery they were making all attitudes and movements in life as difficult as possible.

I once travelled from Port Said to Marseilles in a French boat that had on board a consignment of a hundred and fifty Flamingoes, which were going to the Jardin d' Acclimatation in Marseilles. They were kept in large dirty cases with canvas sides, ten in each, standing up close to one another. The keeper, who was taking the birds over, told me that he was counting on losing twenty per cent of them on a trip. They were not made for that sort of life, in rough weather they lost their balance, their legs broke, and the other birds in the cage trampled on them. At night when the wind was high in the Mediterranean and the ship came down in the waves with a thump, at each wave I heard, in the dark, the Flamingoes shriek. Every morning, I saw the keeper taking out one or two dead birds, and throwing them overboard. The noble wader of the Nile, the sister of the lotus, which floats over the landscape like a stray cloud of sunset, had become a slack cluster of pink and red feathers with a pair of long, thin sticks attached to it. The dead birds floated on the water for a short time, knocking up and down in the wake of the ship before they sank.

Flamingoes : The noble wader of the Nile, the sister of the lotus.....

2.3.3 Discussion

The passage is full of delightful descriptions of some birds. The first paragraph is about the nightingale, the bird with rich and varied associations in Western literature. The black and white storks again are European birds. From time immemorial (until popular scientific knowledge destroyed the myth) they were engaged in the safe delivery of new born infants to every household (according to children's story books) and lived like 'married couples', and 'symbols of domestic happiness'. In Africa they have a gay time but 'their real life is not here' and they prefer 'the cold bogs of their birth-places' when summer comes. It is quite a change for them.

Next comes the plover, a land bird living near the sea in Europe and a sea-bird on the wide plains of Africa, a paradoxical existence. With their presence, 'the light sky is all alive with wings and birds' voices'.

The crested cranes described in the next paragraph are 'birds of good omen' announcing rain. They are like winged angels walking up and down Jacob's Ladder, attempting to join heaven and earth.

Note the sudden change in the author's attitude to the 'Greater Hornbill'; the diction signals a more critical and less endearing tone. If you contrast the words and metaphors used for them with those found in the previous paragraph this change will appear dramatic: 'strange', 'jabbering', 'exceedingly knowing', 'a party of inheritors after a funeral', indicate the author's attitude to them.

The last two paragraphs are devoted to the flamingoes. The passage ends on a sad note, lamenting human cruelty and indifference to these delicate birds and to nature in general. You will, no doubt agree that although only six birds out of hundreds of varieties are described here, there is a certain artful rounding-off of this topic; what is presented is beautiful and memorable, each bird has its individuality, every paragraph a self-contained theme and tone, the well-chosen figures of speech helping to bring out their unique features.

Some words have strong overtones or connotations in addition to what is often described as their simplest meaning found in a small dictionary. While words like 'table', 'chair', 'read', 'sit', 'stand', etc. have only their lexical meanings, or what is usually called denotation, words like 'ponderous', 'shrieks', 'affectation', 'jabbering', 'trample', 'sombre' have suggestions that tend to be unfavourable. Similarly words, like 'delicate', 'spirited', 'fantastic', 'noble' have favourable connotations.

Some words may also take on special meanings from the context, particularly when irony is intended, and so one has to watch out for such words. As students of literature we have to be constantly alert and ready for surprises. We have also to learn to use a good dictionary.

Check Your Progress II

Now read the passage carefully once more (in fact as many times as you think necessary) and do the following exercises:

i) What is the point of view of the author? Are the birds described from the point of view of an African or an outsider? Give your reasons.

ii) What is the significance of the phrase 'from Sicily to Elsinore'?

iv) "The wader of the Nile, the sister of the Lotus", what do these phrases refer to? Do the phrases refer to the same object or to different objects? Justify your view. If they refer to the same object, the two phrases are said to be in apposition to each other.

2.4 LET US SUM UP

In this unit we have:

- introduced you to different kinds of descriptive writing;
- shown you how words acquire different connotations in different contexts
- highlighted the writer's use of myths, legends, imagery and allusions to enrich descriptions;
- pointed out how the choice of point of view determines the overall artistic effect of the writing.

Check Your Progress I

- i) Ungovernable terror gripped me; I stood petrified and staring; the strange horror of their appearance; the Gorgon; groups of tentacles; an effect akin to nausea; something fungoid in the oily brown skin; clumsy deliberation of their tedious movements unspeakably terrible; overcome with disgust and dread; the monster.

Read the last paragraph carefully. You will note that the shopman has disappeared; he was pulled into the pit and the faint shriek that was heard caused terror and a strange feeling of dread. That the Martian had hardly any human characteristics or feelings can be easily seen from the extract.

- ii) Yes. Note the reactions of the onlookers, besides his own. Re-read the last paragraph, if you are not sure, and find out what happened to the shopman. The Martian is compared to a bear; the reference to the Gorgon (see 1.1.4) is also significant. There is nothing even remotely human about the Martians.
- iii) Look at the paragraph beginning 'Those who have never seen a living Martian.....' Carefully note expressions like 'the tumultuous breathing', 'evidence heaviness and painfulness of movement', 'clumsy deliberation of their tedious movements', which indicate that they were out of their element.

- iv) The answer is clearly No. Go back and read the passage again, if you are in doubt. You will see that the reactions of the crowd are described and these were not at all sympathetic. No one is inclined to go and help the Martians. Instead they are terrified by their very sight.

Check Your Progress II

- i) The very first paragraph makes this clear. The point of view is that of a European. There are several more clues in the passage. The birds are, in the eyes of the author, visitors in Africa, more or less like herself, except that visits are seasonal migrations.
- ii) Sicily is practically the southernmost point of Europe and Elsinore is one of the northernmost. In fact the whole of Europe is thus indicated.
- iii) The plover is a migratory bird found on European beaches. The comparison between the sea and the plains of Africa is suggested; the open horizon; the wandering wind; the salty smell of the burnt grass; the wavy movement of the long grass; the white carnation flowers. Also go back to 2.2.2.
- iv) They refer to the flamingoes. To the same object: the flamingoes; both the birds and the lotus are found in the Nile.
- v) There are two groups of words with strong favourable and unfavourable connotations contrasted. The author's disapproval is made very clear. Note the two sentences in the final paragraph.
- vi) The passage describes the kind of life that they live in Africa, what they do, what they eat, etc. Re-read the passage if necessary and pick out the comparisons relating to the song of the nightingale; the sea and the African plains; Jacob's ladder, the sound of church bells: inheritors after a funeral; etc.

3.0 OBJECTIVES

In the previous unit, you read two prose passage which are examples of descriptive writing. In this unit, you will further examine the nature of descriptive writing by reading two more passages. In these passages you will study the different devices used by the writers so that at the end of this unit you will be able to :

- analyse the stylistic features of descriptive writing;
- describe the effective use of simile and metaphor.

3.1 INTRODUCTION

Descriptive writing on the whole, as we have been observing, tends to 'freeze' objects, places and people in space and time. Description is thus essentially frozen time held in suspense before it merges into the current of the narrative, the irreversible momentum of present time flowing into past time. 'Here is the moment, grasp it, hold it, concentrate on it, perceive its essence, make it part of your memory, before it vanishes for ever', the writer seems to be urging us. Descriptive writing which lacks this sense of immediacy, its sudden flash of illumination of intense revelation, whether it is of the nature of things or events, insight into the character of individuals, or whatever it is holding up for our examination, fails to capture our attention if it does not justify the 'freezing' of the moment.

3.2 PASSAGE FROM SEAN O'CASEY'S INISHFALLEN, FARE THEE WELL

Let us look at the following brief passage by Sean O'Casey, taken from his book Inishfallen, Fare Thee Well (1949). Here he is describing a street full of decaying houses, an area in Dublin which had once known respectability, happiness and prosperity, but had been reduced to squalor, abject poverty and utter misery. Now read the passage carefully a few times. Wherever necessary, use your dictionary, to find out the exact meanings of the words and phrases in the context in which they are used by the writer. The glossary at the end of the passage will be useful.

3.2.1 Text

There were the houses, too – a long, lurching row of discontented incurables, smirched with the age-long marks of ague, fevers, cancer, and consumption, the soured tears of little children, and the sighs of disappointed newly-married girls. The doors were scarred with time's spit and anger's hasty knocking; the pillars by their sides were shaky, their stuccoed bloom long since peeled away, and they looked like crutches keeping the trembling doors standing on their palsied feet. The gummy-eyed windows blinked dimly out, lacquered by a year's tired dust from the troubled street below. Dirt and disease were the big sacraments here – outward and visible signs of an inward and spiritual disgrace. The people bought the cheapest things in food they could find in order to live, to work, to worship: the cheapest spuds, the cheapest tea, the cheapest meat, the cheapest fat; and waited for unsold bread to grow stale that they might buy that cheaper, too. Here they gathered up the fragments so that nothing would be lost. The streets were long haggard corridors of rottenness and ruin. What wonderful mind or memory could link this shrinking wretchedness with the flaunting gorgeousness of silk and satin; with bloom of rose and scent of lavender? A thousand years must have passed since the last lavender lady was carried out feet first from the last surviving one of them. Even the sun shudders now when she touches a roof, for she feels some evil has chilled the glow of her garment. The flower that here once bloomed is dead forever. No wallflower here has crept into a favoured cranny; sight and sign of the primrose were far away; no room here for a dance of daffodils; no swallow twittering under a shady eave; and it was sad to see an odd sparrow seeking a yellow grain from the mocking dust; not even a spiky-headed thistle, purple mitred, could find a corner here for a sturdy life. No Wordsworth here wandered about as lonely as a cloud.

3.2.2 Glossary

lurching:	sudden movement forward or sideways, as though without control like a drunken person
smirched:	blotted; disfigured by marks
ague:	fever that causes uncontrollable trembling, like malaria, for example stuccoed:	plastered, ornamented with plaster designs
palsied:	affected by paralysis, or disease causing trembling of the limbs lacquered:	covered as though with lacquer or polish sacraments:	Christian ceremonies performed in the church
spuds:	potatoes
haggard:	tired, worn out, having lines and hollows around the eyes and cheeks flaunting:	to exhibit or show off something in a proud and haughty way.
gorgeousness:	extremely beautiful appearance

3.3 PASSAGE FROM D.H. LAWRENCE'S MORNINGS IN MEXICO

The next descriptive passage we shall take up for study is by D.H. Lawrence. It is about market day on the last Saturday before Christmas when countless Mexican Indians riding donkeys, travelling in ox carts and on foot converge on the covered market, bringing their supplies: wood and charcoal, farm produce, flowers to sell, barter or exchange.

With his eye for detail, Lawrence describes the flowers and trees, the landscape, the hills, the different tribes of Indians, their dress and styles of walking, the all-enveloping dust, and the merchandise.

This is the last Saturday before Christmas. The next year will be momentous, one feels. This year is nearly gone. Dawn was windy, shaking the leaves, and the rising sun shone under a gap of yellow cloud. But at once it touched the yellow flowers that rise above the patio wall, and the swaying, growing magenta of the bougainvillea, and the fierce red outbursts of the poinsettia. The poinsettia is very splendid, the flowers very big, and of a sure stainless red. They call them Noche Buenas, flowers of Christmas Eve. These tufts throw out their scarlet sharply, like red birds ruffling in the wind of dawn as if going to bathe, all their feathers alert. This for Christmas, instead of holly-berries. Christmas seems to need a red herald.

The yucca is tall, higher than the house. It is, too, in flower, hanging an arm's length of soft creamy bells, like a yard-long grape-cluster of foam. And the waxy bells break on their stems in the wind, fall noiselessly from the long creamy bunch, that hardly sways.

The coffee-berries are turning red. The hibiscus flowers, rose coloured, sway at the tips of the thin branches, in rosettes of soft red. In the second patio, there is a tall tree of the flimsy acacia sort. Above itself it puts up whitish fingers of flowers, naked in the blue sky. And in the wind these fingers of flowers in the blue sky, sway, sway with the reeling, roundward motion of tree-tips in a wind.

A restless morning, with clouds lower down, moving also with a larger roundward motion. Everything moving. Best to go out in motion too, the slow roundward motion like the hawks.

Everything seems slowly to circle and hover towards a central point, the clouds, the mountains round the valley, the dust that rises, the big, beautiful, white-barred hawks, gabilanes, and even the snow-white flakes of flowers upon the dim palo blanco tree. Even the organ cactus, rising in stock-straight clumps, and the candelabrum cactus, seems to be slowly wheeling and pivoting upon a centre, close upon it.

Strange that we should think in straight lines, when there are none, and talk of straight courses, when every course, sooner or later, is seen to be making the sweep round, swooping upon the centre. When space is curved, and the cosmos is sphere within sphere, and the way from any one point to any other point is round the bend of the inevitable, that turns as the tips of the broad wings of the hawk turn upwards, leaning upon the air like invisible half of the ellipse. If I have a way to go, it will be round the swoop of a bend impinging centripetal towards the centre. The straight course is hacked out in rounds, against the will of the world.

Yet the dust advances like a ghost along the road, down the valley plain. The dry turn of the valley-bed gleams like soft skin, sunlit and pinkish ochre spreading wide between the mountains that seem to emit their own darkness, a dark-blue vapor translucent, sombering them from the humped crests downwards. The many-pleated, noiseless mountains of Mexico.

The Yucca is tall.....

The Candelabrum cactus

And away from the footslope lie the white specks of Huayapa, among its lake of trees. It is Saturday, and the white dots of men are threading down the trail over the bare humps to the plain, following the dark twinkle-movement of asses, the dark nodding of the woman's head as she rides between the baskets. Saturday and market-day, and morning, so the white specks of men, like seagulls on plough-land, come ebbing like sparks from the palo blanco, over the fawn undulating of the valley slope.

They are dressed in snow-white cotton, and they lift their knees in the Indian trot, following the ass where the woman sits perched between the huge baskets, her child tight in the rebozo, at the brown breast. And girls in long, full, soiled cotton skirts running, trotting, ebbing along after the twinkle-movement of the ass. Down they come in families, in clusters, in solitary ones, threading with ebbing, running, barefoot movement noiseless towards the town, that blows the bubbles of its church-domes above the stagnant green of trees, away under the opposite fawn-skin hills.

But down the valley middle comes the big road, almost straight. You will know it by the tall walking of the dust, that hastens also towards the town, overtaking, overpassing everybody. Overpassing all the dark little figures and the white specks that thread tinily, in a sort of underworld, to the town.

From the valley villagers and from the mountains the peasants and the Indians are coming in with supplies, the road is like a pilgrimage, with the dust in greatest haste, dashing for town. Dark-eared asses and running men, running women, running girls, running lads, twinkling donkeys ambling on fine little feet, under twin great baskets with tomatoes and gourds, twin great nets of bubble-shaped jars, twin bundles of neat-cut faggots of wood, neat as bunches of cigarettes, and twin net-sacks of charcoal. Donkeys, mules, on they come, great pannier baskets making a rhythm under the perched woman, great bundles bouncing against the sides of the slim-footed animals. A baby donkey trotting naked after its piled-up dam, a white, sandal-footed man following with the silent Indian haste, and a girl running again on light feet.

Onwards, on a strange current of haste, and slowly rowing among the foot-travel, the ox-wagons rolling solid wheels below the high net of the body. Slow oxen, with heads pressed down nosing to the earth, swaying, swaying their great horns as a snake sways itself, the shovel-shaped collar of solid wood pressing down on their necks like a scoop. On, on between the burnt-up turn and the solid, monumental green of the organ cactus. Past the rocks and the floating palo blanco flowers, past the tousled dust of the mesquite bushes.

While the dust once more, in a greater haste than anyone, comes tall and rapid down the road, overpowering and obscuring all the little people, as in a cataclysm.

They are mostly small people, of the Zapotech race: small men with lifted chests and quick, lifted knees, advancing with heavy energy in the midst of dust. And quiet, small round-headed women running barefoot, tightening their blue rebozos round their shoulders, so often with a baby in the fold. The white cotton clothes of the men so white that their faces are invisible places of darkness under their big hats. Clothed darkness, faces of night, quickly, silently, with inexhaustible energy advancing to the town.

And many of the Serranos, the Indians from the hills, wearing their little conical black felt hats, seem capped with night, above the straight white shoulders. Some have come far, walking all yesterday in their little black hats and black-sheathed sandals. Tomorrow they will walk back. And their eyes will be just the same, black and bright and wild, in the dark faces. They have no goal, any more than the hawks in the air, and no course to run, any more than the clouds.

The market is a huge roofed-in place. Most extraordinary is the noise that comes out, as you pass along the adjacent street. It is a huge noise, yet you may never notice it. It sounds as if all the ghosts in the world were talking to one another, in ghost-voices, within the darkness of the market structure. It is a noise something like rain, or banana leaves in a wind. The market, full of Indians, dark-faced, silent-footed, hush-spoken, but pressing in countless numbers. The queer hissing murmurs of the Zapotech idioma, among the sound of Spanish, the quiet aside-voices of the Mixtecas.

3.3.2 Glossary

momentous:	of great importance
patio:	an inner roofless courtyard of a Spanish house
magenta:	dark purplish red colour
poinsettia:	a tropical plant with flower-like groups of large red leaves

ruffling:	making uneven movements like birds moving their feathers when bathing or preening
holly-berries:	red coloured berries of a short green tree with shiny green prickly leaves found in cold countries herald:	a messenger or sign of something to come yucca:	the state flower of Mexico, having pointed leaves and clusters of white waxy flowers hibiscus:	tropical plant with large bright flowers
rosettes:	shaped like roses
acacia:	group of tropical trees which give gum

organ cactus:	a tree-like cactus found in Mexico
stock-straight:	straight stem or trunk
clump:	cluster of trees or plants growing close together
candelabrum:	an ornamental holder for several candles or lamps; resembling it impinging:	having an effect upon centripetal:	tending to move towards the centre
ochre:	yellow colour
translucent:	allowing light to pass through, without being transparent
sombering:	casting shadows
pleated:	with flattened narrow folds, usually in cloth
rebozo:	a long shawl or scarf of fine material worn by Mexican women over the head and shoulders faggots:	a bunch of small sticks for burning pannier:	pairs of baskets carried by a horse or donkey
tousled:	made untidy, disarranged
mesquite:	a tree or shrub bearing green bean-like pods, found in Mexico cataclysm:	sudden and violent event like an earthquake or a flood.

3.3.3 Discussion

The first thing that strikes us about this passage is the active nature of the verbs found in it. Everything seems to be doing something, and not just passively 'being'. The year is 'nearly gone', the dawn 'windy shaking the leaves,' the 'rising sun... touched the yellow flowers that rose above the patio wall'. The 'tufts throw out their scarlet sharply', the 'waxy bells break on their stems in the wind, fall noiselessly', the hibiscus flowers 'sway', the tall tree 'puts up whitish fingers of flowers'. Everything seems to be in motion, caught in the act of doing something, not merely existing. The same active feeling of participation is imparted to the clouds, the mountains, the dust, the hawks, even the cactus, the vegetation 'slowly wheeling and pivoting upon a centre, close upon it'. The mountains 'seem to emit their own darkness'.

Throughout the passage the dust is an active participant: 'it advances like a ghost', 'down the valley middle comes the road..... you will know it by the tall walking of the dust, that hastens also towards the town, overtaking, passing everybody'. Further in paragraph 11, 'the road is like a pilgrimage, with the dust in greatest haste dashing for town'. In paragraph 13, 'the dust once more in a greater haste than anyone, comes tall and rapid down the road, overpowering and obscuring all the little people, as in a cataclysm.'

While the passage opens on a rather quiet and tranquil note, the suggestion of considerable activity is gradually built up through the smaller paragraphs. Then the idea of convergence of movement which is centripetal and circular rather than in the form of straight lines, or perpendicular, is developed. Following this, we have the description of the Mexicans hurrying to the market place from the hills and plains of the surrounding country, involving trekking for one or even two days. The picturesque effects are achieved through the use of striking metaphors: 'while dots of men are threading down the trail over the bare humps to the plain', 'twinkle-movement of asses', 'white specks of men, sea-gulls on plough-land, come ebbing like sparks'... There are also pairs and triplets of words and phrases, repetition of sentence structure with variation, minute concrete details building up the picture of great crowds of people getting together, ostensibly to buy and sell but in reality to meet one another, to co-mingle, to satisfy their urge for human companionship.

Comparisons, as in similes and metaphors, which are usually discussed under figures of speech, can be used both conventionally and with considerable insight and originality. They are encountered extensively in descriptive writing. While similes are explicit and often sustained comparisons, metaphors are concise and sharp, not always extended and sustained. Take the following examples: 'the dust advances like a ghost along the road'; 'the white specks of men, like sea-gulls on plough-land'; 'they have no goal any more than clouds'. In all these the comparison of point of similarity is clearly and deliberately stated, often elaborated, depending on the writer and his intention. However, in the case of metaphors the points of similarity are often intuitively seen in flashes, implied rather than explicitly stated. Consider the following examples from 3.2.1; 'the gummy-eyed windows blinked dimly out'. Here the comparison between the eyes of the very old and ill, looking out through their sticky eyelids and the dusty dirty windows of the old and decaying houses are fused into a metaphor, a direct and simultaneous identification of two similar objects or processes. In the same passage, 'haggard corridors of rottenness and ruin', contains a fusion of tired worn-out people and the streets that were rotten and lay in ruins. The description of the town 'that blows the bubbles of its church-domes above the stagnant green of trees', is a compressed simile, achieved with great economy of words. It is important to develop sensitivity to metaphor in the study of literature, particularly descriptive writing, whether it is poetry or prose.

There are various schemes of repetition that are frequently and effectively employed, particularly in descriptive writing to convey strong emotional overtones. Sometimes it may just be repetition of the same word, for example, 'the cheapest spuds, the cheapest tea, the cheapest meat, the cheapest fat'; 'sway, sway'; sometimes words with similar meanings or sounds are repeated like 'running, trotting, ebbing along'; or 'running men, running women, running girls, running lads' (repetition with variation, emphasizing running). Schemes of repetition can also include balance and parallelism or antithesis as in 'shrinking wretchedness with the flaunting gorgeousness of silk and satin', 'the bloom of rose and scent of lavender'. With these balanced phrases go alliteration (use of two or more words, near to each other, beginning with the same letter 'alone, alone all, all alone') and assonance (words having similar vowel sounds), and consonance (words having similar consonant sounds), reinforcing sense with sound. There are numerous and intricate patterns of repetition frames. Some of these we shall identify and analyse as we go along.

3.4 LET US SUM UP

In the two passages that we examined in some detail, we found a number of stylistic features:

- a) personification which invests objects and events with human significance;
- b) metaphors and similes capture the essential similarity or relationship between very dissimilar objects.
- c) the use of schemes of repetition, and literary devices such as assonance and alliteration are effective in creating emotional responses and heightening certain stylistic effects.

3.5 ANSWERS TO EXERCISES

Check Your Progress I

i) This is a direct reference to the well-known poem by Wordsworth 'The Daffodils'. It is a very popular poem and its likely you have studied it some time. If not, it is worth a reading. It contrasts strikingly with the lack of freedom and beauty in the street described here. This comparison is intended to drive home this point.

THE DAFFODILS

I wandered lonely as a cloud
That floats on high o'er vales and hills,
When all at once I saw a crowd,
A host, of golden daffodils;
Besides the lake, beneath the trees,
Fluttering and dancing in the breeze.

Continuous as the stars that shine
And twinkle in the milky way,
They stretched in never-ending line
Along the margin of a bay:
Ten thousand saw I at a glance,
Tossing their heads in sprightly dance.

The waves beside them danced; but they
Out-did the sparkling waves in glee:
A poet could not but be gay,
In such a jocund company;
I gazed – and gazed – but little thought
What wealth the show to me had brought;

For oft, when on my couch I lie
In vacant or in pensive mood,
They flash upon the inward eye
Which is the bliss of solitude;
And then my heart with pleasure fills,
And dances with the daffodils.

- ii) If the answer is not clear to you, you should go back to 3.2.1 and re-read the whole passage, particularly the earlier part. This point has been discussed in 3.2.3. Try and summarise it in your own words.
- iii) See sections 3.2.1 and 3.2.3. The understanding of this point is central to the whole discussion.
- iv) The point is that everything in this street is doomed: not only the old and the dying, but also the young people and the children. Even birds and plants are not exempted. This is what moves readers most powerfully. The expressions are carefully selected to reinforce this impression. Got back to 3.2.1 if necessary.

Check Your Progress II

- i) The first thing one notices is that everything seems to be in motion, in the act of doing something. This is achieved by the extensive use of active verbs. For examples, turn to the text and the first paragraph of 3.3.3 Discussion.
- ii) Similes and metaphors are used extensively in descriptive writing, as we discussed in Unit 1, section 1.5. If you need help to pick out examples of similes and metaphors, turn to paras 2 and 3 of 3.3.3 Discussion.
- iii) Repetition is effectively employed to convey strong feelings and to emphasise a particular point. Refer to the last para of 3.3.3 Discussion.

- iv) The Zapotecs and the Serranos are the Indians who came to the markets. The Zapotec men are small and dark and wear big hats while the women are usually barefoot and recognizable by their blue rebozos. The Serranos, who came from the hills, wear little conical black felt hats and black sandals.

4.0 OBJECTIVES

In this unit, you will examine two more passages of descriptive writing in some detail. After reading this unit carefully and completing the exercise, you will be able to :

- recognize the literary characteristics and stylistic feature of a prose piece;
- explain the role of style in presenting the content effectively.

4.1 INTRODUCTION

Descriptive writing, as we have seen, is one of the varieties of prose. We have also seen that even within descriptive writing we can find writings of different kinds. In the earlier two units, you have seen the way that historians, travellers and anthropologists use prose for descriptive writing. While the content is important, it is style and presentation which separates literary prose from the non-literary and functional variety. It is for this reason that it is important to look at the literary aspects a little more closely by analyzing the stylistic features.

In this unit, you will read two passages of descriptive writing. The first passage is a description taken from Mulk Raj Anand's The Village.

The second passage is from the novel Bleak House by Charles Dickens. There are marked contrasts in the two passages. Both the passages are dramatic in nature. But while the first vividly describes a dramatic episode, the second dramatically builds up the atmosphere of the period.

4.2 PASSAGE FROM MULK RAJ ANAND'S THE VILLAGE

This passage is an extract from Mulk Raj Anand's novel The Village. This is a striking description of an unusual and bizarre event which takes place in a village. Snake bites are frequent occurrences in villages but local customs vary in their treatment. Often magic and exorcism are part of the treatment of snake-bites, in addition to various kinds of medication. But it is generally believed that the poison that has entered the body needs to be treated by other means besides medication, and the process is aided by faith cures and spiritual powers of a hallucinatory and dramatic kind. Some others perform these rites secretly with meditation and prayer in strict solitude.

4.2.1 Text

'There is the palanquin, there is our boy,' the peasants chorused. A tense silence prevailed during which the father of the lad, who had been brought, rushed to see if there was still life in the boy's body.

Harnam Singh was going to run out to fetch Chandi, but he had hardly risen before she rushed in, fuming and frothing, her eyes glinting like burning coals, her nostrils dilating wide like a breathless mare.

'They torture me and torment me, these eaters of their masters, Mahantji,' she said. 'Look, they have bruised my legs and arms. Why are they after my life? Why can't they tease their mothers, their sisters! May they die!'

'There is no talk!' There is no talk!' consoled the Mahant. 'They are rogues! You should keep quiet and not take any notice of what they say. Now where is Hafiz, the drummer? You wait and rest till he comes.'

Chandi sat wearily for the moment, and closed her eyes as if she were going to sleep.

'He is in the hall, I think,' said Harnam Singh, and he shouted, 'Ohe!, Hafizia, come in, ohe!, come in.'

Hafiz, the bearded old hereditary musician, came, bearing his drum. He still led concert-parties to peasants' homes on the occasion of marriages and births, and, as a menial, he had waited to be called to Mahant's sacred presence. He raised his hand to his head, saying, 'Salaam, Mahantji, father-mother.'

Lalu had heard that Chandi, the witch woman, was supposed to be possessed by the spirit of the king of snakes. She could cure anyone who had been bitten, with the help and blessing of the Mahant.

He had now finished grinding the liquid, and was draining the mixture into cups for the company to drink. But just then Hafiz struck up the drum and Chandi, who had sat still and intent, brooding heavily, began to shiver like someone possessed of a fever.

That was how she began to go into her trance, and though he had often seen her do it in his childhood, he left the pestle and mortar and watched, fascinated.

Even as he turned, the shivering gave place to a hissing, hard-breathing, shaking movement, at a faster tempo. And, as he contemplated the faces of the congregation in the eerie tenseness of the monastery courtyard, and saw the bitten body lie as dead in the stillness, the hissing, hard-breathing, shaking movement became the wriggling of a snake when it gives chase. The music of the drum had mounted to a rhythm which seemed to seep into Lalu's blood, and he felt embarrassed even as he lent himself to it.

But Chandi was almost going mad as, with a majestic sweep of her loose black hair, streaked with white, a smile on her lips that lit the haggard, sunken-cheeked ugliness of her face into an ecstasy, she began to revolve her head while she blew forth sharp whiffs of breath, like a cobra when it dances. Round and round the head went, round and round, till, while Lalu felt tickled to laugh, the blood of Chandi's face seemed to merge into an illusory circle of fire. And while she moved her head thus furiously she began to crawl on all fours, still revolving her head, still blowing and puffing short gasps of breath, spitting the profuse froth that was gathering on the corners of her mouth, and describing circles round the palanquin.

From shivering she passed to shaking, from shaking to wriggling and crawling in circles. Then she began to jump and caper, with short steps more like a monkey than a snake, and her head revolved with the violence of a whirlwind as she blew her breath in spurts of anger, and cast her spittle about the air as if she were spreading her venom against the world with a malevolent wrath. Her face struck the earth sometimes, and she seemed to lose control of her head completely, so that it struck against the edge of the palanquin and bled. But on and on she went, in a ceaseless, dangerous movement, the curves of a snake dance that was as fascinating in its mixture of human and reptile gestures as it was frighteningly terrible to behold. And time and space seemed to swirl in this mad dance to which the continuous thunder of the drum added a mighty abandon. Life seemed to lose its meaning and its reality on the shimmering waves of the steady stares that waited, half full of doubt, half full of hope, for the miracle to be performed.

The tension grew to a strange and uncanny height as Chandi, wrapt in the ecstasy of her movement, tired and violent, lifted by the swirling tides of her furious activity, became completely involved in her own warmth and seemed to forget the purpose for which she had summoned the spirit of the king of snakes. She drifted almost to the edge of the kitchen, which, to her as an outcast from society, was forbidden territory.

But then she changed her direction suddenly as if, even in her trance, she remembered her birth. And she danced to the foot of a banyan tree which stood overshadowing the courtyard in a corner, and blew into the holes at its roots to propitiate the snake gods who were supposed to live there. Then, absorbed in the shaking splendour of her dance, she whirled across to the palanquin where the bitten body of the peasant boy lay. And she began to blow at the various parts of it, drifting away after a brief spell as if to intensify her movement. And the father of the boy whispered: 'Wah Guru, Hey, Wah

Guru!' as if each movement of suspense, while his son still lay dormant, was like the load of centuries on his tight-stretched heart.

At this stage, the Mahant got up and, going towards Chandi, made as if to breathe a divine secret into the snake spirit's ear. And the musician shouted short little cries of encouragement as he hastened the tempo of his thumps on the drum.

Chandi followed the Mahant, spitting and snarling as a snake to its charmer, and moved towards the body. She circled round, while the holy man explored the pale olive skin of the boy for the spot where it had been bitten. But he couldn't find it.

The father of the boy, unable to bear the suspense any longer, rose eagerly and came forward and laid his fingers on his son's left ankle.

Upon this the Mahant led the snake spirit up to the ankle of the boy and breathed again into Chandi's ears.

The possessed woman sat, her head revolving, sweeping the dust with her hair, with a playful movement which rapidly assumed the utmost ferocity. Then, falling upon the boy's ankle, she blew upon the wound again and again spitting and spattering, and rubbed the sweep of her hair on it.

The Mahant bent down when she had repeated this for several seconds, and breathed something else into her ear.

Then he motioned to the palanquin bearers to take the body and lay it on the terrace and signed to the musician to stop beating the drum.

Chandi's head revolved frantically for a while, as it had done when she had blown at the ankle. Then, as if the fuel to the fire of her movement was exhausted now that the music had stopped, she slackened. Her shaking became a wriggle, and then her wriggle relaxed into a quivering and the quivering into a shiver, till at the end she sat still, brooding and intent, her lean, ugly face dropping from the flushed warmth to a surly, lined hardness, 'Give her some chapattis, oh Sitalgar,' the Mahant ordered, 'and some lentil,' and he went back to his seat.

The boy's body on the terrace turned and heaved and his eyes opened with a start. His father fell upon him with cries and pressed his limbs, turning the while to the Mahant and uttering short cries of gratitude, 'You are blessed! Blessed is the Wah Guru! Blessed are you, oh you of the line of the saints of Nandpur'

The audience, which had missed many heartbeats, whispered, 'Wah Guru! Wah Guru!'

The bells in the temple were tinkling for evening worship and everyone felt a sense of relief after the orgy of the miracle.

4.2.3 Discussion

The scene that is described here is of the ritual performed by a 'witch', a woman who mimics a snake in an elaborately symbolic dance performed to the accompaniment of music and wild rhythmic movements. In the course of this performance, which to the woman is almost a routine demonstration of her occult and unconscious powers, she is transformed from a wretched and pathetic old woman into a powerful agent of life-giving, or at least life-restoring, mysterious divine forces. Scepticism and faith, superstition and religious ecstasy mingle with hope and despair in a dramatically shifting scenario of an old woman-beggar becoming a sorceress-enchanter and agent of divine providence, at the climax of which the poison seems to have been drained out of the body of the boy restoring him to life, refreshed as though after a long sleep. This dramatic episode is vividly described by Mulk Raj Anand. You will have noticed that there is only a thin dividing line between narrative and descriptive prose in this passage. This will be discussed at length in the next block.

The scene is described through the eyes of Lalu, a young boy, the hero of the novel. He was engaged in making a drink, into which he was grinding some hemp for the Mahant and others present, when the boy who was bitten was brought in a palanquin by his father with the help of other villagers. But each time the miracle was performed by the old woman, Chandi, under the direction of the Mahant, there was great suspense and fear that it might not after all work. The old woman, who has been tormented by the urchins in the neighbourhood, was in a foul mood, but fortunately was immediately available along with the drummer. So without any delay the ceremony of propitiating the king of snakes was started. Before long she went into a trance and danced the snake dance, imitating the movements of a cobra, infuriated and ready to strike. She went through the various stages of its angry arousal and the vicious fatal strike of its poisonous fangs. After the propitiation of the king cobra, she symbolically enacted the process of taking back the poison from the spot in the left ankle of the boy where he was bitten, thus repeating the entire cycle, happily bringing back the boy from the jaws of death and restoring him to his desperate father, to the relief of the entire crowd which was holding its collective breath in agonised suspense. Chandi, the witch-beggar woman, once again became a pathetic old woman to be rewarded by a few chapattis and some lentils. But in her trance she had performed a life-restoring miracle.

death of the sun. Dogs, undistinguishable in mire. Horses, scarcely better; splashed to their very blinkers. Foot passengers, jostling one another's umbrellas, in a general infection of ill-temper, and losing their foot-hold at street corners, where tens of thousand of other foot passengers have been slipping and sliding since the day broke (if this day ever broke), adding new deposits to the crust upon crust of mud, sticking at those points tenaciously to the pavement, and accumulating at compound interest.

Fog everywhere. Fog up the river, where it flows among green aits and meadows; fog down the river, where it rolls defiled among the tiers of shipping, and the waterside pollutions of a great (and dirty) city. Fog on the Essex marshes, fog on the Kentish heights. Fog creeping into the cabooses of collier-brigs, fog lying out on the yards, and hovering in the rigging of great ships; fog dropping on the gunwales of barges and small boats. Fog in the eyes and throats of ancient Greenwich pensioners, wheezing by the firesides of their wards; fog in the stem and bowl of the afternoon pipe of the wrathful skipper, down in his close cabin; fog cruelly pinching the toes and fingers of his shivering little □prentice boy on deck. Chance people on the bridges peeping over the parapets into a nether sky of fog, with fog all around them, as if they were up in a balloon, and hanging in the misty clouds.

Gas looming through the fog in divers places in the streets, much as the sun may, from the spongy fields, be seen to loom by husbandman and ploughboy. Most of the shops lighted two hours before their time – as the gas seems to know, for it has a haggard and unwilling look.

The raw afternoon is rawest, and the dense fog is densest, and the muddy streets are muddiest, near that leaden-headed old obstruction, appropriate ornament for the threshold of a leaden-headed old corporation; Temple Bar. And hard by Temple Bar, in Lincoln's Inn Hall, at the very heart of the fog, sits the Lord High Chancellor in his High Court of Chancery.

Never can there come fog too thick, never can there come mud and mire too deep, to assort with the groping and floundering condition which this High Court of Chancery, most pestilent and hoary sinners, holds, this day, in the sight of heaven and earth.

On such an afternoon, if ever, the Lord High Chancellor ought to be sitting here – as here he is – with a foggy glory round his head, softly fenced in with crimson cloth and curtains, addressed by a large advocate with great whiskers, a little voice, and an interminable brief, and outwardly directing his contemplation to the lantern in the roof, where he can see nothing but fog. On such an afternoon, some score of members of the High Court of Chancery bar ought to be – as here they are – mistily engaged in one of the ten thousand stages of an endless cause, tripping one another up on slippery precedents, groping knee-deep in technicalities, running their goat-hair and horse-hair warded heads against walls of words, and making a pretence of equity with serious faces, as players might. On such an afternoon, the various solicitors in the cause, some two or three of whom have inherited it from their fathers, who made a fortune by it, ought to be – as are they not? – ranged in a line, in a long matted well (but you might look in vain for Truth at the bottom of it), between the registrar's red table and the silk gowns, with bills, cross-bills, answers, rejoinders, injunctions, affidavits, issues, reference to masters, masters' reports, mountains of costly nonsense, piled before them. Well may the court be dim, with wasting candles here and there; well may the fog hang heavy in it, as if it would never get out; well may the stained glass windows lose their colour, and admit no light of day into the place; well may the uninitiated from the streets, who peep in through the glass panes in the door, be deterred from entrance by its owlish aspect, and the by drawl languidly echoing to the roof from the padded dais where the Lord High Chancellor looks into the lantern that has no light in it, and where the attendant wigs are all stuck in a fog-bank! This is the Court of Chancery; which has its decaying houses and its blighted lands in every shire; which has its worn-out lunatic in every madhouse, and its dead in every churchyard; which has its ruined suitor, with his slipshod heels and threadbare dress, borrowing and begging through the round of every man's acquaintance; which gives to monied might the means abundantly of wearying out the right; which so exhausts finances, patience, courage, hope; so overthrows the brain and breaks the heart; that there is not an honourable man among its practitioners who would not give – who does not often give – the warning, “Suffer any wrong that can be done you, rather than come here!”

4.3.3 Discussion

The opening passage sets the scene. It begins with a one word sentence: “London” The second sentence is longer, but we note at once that it has no finite verb, the third is shorter, but again verbless. In sentence after sentence we have the same elliptical syntax (ellipsis is a rhetorical device, involving the omission of words and phrases, often easily supplied contextually) building up an atmosphere of gloom, ill-temper, irritation and repetitive and unproductive activity. Dogs, horses as well as people splashed in mud are struggling for a foot-hold in the all-pervading fog, wallowing in the slippery street, as though the earth was just recovering after the biblical floods. In such a strange world, where everything seems to have turned black, in mourning for the death of the sun (again a figure of speech), meeting a Megalosaurus would have caused no surprise.

In the second paragraph the word fog occurs for the first time and is repeated over and over again; the verbless sentences (the main verb elided) describe the fog expanding in all directions, all over London, outside London, in Essex and Kent, on the land, the river and the sky. It penetrates into the closed cabins of ships of every size and variety, into the 'eyes and the throats of ancient Greenwich pensioners', into the pipe the angry ship's captain was smoking. People on bridges thought 'they were up in a balloon, and hanging in the misty clouds'. The fog becomes a symbol of complete insulation from the world of real people, suggesting the true nature of the Court of Chancery, living in its own world, isolated from humanity, hanging 'in the misty clouds'. And this is the setting for the 'Lord High Chancellor in his High Court of Chancery'.

The street lamps were lit earlier than usual, but they failed to dispel the gloom. The thickest of fogs and the deepest mud and mire could not match the confusion and ineffectualness of the Court. Note particularly the use of superlatives. Then follows the contrast between the comfort, warmth and luxury in which the Court functions routinely day after day with its meaninglessness and utter indifference to human suffering. Justice is delayed from generation to generation and abject misery and helplessness are inflicted on the orphans, the old, the weak and the derelict. The syntax (the arrangement of words, phrases and clauses), the sentence structure and the tense used emphasize the unvarying routine and pointlessly interminable procedures, 'the groping knee-deep in technicalities', 'the slippery precedents', the wigged and gowned lawyers fighting their mock battles 'making a pretence of equity with serious faces, as players might'. The repetitions with variations of certain structures serve to emphasize the futility and the ridiculous nature of their petty wranglings, carried on from generation to generation. Over this sterile activity presides each succeeding Lord Chancellor, concentrating, like the lawyers' 'on the lantern in the roof, where he can see nothing but fog'. Reality in the form of day-light never penetrates into the courtroom through the stained glass windows.

The repeated structures 'on such an afternoon, if ever, the Lord High Chancellor ought to be sitting here – as here he is' and 'well may the court be dim....' both emotionally and logically build up to the climax 'where the Lord High Chancellor looks into the lantern that has no light in it, and like the people on the bridges peeping over the parapets into a nether sky of fog', feeling suspended and drifting like a balloon, are all 'stuck in a fog-bank'. It is not difficult to see how at this point all the descriptive strands are tied up, reinforcing the central theme of the futility of whatever goes on inside the Chancery. Instead of dispensing justice, the Chancery delays it, causing untold misery to generations of people.

Now read the passage carefully as many times as you consider necessary and then try to understand the exact meanings and suggestions of the words and phrases you find difficult in the contexts in which they are used in the passage. The glossary at the end of the passage is meant to help you.

- i) What kind of atmosphere does the frequent use of the word 'fog' evoke?

- ii) Mark True/False after reading the following statements
- | | | |
|----|---|------------|
| a) | The passage opens in spring | True/False |
| b) | The weather is bright | True/False |
| c) | It is night time | True/False |
| d) | The Court of Chancery is an unpopular place | True/False |
- iii) Explain the following
- a) hard by

- b) in the heart of

- c) monied might

- iv) How many times is the word afternoon repeated in the final paragraph? What purpose, do you think, is served by this repetition?

4.4 LET US SUM UP

In this unit we have analysed two fictional passages of prose. The first is a dramatic description of an episode while the second conveys both the genuine feel of the period described. We have:

- examined some of the distinctive stylistic features in the passage such as evocative diction, imagery and syntax, miming of action and repetition.
- seen how style plays a decisive role in presenting content.

4.5 ANSWERS TO EXERCISES

Check Your Progress I

- i) Stage 1: Chandi is bullied by the neighbourhood urchins
- Stage 2 : Suddenly, with the arrival of the palanquin she becomes the object of everyone's attention

Stage 3: When she starts dancing, a gradual change takes place in the ceremony. The transformation is complete.

Check Your Progress II

- i) You may read the passage again, keeping in mind the fact that writers use natural background and seasons in order to trace some correspondence between outer events and inner states of mind.
- ii) a) False
b) False
c) False
d) True
- iii) a) nearby
b) in the midst of
c) power that stems from great wealth
- iv) Three times. Repetition serves the following purposes
- moves from the particular to the general
 - gives it an effect of timelessness
 - conveys a strong impression of the repetitive and pointless activity that goes on endlessly in the Court of Chancery.

5.0 OBJECTIVES

In this unit we shall introduce you to narrative prose. We have already given you a brief introduction to narrative prose in the first unit of the previous block. If you read these lessons carefully and complete the given exercises, you will be able to:

- Describe the nature and functions of narrative prose;
- Distinguish between narratives in history and in travelogue;
- Analyse different varieties of narrative prose.

5.1 INTRODUCTION

Unlike descriptive writing, which mainly concentrates on the scene, the presentation of objects, events, and situations, narrative shifts the focus to what happens next, or what follows. In short, a narrative presents a sequence of events. In fact there is no 'story' without a narrative. Description calls for a certain kind of sustained effort, as we saw earlier. It calls for the ability to capture the very essence of the arrested moment, to render it powerfully and evocatively, to recreate an incident or scene in all its vividness and immediacy. Narration, on the other hand, can take several forms. It can be slow or rapid in tempo, exciting and colourful, or matter-of-fact and solidly truthful, prejudiced, distorted or heightened to impress or mislead. Narration can be purely objective as in most scientific and technical writing. It can also come alive in the hands of highly imaginative scientists, scholars and historians. Historians have also narrated historical events, as though the past had been brought back to life for the special benefit of their readers. Creative writers as well as scientists and scholars and those who tell their own life stories—everyone has to choose the appropriate narrative to suit their purposes.

For our purposes here, we shall examine some specimens of narrative prose analyzing their prominent features, as we did earlier (in Block 1) with descriptive passages. We have selected two passages for you : one from Alan Moorehead's The Blue Nile and the other from a travelogue From Heaven Lake by Vikram Seth. You will find two kinds of narrative here, the one employed in writing history and the other in writing a travelogue.

5.2 PASSAGE FROM ALAN MOOREHEAD'S THE BLUE NILE

The first passage that we shall examine is a historical narrative of the famous Battle of the Pyramids which Napoleon Bonaparte won so decisively against the Mamelukes in Egypt in 1798. Alan Moorehead considers it 'the last great cavalry charge of the Middle Ages', as over six thousand horsemen were engaged in the battle. That a battle in the last decade of the eighteenth century should have been described in these terms indicates the tremendous changes that had taken place in the art of warfare. The French were a truly professional army, unlike the Mamelukes who still valued the old-fashioned virtues of individual valour and personal accomplishments and lived like a martial race. The French soldiers were paid only small salaries. However, the lure of loot and plunder was what attracted them to the army. In Europe, warfare had become very professional, highly mobile, cold-blooded and mechanically efficient, particularly after the improved fire power that European armies had acquired as a result of industrialisation at the close of the eighteenth century. The Mamelukes still carried on the glorious traditions of medieval chivalry and individual courage and daring were held up as the noble art of war. They were no match for the cold and merciless fighting tactics of the French.

The French organised themselves in the form of highly mobile and self-contained squares, not so easily open to direct assault. When one set of soldiers fired their muskets, the others had already re-loaded and were ready to take their turn, so that a continuous stream of artillery fire was kept up. The Mamelukes attacked in huge formations of several hundreds and thousands and charged down on the finest breeds of Arab horses, with their swords drawn. It was an awesome sight, and the Mamelukes were the finest soldiers imaginable, but their rash courage was the cause of their total defeat and destruction, as the narrative graphically indicates. The French waited calmly until they were within fifty paces to fire their guns, bringing down the Mamelukes. Similarly, the Mameluke artillery, which was not mobile, managed to fire only one round before the French were upon them and routed them in hand-to-hand combat, seizing all their guns. Napoleon so planned the battle that he was able to separate the cavalry from their fire power and the infantry from the rest so that when the battle was lost the Mamelukes and their infantry had no escape route. They preferred to drown in the Nile rather than be killed by the bullets of the French. No wonder Denon is quoted as saying 'it was no longer a battle it was a massacre'. Murad the Mameluke leader 'appears to have realized that the battle; was lost almost before it had begun'.

All this does not mean that Napoleon Bonaparte did not richly deserve the credit for his genius; he was unquestionably one of the great generals the world had ever known. But what made his success against the Mamelukes so swift, total and also inevitable was the medieval nature of war as practised in the East. Industrialised Europe had all the modern weapons ready for use against nations which lived in the Middle Ages largely in their self-sufficient villages; professionalism and intensive training in fighting and marching were still unknown. In the East large armies were assembled in the moments of crisis and were equally quickly disbanded.

The strength of numbers served as a bargaining point, actual fighting was often avoided, and when it was inevitable it was confused and luck played a major role in these battles. The Europeans were fighting on foreign soil, they had to be full-time soldiers and could not afford to lose. Fortunately for them, even though they were poorly paid and had to cope with the hot desert climate and limited rations and disease, there was always the hope of loot and the right to a share in the spoils. If the generals got more than their share of glory and power, the common soldier was more than amply rewarded by the spoils of war, as the French discovered in their short-lived encounter with the Mamelukes, who had brought all their wealth and their fabulous personal possessions to the battlefield.

With this background you should be able to read the passage and analyse it on your own. Perhaps the characters need introduction. As can be guessed from the passage, Desaix, Reynier and Dugua were Napoleon's deputies; Murad was the chief of the Mamelukes who actually ruled Egypt in the name of the Ottoman Emperor. Ibrahim was a powerful Mameluke leader. The places mentioned in the narrative are those around Cairo. Now read on and you will be in a position to appreciate the force and clarity of the narrative; the extraordinary vividness and rapidity of the events that led to the total route of the Mamelukes; how Napoleon became the conqueror of Cairo with the loss of only about two hundred soldiers after the encounter, with the enemy numbering nearly twenty thousand. The author is in complete control of his facts and succeeds in recreating the excitement and significance of the historical occasion.

The French in Egypt

Bonaparte during these eventful days steadily continued his advance up the river. 'Melancholy and sadness', he records, 'reigned in the army'. But still he pushed his murmuring soldiers on, and ate his own plate of lentils in the midst of their bivouacs at night. The men talked for hours round the camp fires, arguing that they were being got rid of by the Directory in Paris—otherwise what was the reason for this senseless march? But at least they did not have to fight; there had been no sign of the enemy since Jibbrish, and a detachment crossing to the east bank found the country there equally deserted.

On July 19, they reached Umm Dinar, close to the junction with the Damietta branch of the river. Here they were barely twenty miles from Cairo—every man with a spy-glass turned it upon the distant outline of the pyramids—and Bonaparte, hearing at last from spies that the Mameluke army was waiting for him on the west bank outside Cairo, ordered a day's rest. On July 20 a twelve-hour forced march was begun before dawn, and the army bivouacked that night within a mile or two of Embaba. At 1 a.m. on July 21 the camp was already astir, and in the dawn light the soldiers saw the Mamelukes for the first time since Jibbrish: a thousand of them drawn up silently in line across the desert. Bonaparte went forward on horseback and surveyed the position through his glass. He saw beyond the enemy outposts the great camp at Embaba, and judged that there were about twenty thousand enemy infantry there, with perhaps some forty guns in crude entrenchments. The chief interest in these guns for Bonaparte was that they were river-boat guns without wheels or carriages, and therefore immobile. To the west of the camp the bulk of the Mameluke cavalry appeared to be drawn up astride the road to the pyramids at Gizeh and he judged them to number between 9,000 and 10,000. It was now 10 a.m. and the sun was rising to its full power.

There are many strange aspects about the Battle of the Pyramids; it took place, for example, nowhere near the pyramids—they were eight or nine miles away—and by the same process of romantic association most people remember this day because of Bonaparte's famous exhortation to his troops. 'Soldats! Du haut de ces monuments, quarante siecles vous regardent.' Another version runs, 'Allez, et pensez que du haut de ces monuments 40 siecles vous observent.' These troops were probably much too busy to pay any attention to it. The battle itself and its drastic aftermath provide many other anomalies. Yet perhaps the really significant factor in the whole affair is that Bonaparte, in these outlandish circumstances, and still a young man of 29, should have divined in one instant, and apparently with absolute conviction, precisely what he had to do. Never was a battle more clearly planned. He sees the fixed guns in the enemy camp and decides at once to keep them hors de combat for the time being by remaining outside their range while he tackles the Mameluke cavalry in the open desert. If the enemy infantry choose to come to the aid of the cavalry by sallying out of their camp, then so much the better, they will have to fight without the aid of their artillery. If, however, the infantry decide to remain where they are, it seems not unlikely that he will defeat the Mameluke cavalry with his own mobile guns and the concentrated fire of his squares; and then it will be time enough to turn on the enemy camp. A French detachment placed behind the camp and astride the Gizeh road will prevent the remnants of the Mameluke cavalry from coming to the assistance of their infantry and indeed the infantry themselves will have no place to which to retreat except into the Nile.

There seems to be no reason to doubt Bonaparte's word that this, in fact, was the way he designed the battle, since these dispositions were those which he actually carried out: at all stages of the action the Mamelukes reacted, not to their own plan (which was presumably to draw the French on to assault the camp while they charged in upon them from the flanks) but to Bonaparte's plan.

So now Desaix was sent off to meet the Mamelukes on the right flank, and it was a long business, a matter of three hours, before all was ready, his infantry marching in squares, with the artillery in between, the baggage to the centre, his scouts at the front. Murad appears to have been confused at first about what was happening; at all events it was not until 2 p.m., when the sun was at its fiercest and a strong wind blowing from the north, that he realized that his

* Soldiers! Forty centuries are looking down at you from the top of these monuments.

+ Come, think of the fact that forty centuries are observing you from the top of these monuments.

cavalry was about to be cut off from his infantry. Then at last he gave the order to charge.

At least six thousand horsemen were involved in this movement, and it is probably true to say that it was the last great cavalry charge of the Middle Ages. The contemporary attempts to describe it both in words and in drawings are not very satisfactory; they leave one with a confused picture of the Moslem pennants flying over the horses' heads, of the Mamelukes in their enormous turbans and fluttering robes, each man leaning forward with a sabre in his right hand, of the foot-attendants running beside them and of scores of camels laden with panniers of ammunition and weapons following on behind. But all this vanishes in a moment of clouds of dust and smoke, and the noise of the charge—the thousands of hoofs beating on the sand, the shouts, the drums and bugles—becomes lost in the general uproar of cannon. Few eye-witnesses ever really see a battle or comprehend what is happening while it is being fought, and this battle was more tumultuous than most, quicker in action, more savage in character and more concentrated in time; it was, indeed, one long crisis, while it lasted.

Desaix had just reached a sparse grove of palm trees when the charge began, and he had barely time to settle his soldiers into their action stations before the Mamelukes were upon them. They waited until the leading horsemen were within fifty paces. Then they fired. Denon speaks of the enemy riding right up to the mouths of the cannon before they fell or turned aside. Those who wheeled round the squares, seeking to make a breach in the sides and rear, were soon caught in the crossfire of Reynier's division that was coming up behind Desaix; and when they turned to charge again, their frightened animals were buffeted back and forth from one square to another. Murad, who had put himself in the van of the first assault, escaped with a slight wound in his cheek, and he appears to have realized that the battle was lost almost before it had begun. He gathered together the remnants of his men and retired towards the pyramids. Desaix's cavalry following up behind soon got themselves behind the enemy camp at Embaba and took up a position close to the river bank.

Meanwhile Dugua's division, with Bonaparte in one of the squares, was advancing on the camp itself. They turned aside a cavalry charge, and seeing the way clear before them rushed straight upon the enemy guns which, up to this point had taken no part in the battle. Nor were the gunners able to contribute much even at this desperate moment. They fired once, but before they could reload and fire again the French were on top of them, and a hand-to-hand struggle began among the entrenchments and the baggage of the camp. Murad attempted to come to the assistance of his infantry from the rear, but he found himself blocked by Desaix's division; and now in fact the bulk of the Mameluke army and its thousands of camp followers were surrounded. "From this moment," Denon says, "it was no longer a battle; it was a massacre."

Ibrahim, waiting with his reserves and a huge crowd of townspeople on the east bank, was appalled to see Embaba go up in flames, and presently out of the pall of the sandstorm raised by the north wind, thousands of figures, Mamelukes as well as infantry, came running to the river. There were no boats, but apparently these men preferred death by drowning to the bullets of the French, and so they flung themselves into the choppy water, even rode their horses into it, and were soon swept away by the current. This was a great reassurance to the sailors in the French flotilla further down the river. All day they had been struggling against the current, hoping to take part in the action, but at the time of the Mameluke's first charge they were still miles away. They heard in the distance a tremendous cannonade and presently this grew fainter—a sign that the enemy were in retreat. But the wind dropped and the noise of the battle grew stronger than before and seemed much closer, almost as if it was Bonaparte who was falling back. In some alarm the sailors listened as the firing continued to increase, but now the bodies of the dead enemy began to float down towards them, at first in twos and threes and then in dozens—the Mamelukes in their gorgeous robes like great tropical flowers on the surface of the water—and they knew that the battle was won. It had been decided in a little more than an hour.

Back on the battlefield and around the camp at Embaba the French soldiers found that they had reached their eldorado at last. The Mamelukes had gone into action carrying their wealth with them. Some had as many as 300 or 400 gold louis in their saddlebags, and their equipment—the inlaid swords and daggers, the silk scarves and the jewelled turbans—were worth a fortune to men who earned only a few sous a day. There was no shortage of this loot; three, perhaps four, thousand Mamelukes and their men had been either killed or drowned, and few of the French failed to get a share; barely two hundred of their own number had fallen. In the camp itself all forty pieces of cannon were recovered intact, together with some eight hundred camels and baggage animals, large stores of food and many cases of silver and other treasure. It was a measure of the ferocity of the fighting and of the bravery of the Mamelukes that only 1,000 prisoners were taken.

5.3 PASSAGE FROM VIKRAM SETH'S FROM HEAVEN LAKE

The next passage we shall look at is from a travelogue written by Vikram Seth entitled From Heaven Lake, based on an extraordinarily adventurous journey from China through Tibet and Nepal to New Delhi. It was a hazardous journey no foreigner could have accomplished, least of all an Indian student at a Chinese university, except for a series of fortunate coincidences. With the help of a highly ambiguous travel permit, which was capable of being interpreted in several ways, he was ultimately able to visit his parents, despite the many obstacles he faced on the way. When we examine this chapter from his travel book, we notice that he sees and records what he sees with the keen eye and sensibility of a poet and an accomplished literary craftsman.

5.3.1 Text

The Chaidam Basin

Grassless, treeless, birdless stone and pebble and rock.....

By afternoon we descend into a pastel-coloured basin, also treeless, and with wide horizons; blues of sky and lake and distant ranges, purples and browns of the soil, white clouds, every colour is light, pastel, delicate. A wind is blowing, so it's cool. In winter this place must be desolately cold. I take a few photographs : grassless, treeless, birdless stone and pebble and rock.

We cross the basin, rise gently for a while, and as we reach the point of maximum elevation, see in front of us a breathtaking sight : a vast slope, as far as the eye can see, as if the world itself sloped, a declivity that stretches for perhaps a hundred miles ahead of us; and this plain has ridges rising from its floor, but they are low, short ridges, and well-spaced, so that you can see the plain continue beyond them. The ridges are of pink and slate and purple rock, with cloud-shadows falling on some of them—and the earth to the right is beige and ochre and fawn. On the tops of the north-facing peaks there is a touch of snow. A little later, snow and cloud are joined by a different white, that of stretches of salt undissolved on this arid plain. Then comes a feast of geological transformations : nude dunes, unconnected by sand, completely isolated one from another, then black hills, oily and stony, slowly becoming wrinkled and clay-like; later, lakes of a distant blue, with a band of sparse vegetation in front, and a red strip of soil nearest us, like the uninvented tricolour of an artist's republic. A sole gold mountain glows in the late light; camels graze on a green plain; the combed raked clouds are yellowed with sunset; and finally there is darkness, and a salt lake, and the distant lights of Germu.

The road so far is fairly good, except where it is undergoing repair; there temporary and muddy diversions cause us to jolt and slither. The first section of the road was metalled, and there is a plan to metal the entire Liuyuan-Lhasa route. (The present dirt-road has to be flattened every year after the rainy season.) From time to time we came across the People's Liberation Army engaged in road construction on a good scale, with the help of some machinery but mainly spades. These troops work here for half the year. When the winter winds freeze the land they return to Germu or Xining or Lanzhou, making the region even more isolated than before.

For Sui, the scenery of this unpopulated terrain is only occasionally captivating, as when under some transitory slant of light an unusual gold touches the evening hills. The dunes and plains, the plate basin of the Chaidam, all the permanent features of the landscape, are fixtures along a route he has travelled every month for years. He is inured to their beauty; his pleasures along the road are mainly social; talk, food where good food can be obtained, haggling in the market, visiting friends. There is no radio in his truck, and when he isn't talking he is smoking. He looks his thirty-five years. His face is somewhat full, though he has features sharp for a Han Chinese. His black hair, unkempt despite the comb he often uses, is pushed back from his forehead whenever it obstructs his vision. His teeth, like his fingers, are nicotine-stained. His eyes are wonderfully alert and friendly, except that when he is busy with various errands and preparations, they cloud over with an abstraction almost impossible to pierce until the job is completed.

He has an intuitive practicality. His truck has grown so much a part of him that the occasional repairs he makes are carried out almost unconsciously, as if he were scratching his arm. The truck could be rattling along with fifteen loud mechanical noises merging in counter-point : Sui is unconcerned. A sixteenth, seemingly harmless, joins them : he is instantly alert, pulls the truck over, jumps out of the cabin and prods about the engine, unscrewing caps, checking for oil and water, plugging leaks, joining wires. When he gets back into the cabin and starts up again, the sixteenth noise has disappeared.

This hand rests lightly on the wheel while he drives. When he breaks a chain of cigarettes and needs to light up once more, he passes the cigarette to whoever is sitting next to him. Since the windows of the truck let in a swift current of air at the top and the sides—the rubber strips have disappeared in places—the operation of lighting a match in the moving truck is not easy, and I usually pass it on to Gyanseng. Sui drives, for the most part, gently; this contrasts with the violence of his gear changes. On mountainous stretches he steers with a sensitive adeptness that is enjoyable to watch.

He and Gyanseng get along well. They do not speak much. Gyanseng is a little sick of road travel. Sometimes when we are in a transport yard overnight, Sui tells him to sleep in the truck to guard it. Gyanseng grumbles about the cold and discomfort but complies : it is vital the driver gets a good night's rest. When I try to insist on taking over on alternate nights I am over-ruled. In matters relating to the truck, the driver is dictator.

Unlike almost all Han Chinese I have met (including many educated at university), Sui is not Han-chauvinist. He neither looks down on nor up to the Tibetans. He is not interested in their culture; despite the fact that he has lived in Lhasa for fifteen years he speaks almost no Tibetan. Yet he has a way of treating people as individuals rather than as representatives of types, that precludes any sense of cultural superiority. His friends and acquaintances along the route are Han and Tibetan, though naturally the Tibetans are restricted to those who can speak Chinese. Unlike some of his fellow drivers and army buddies he has not once indicated any dislike of Lhasa or of Tibet or of Tibetans. For him it is not 'New Zealand' but home.

He reads omnivorously: newspapers when he can get them, Ziao San's comic books, novels, short stories in magazines, instruction booklets. 'Poetry', he tells me, 'is pointless. I can never understand what poets are trying to get at—or why they bother to say things the way they do.' He describes his school life during the Cultural Revolution. 'We never studied, never did anything. I was interested in books, but any reading I did, I did without guidance. My sister's a doctor—you'll meet her at Germu—but that sort of thing is completely closed off to me. I am too old now for higher studies. Besides, I don't have the qualifications.'

'Do you regret it?' I ask.

'Yes, sometimes of course. But what's the point? Even if I didn't accept the way things are, what could I do? And this is not a bad life anyway. I'm lucky as such things go. The one problem with the job is that I'm rarely with my family.'

Together with this resignation comes a certain savvy, a street-smartness that enables Sui to find his way about the system, to utilise its flexibilities, to withdraw when effort is useless, to know when and how to bargain, whom to speak with when in trouble, how to get a concession here, a few litres of petrol (when necessary) there. When my luggage fell off the truck he did not spend time thinking about the best course of action; when we realised someone had absconded with it, he looked ahead sufficiently far to ask the identifying witness to come with us to Liuyuan. When, past midnight, we arrived in Dunhuang, he combined argument and pleasantry to get us a room in a yard that we had been told was full. Wherever we are, he looks out for gifts or good bargains for himself and for his friends. He is a generous man. In a sense the hard-bitten side of his nature inspires as much confidence as patent good heartedness.

The landscape is so spectacular that I seem hardly to have noticed our more mundane activities today. We have stopped for oil and water and diesel several times, but haven't eaten anything except lunch at a truck depot (bean-curd, and rice, and a kind of squid-like thing I couldn't identify). I felt like eating some grapes but the egg had got squashed into them in transit. From time to time we stop at a checkpost or fuel station where one or two families have lived in isolation from the rest of humanity for perhaps twenty years.

This Chaidam Basin must be among the loneliest parts of the world. Sui invariably asks the old men who are stationed at such places what they would like him to bring for them the next time he is going through. He sells them a watermelon or two at cost price, or gives them some present he has brought along—a book perhaps, or a pair of shoes. They are always very pleased to see him. Cigarettes are offered all around; Sui must smoke a couple of packs of Da Qian Men a day. We are making good distance today, for the first time. By the time we're at the salt lake, Sui needs another rest, and sleeps for half an hour at the house of one of his endless wayside acquaintances. Before moving on, we fill a few gunny bags with rock salt we shovel out of the surface of the lake; all of us get down to digging and hauling the stuff. A segment of railway track approaches Germu from the east, and we dig for salt beside it. It must be an eerie sight by the light of the moon.

The night is so clear that the sky looks stuffed with stars, busier than I can remember ever having seen it. Gyanseng, who has been quiet all day, starts singing in Tibetan. Xiao San's headache is better and his temper is worse. I continue talking to Sui, who is in a meditative mood.

Sui thinks that young people nowadays are disturbed and selfish, and blames it on the viciousness of the Cultural Revolution, during which they were encouraged to turn against their parents and teachers and everyone in authority, and instead to follow the (prevailing) message of Mao. All decency died during that time, he says, and half the cultural heritage of China—books, temples, works of art—was destroyed. People now care only for themselves. And as for their skills, even their literacy—no-one really studied anything in school, that is, if they went to school at all. All day they had to recite and discuss the quotations of the Chairman as if that was the totality of all knowledge. You should've seen the People's Daily during those days, he says—red headlines across the front page: 'We will endlessly adore the red sun in our lives, Chairman Mao—and who can blame the kids for being influenced by such ever-present propaganda?'

'Was there nothing good in the Cultural Revolution at all?' I ask, 'Some people mention that the only time they got to travel, to see their country, was when they were Red Guards. And they say it cut down on the worst abuses of bureaucracy.'

'Well, I suppose that's true, though I'm not too sure about the bureaucracy.' He does not speak for a while, then goes on. 'Some good things came out of it, as they do out of every disaster. I learned a lot of things about life, and about how people behave: about how far, for instance, you could count on even your best friends to stick by you in times of trouble. Sometimes people wanted to but they didn't dare help. They feared for themselves and for their families'.

Very late, at one o'clock at night, we arrive in Germu. The people at the desk at the Transport Yard are surly; in particular the gatekeeper, who is arrogant and suspicious in the extreme. I am given a bureaucratic run-around when I am so sleepy that I can hardly talk. Finally we are given a room, and the manager appears, apologising in the name of international friendship. It is hardly his fault, and he has been woken up as well. I am asleep within minutes.

At 3.15 comes a knock on the door. I wake up, but ignore it until it becomes too insistent to ignore. 'Who is it?' I ask. 'Police.' Comes the reply. I get out of bed and open the door. A police officer in white uniform and cap looks in at us severely. (By this time Sui too has woken up.) 'Why didn't you open up when I first knocked?' he asks. 'We were asleep,' I say. 'Is anything the matter?'

'Kindly come to the office with me.'

'Can't we do this tomorrow?' I ask plaintively.

'I am afraid not. There are some questions we need to ask you.'

I pull on a sweater and a pair of warm socks, and trying to conquer my sleepiness and conceal my agitation I follow the officer across the yard. In the office the gatekeeper looks at me with the contentment of a spider observing a struggling fly.

'Sit here,' says the officer, indicating a bench opposite a table. I do as I am told.

He looks at the register. 'What is your name?' 'Your Chinese name?'

'Xie Binlang. And yours?' I ask conversationally.

He ignores this. 'What is your unit?'

'Nanjing University.'

'Oh. And do they know you are here in Germu?'

'I very much doubt it.'

'Are you here to do research?'

'No. I am here to . . .'

'Let me ask the questions. You are not here to do research. Are you here for any other special purpose?'

'Special purpose? What do you mean?'

'I mean . . . on a study trip, something your university has sanctioned?'

'No, I'm just travelling.'

savvy:	practical knowledge and ability.

5.3.3 Discussion

The passage focuses on the vast expanses of the Chaidam Basin, which, according to the writer, 'must be among the loneliest parts of the world.' What is striking about this passage is the accurate and concrete details that Vikram Seth presents about this practically forbidden part of the world. Besides, there is the very sympathetically and insightfully sketched character of Sui, the driver of the truck, who became a dependable friend, and saw him through numerous difficult situations and tight corners. Sui's nature is partly revealed in action and the conversations the writer had with him, and also partly through direct statements and comments made by the writer on his appearance, habits, friends, his expertise as a driver, and his quick, easy and frank dealings with acquaintances on the regular route his truck took him. Sui is no ordinary truck driver. He is a thinking, self-reliant, and extremely competent and knowledgeable person. While his sister was a doctor, he was fairly satisfied with his job as a truck driver although this work took him away from his family more often than he would have liked.

Let us in particular, look at the diction of the passage. In the first paragraph, one of the suffixes that recurs is 'less': treeless (twice), grassless, birdless. The words 'isolated', 'barren', 'desolate', 'lonely', are repeated in paragraph after paragraph emphasising the remoteness of the area and the extreme sparseness of the population. At the end of paragraph twelve we are told that in places 'one or two families have lived in isolation from the rest of humanity for perhaps twenty years', which sums up practically all that can be said about the near complete isolation of this region.

The next thing that we notice is the well-knit paragraphs. Each paragraph deals with a well-defined idea, theme, or incident. Almost every paragraph ends with an emphatic statement that acts as a punch-line, summing up what has been said earlier. The beginning of the next paragraph similarly marks a logical and clear development. Take, for example, paragraphs five and six which deal with Sui's practical nature and his skill as a driver. After the short opening sentence of each paragraph we are given concrete details about his 'intuitive practicality' seen in operation. He knew by instinct, as it were, what noises were trivial and could therefore be safely ignored, and what were serious enough to need immediate attention, and he promptly carried out those essential repairs with commendable competence. Similarly, in the next paragraph Sui's expertise as a driver is dealt with in a forthright and convincing manner. Paragraph seven too is organised in an equally effective fashion.

The structure of sentences reveals considerable variety, balance, and rhythm. The author varies his sentences : they differ in length from very short ones to long, intricate ones with parenthetical and objectival and adverbial clauses, which add to, modify and qualify what is being said. Take, for example, paragraph four... 'as when under some transitory slant of light an unusual gold touches the evening hills.' 'There is no radio in his truck, and when he isn't talking, he is smoking.' 'His face is somewhat full, though he has features sharp for a Han Chinese. His black hair, unkempt despite the comb he often uses is pushed back from his forehead whenever it obstructs his vision.' The rhythm indicates the easy, conversational flow of an alert and sympathetic observer of men and things, which makes the writing singularly attractive. A careful reader will hardly fail to note the sensitive use of words and phrases : words tend to occur in groups of two or three, mostly well balanced; e.g. paragraph one. '... every colour is light, pastel, delicate; grassless, treeless, birdless...' paragraph two. '... beige, ochre and fawn; and finally there is darkness, and a salt lake, and the distant lights of Germu'. You can pick out any number of such examples from the passage.

Also note the way the author uses punctuation : parentheses (brackets), commas, semicolons, colons, dashes and full stops. The poet's eye for sound and colour is also in evidence : 'A sole gold mountain glows in the late light; camels graze on a green plain; the combed raked clouds are yellowed with sunset'. The sound patterns enhance the rhythmic effects of the measured, infinitely varied flow of sentences. To avoid the ever present danger of an overzealous lesson writer exhausting everything that can be said on style and preventing the readers from making their own original contributions (which in fact is the primary objective of these lessons) we shall bring the discussion of this passage by Vikram Seth to a close.

5.4 LET US SUM UP

In this unit we have seen that:

- there are several modes of narrations;
- historical narrative is somewhat different from narrative prose in a travelogue;
- unless history is presented in a strikingly and eminently readable narrative form, it does not qualify to be treated as literature, however scholarly and reliable it might be as history;
- what distinguishes the descriptive narrative from mere descriptive prose is the sequence of events that marks the descriptions;
- the effective use of imagery, diction and punctuation enhance the effectiveness of the narration.

5.5 ANSWERS TO EXERCISES

Check Your Progress I

- 1) If you have any difficulty, read the text again.
- 2) For example in Para 9 — Mamelukes are described in ‘their gorgeous robes like great tropical flowers’.

Check Your Progress II

- 1) Seth builds up the atmosphere by the use of the following devices:
 - i) use of time–progressive unfolding
 - ii) emphasises a negative feature; establishes the exact features of the place
 - iii) detailed description, details are selected with great care
 - iv) informal style
 - v) recurring use of words like isolate, lonely etc.

6.0 OBJECTIVES

In this unit, we shall examine the various kinds of narrative methods employed by writers to suit different purposes. We shall also look at the significance of the point of view in the narrative. It is important not only to follow the narration but also to see the shifts, if any, in the point of view and the implications of such changes for telling the story.

At the end of this unit, you will be able to:

- identify different kinds of narrative methods;
- appreciate the significance of the point of view in narration;
- explain the difference between a multiple point of view and an autobiographical point of view in narration.

6.1 INTRODUCTION

In this unit, you shall read two more passages of narrative prose. The first is an excerpt from Ernest Hemingway's short story 'The Short Happy Life of Francis Macomber.' The second passage is from Wole Soyinka's autobiography Ake. You will notice how these two writers employ different methods of narration.

You will find that the writer, for his own reasons, chooses to present the narrative either directly from the point of view of the narrator who may or may not be identifiable as a character created for the purpose of that particular universe of fiction. Some characters may earn a right to present their point of view, while other characters are hardly given a chance to present theirs. This happens in the case of characters who are often minor and are not developed 'in the round' as it were. In some types of narrative, as in an autobiography, the central character and the point of view are hardly ever matters of choice. We shall look at both types in this unit.

We hope you will enjoy reading the passages. Do attempt the exercises that follow each section.

6.2 PASSAGE FROM HEMINGWAY'S 'THE SHORT HAPPY LIFE OF FRANCIS MACOMBER'

You shall now read an excerpt from a short story 'The Short Happy Life of Francis Macomber' by Ernest Hemingway, a well-known American writer. Set in Africa, it describes a typical safari (hunting expedition) for visiting big-game hunters. Wilson is the professional hunter who has organised the safari for the benefit of Macomber and his wife, Margot.

Now read the passage slowly and carefully three or four times and try to understand the words and phrases in the context in which they occur. The glossary at the end of the passage will help you with some of the difficult words.

6.2.1 Text

Wilson stood up and puffing on his pipe strolled away, speaking a few words in Swahili to one of the gun-bearers who was standing waiting for him. Macomber and his wife sat on at the table. He was staring at his coffee cup.

"If you make a scene I'll leave you, darling," Margot said quietly.

"No, you won't."

"You can try it and see."

"No," she said. "I won't leave you and you'll behave yourself."

"Behave myself? That's a way to talk. Behave myself."

"Yes. Behave yourself."

"Why don't you try behaving?"

"I've tried it so long. So very long."

"I hate that red-faced swine," Macomber said. "I loathe the sight of him."

"He's really very nice."

"Oh, shut up," Macomber almost shouted. Just then the car came up and stopped in front of the dining tent and the driver and the two gun-bearers got out. Wilson walked over and looked at the husband and wife sitting there at the table.

"Going shooting?" he asked.

"Yes," said Macomber, standing up. "Yes."

"Better bring a woolly. It will be cool in the car." Wilson said.

"I'll get my leather jacket." Margot said.

"The boy has it," Wilson told her. He climbed into the front with the driver and Francis Macomber and his wife sat, not speaking, in the back seat.

Hope the silly beggar doesn't take a notion to blow the back of my head off, Wilson thought to himself. Women are a nuisance on safari.

The car was grinding down to cross the river at a pebbly ford in the gray daylight and then climbed, angling up the steep bank, where Wilson had ordered a way shovelled out the day before so they could reach the parklike wooded rolling country on the far side.

It was a good morning, Wilson thought. There was heavy dew and as the wheels went through the grass and low bushes he could smell the odour of the crushed fronds. It was an odour like verbena and he liked this early morning smell of the dew, the crushed bracken and the look of the tree trunks showing black through the early morning mist, as the car made its way through the untracked, parklike country. He had put the two in the back seat out of his mind now and was thinking about buffalo. The buffalo that he was after stayed in the daytime in a thick swamp where it was impossible to get a shot, but in the night they fed out into an open stretch of country and if he could come between them and their swamp with the car, Macomber would have a good chance at them in the open. He did not want to hunt buff with Macomber in thick cover. He did not want to hunt buff or anything else with Macomber at all, but he was a professional hunter and he had hunted with some rare ones in his time. If they got buff today there would only be rhino to come and the poor man would have gone through his dangerous game and things might pick up. He'd have nothing more to do with the woman and Macomber would get over that too. He must have gone through plenty of that before by the look of things. Poor beggar. He must have a way of getting over it. Well, it was the poor sod's own bloody fault.

He, Robert Wilson, carried a double size cot on safari to accommodate any windfalls he might receive. He had hunted for a certain clientele, the international, fast, sporting set, where the women did not feel they were getting their money's worth unless they had shared that cot with the white hunter. He despised them when he was away from them although he liked some of them well enough at the time, but he made his living by them: and their standards were his standards as long as they were hiring him.

They were his standards in all except the shooting. He had his own standards about the killing and they could live up to them or get some one else to hunt them. He knew, too, that they all respected him for this. This Macomber was an odd one though. Damned if he wasn't. Now the wife. Well, the wife. Yes, the wife, hm, the wife. Well, he'd dropped all that. He looked around at them. Macomber sat grim and furious. Margot smiled at him. She looked younger today, more innocent and fresher and not so professionally beautiful. What's in her heart God knows, Wilson thought. She hadn't talked much last night. At that it was a pleasure to see her.

The motor car climbed up a slight rise and went on through the trees and then out into a grassy prairie-like opening and kept in the shelter of the tress along the edge, the driver going slowly and Wilson looking carefully out across the prairie and all along its far side. He stopped the car and studied the opening with his field glass. Then he motioned to the driver to go on and the car moved slowly along, the driver avoiding wart-hog holes and driving around the mud castles ants had built. Then, looking across the opening. Wilson suddenly turned and said.

"By God, there they are!"

And looking where he pointed, while the car jumped forward and Wilson spoke in rapid Swahili to the driver, Macomber saw three huge, black animals looking almost cylindrical in their long heaviness, like big black tank cars, moving at a gallop across the far edge of the open prairie. They moved at a stiff-necked, stiff-bodied gallop and he could see the upswept wide black horns on their heads as they galloped heads out; the heads not moving.

"They're three old bulls," Wilson said. "We'll cut them off before they get to the swamp."

The car was going a wild forty-five miles an hour across the open and as Macomber watched, the buffalo got bigger and bigger until he could see the gray hairless, scabby look of one huge bull and how his neck was a part of his shoulders and the shiny black of his horns as he galloped a little behind the others that were strung out in that steady plunging gait; and then the car swaying as though it had just jumped a road, they drew up close and he could see the plunging hugeness of the bull, and the dust in his sparsely haired hide, the wide boss of horn and his outstretched, wide-nostrilled muzzle, and he was raising his rifle when Wilson shouted, "Not from the car, you fool!" and he had no fear, only hatred of Wilson, while the brakes clamped on and the car skidded, plowing sideways to an almost stop and Wilson was out on one side and he on the other, stumbling as his feet hit the still speeding-by earth, and then he was shooting at the bull as he moved away, hearing the bullets whunk into him, emptying his rifle at him as he moved steadily away, finally remembering to get his shots forward into the shoulder, and as he fumbled to reload, he saw the bull was down. Down on his knees, his big head tossing, and seeing the other two still galloping he shot at the leader and hit him. He shot again and missed and he heard the carawonging roar as Wilson shot and saw the leading bull slide forward onto his nose.

But the other bull was moving steadily at the same gallop and he missed, throwing a spout of dirt, and Wilson missed and the dust rose in a cloud and Wilson shouted, “Come on. He's too far!” and grabbed his arm and they were in the car again. Macomber and Wilson hanging on the sides and rocketing swayingly over the uneven ground, drawing up on the steady, plunging, heavy-necked, straight-moving gallop of the bull.

They were behind him and Macomber was filling his rifle, dropping shells onto the ground, jamming it, clearing the jam, then they were almost up with the bull when Wilson yelled “Stop,” and the car skidded so that it almost swung over and Macomber fell forward onto his feet, slammed his bolt forward and fired as far forward as he could aim into the galloping, rounded black back, aimed and shot again, then again, and the bullets, all of them hitting, the roar deafening him, and he could see the bull stagger. Macomber shot again, aiming carefully, and down he came, onto his knees.

“All right,” Wilson said. “Nice work. That's the three.”

Macomber felt a drunken elation.

“How many times did you shoot?” he asked.

“Just three,” Wilson said. “You killed the first bull. The biggest one. I helped you finish the other two. Afraid they might have got into cover. You had them killed. I was just mopping up a little. You shot damn well.”

“Let's go to the car,” said Macomber. “I want a drink.”

“Got to finish off that buff first,” Wilson told him. The buffalo was on his knees and he jerked his head furiously and bellowed in pig-eyed, roaring rage as they came toward him.

“Watch he doesn't get up,” Wilson said. Then “Get a little broadside and take him in the neck just behind the ear.”

Macomber aimed carefully at the centre of the huge, jerking, rage-driven neck and shot. At the shot the head dropped forward.

“That does it,” said Wilson. “Got the spine. They're hell of a looking thing, aren't they?”

“Let's get the drink,” said Macomber. In his life he had never felt so good.

In the car Macomber's wife sat very white faced. “You were marvellous, darling,” she said to Macomber. “What a ride.”

6.2.3 Discussion

The extract begins at the point the husband and wife quarrel bitterly over Margot's act of unfaithfulness. She had quietly slipped into Wilson's large bed the previous night, and Macomber had obviously got wind of it; but Margot turns the tables on him by insisting that he should ignore the incident otherwise she would leave him. Macomber succumbs sheepishly realising that she was the stronger of the two.

This part of the narrative is apparently from the author's/the assumed central observer's point of view. Then the point of view shifts to Wilson. One of the things to be noted about this narrative is that some of the events are presented in the form of dialogues or conversations between the characters, while others are reported. Some of the thoughts and reactions of the characters, mainly Wilson's and Macomber's, are also reported from the authorial angle without comments or any kind of involvement.

However, Wilson's point of view is more extensively and intimately presented, while Macomber's private thoughts are only indicated in passing, Macomber's humiliation at the hands of Margot is hardly reflected in the narrative. It is through Wilson's reported thoughts that we learn about Macomber's unenviable plight.

Wilson is, as a professional hunter, extremely competent in dealing with the safari; he had planned every move, provided for every contingency. The lives of his hosts were secure in his hands and he was prepared for any crisis that might develop. He also took his pleasures as they came, without any serious moral scruples. But he respected the rules of the game, and earned the admiration of his clients, while giving them complete satisfaction by his expert knowledge of animals and of the hazards that had to be faced. Wilson was able to locate the best game, prepared the ground well, and made those who hired him feel that they had their money's worth.

The hunt is narrated partly in the form of dialogues, and partly by recreating the exhilaration of participating in the action that followed. The narrative is made dramatic with the help of some of the cinematographic effects like close-up and recording the rapid breathless succession of events. The narrative manages to capture the immediacy of the events that quickly follow each other, as though flashed on the screen. The steady gallop of the bulls; the

I felt rather uplifted as I marched away from the Grammar School. I was going there, that was settled.

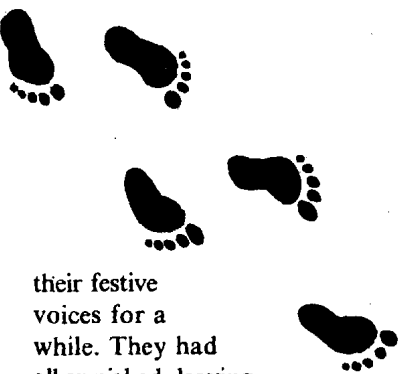

But I also discovered that I liked the Kutis. Schooling under Daodu promised to be an adventure. This light-headed feeling helped me up the road towards Ibara which was so steep that my legs, for the first time, gave a hint of tiring. I had begun to think that I would have to sit down beside the road and rest when we came to yet another compound with neat rows of houses, small hut-like houses which were however built with concrete and roofed with iron sheets. The Sergeant at the top of the column barked out an order and the band wheeled into the compound and entered. They marched straight towards the longest of these buildings, on to the grounds in front of it and re-grouped themselves to different orders from the Sergeant. They were still in two lines, but now they stood shoulder to shoulder and marked time on one spot. I kept the same distance from them as I was when they began to line the grounds, indeed, I had slowed down when they entered the compound so that I was not really far from the gate. An order was given, the music stopped with a final drum-roll and a violent clash of cymbals. The air was very still.

And then I made a discovery. I was alone. The ragged, motley group of children who had followed, clowning, mimicking, even calling out orders had fallen off one by one.

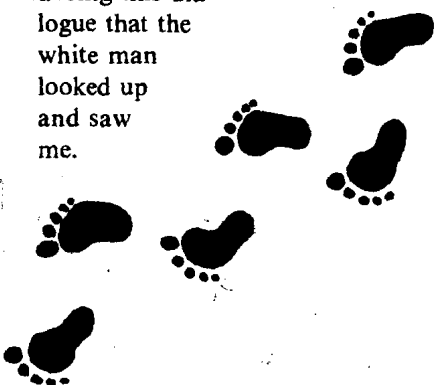

It occurred to me now that I had seen no one nor heard any of their festive voices for a while. They had all vanished, leaving no one but me. And then I made another discovery. In a matter of fact way, I realized that I did not know where I was.

The Sergeant spun round on his heels barked out some sentences in a very strange language to somebody hidden within the building. That person now came out, smartly uniformed. The first thing that struck me about him was that he was albino. Then the next moment I realized that he was not an albino at all but a white man. Also that, unlike the marching policemen, he wore shoes. He was dressed simply in khaki, so I knew that he was also a policeman. His appearance however bore very little resemblance to that of the band. He stood on the steps of his office while the Sergeant called out yet another order which made the lines stiffen up. Another was called and they appeared to relax. The Sergeant then continued in the same language within which I succeeded in catching a few English words and name-places. He appeared to be 'reporting' something, the 'Oba's palace' was involved in it, and it all ended with 'all correct' and 'further orders'. The white man spoke a few words. The Sergeant gave two more barks and the parade broke up and went their different ways, all except the Sergeant. He stayed with the white officer and they spoke some more; it was during this dialogue that the white man looked up and saw me.

I was tired, I was sure of that now. The thought of running away at once when the man looked up, saw me, pointed and said something to the Sergeant therefore remained just a thought. I had no idea in which direction to run. The Sergeant also looked up, turned and began to march towards me. I probably would have run then, tiredness and all, but the white officer restrained him and came forward himself, the Sergeant following close. Instinctively I backed one step towards the gate, but the man smiled, held out both hands in a gesture I did not quite understand, and approached. When he had come quite close, he bent down and, using the most unlikely accent I had ever heard asked,

I knew the words were supposed to be in my own language but they made no sense to me, so I looked at the Sergeant helplessly and said.

“I don't understand. What is he saying?”

The officer's eyes opened wide. “Oh, you speak English.”

I nodded.

“Good. That is venhrry clenver. I was asking, what do you want? What can I doon for you?”

“I want to go home.”

He exchanged looks with the Sergeant. “Well, that seems vum-vum-vum. And where is home?”

I could not understand why he should choose to speak through his nose. It made it difficult to understand him all the time but by straining hard, I could make sense of his questions. I told him that I lived in Ake.

“It has a big church.” I added, “just outside our walls.”

“Ah-ah, near the church. Tell me, Whaznname?” I guessed that he was asking what my name was, so I told him. “My name is Wole.”

“Wonlay. Good. And your father's name?”

“My father's name is Headmaster.”

“What?”

“My father's name is Headmaster. Sometimes his name is Essay.”

For some reason this amused him immensely, which I found offensive. There was no reason why my father's names should be the cause for such laughter. But the Sergeant had reacted differently. His eyes nearly popped out of his head. I noticed then that he was very different from the grown-ups whom I had seen around. He had long marks on his face, quite different from the usual

* literally: what do you want there?

kind we encountered in Ake. And when he spoke, his voice sounded like that of the Hausa traders who brought wares to our house for bartering with old clothes and strange assortments of items. It was a strange procedure, one which made little sense to me. They spread their wares in front of the house and I had to be prised off them. There were brass figures, horses, camels, trays, bowls, ornaments. Human figures spun on a podium, balanced by weights at the end of curved light metal rods. We spun them round and round, yet they never fell off their narrow perch. The smell of fresh leather filled the house as pouffes, handbags, slippers and worked scabbards were unpacked. There were bottles encased in leather, with leather stoppers, amulets on leather thongs, scrolls, glass beads, bottles of scent with exotic names—I never forgot, from the first moment I read it on the label—Bint el Sudan, with its picture of a turbaned warrior by a kneeling camel. A veiled maiden offered him a bowl of fruits. They looked unlike anything in the Orchard and Essay said they were called dates. I did not believe him: dates were the figures which appeared on a calendar on the wall, so I took it as one of his jokes.

Once or twice my father tried to offer money but the trader proved difficult. “No, I can like to take changey-changey.” Out came old shirts, trousers, discarded jackets with holes under the armpit, yet Changey-changey—as we now called him—actually received these clothing derelicts in return for his genuine “morocco” leather. “Look am master, a no be lie. Look, genuine morocco leather.” E fit you big man like you must have leather brief-case for carry file. “Ebe genuine. Put am one more shirt. Or torosa.”

Their voices were so similar that they could only be brothers. I was even more convinced of it when I heard him say, “If na headmaster of Ake be in father, I sabbe the place. But what, im doing here?”

They both turned to me. I had no answer to the question. Then the white man asked. “Are you lost?”

“I followed the band.” I replied.

The officer nodded sagely, as if everything had fallen in place. He turned to the Sergeant and asked him to get his bicycle. The man saluted and went off. Something continued to puzzle the officer however. He put his hand on my shoulder and guided me towards the office.

“How old are you?”

“I am four years and a half.”

He let out a loud “What!”, stopped, and looked at me again. “Are you sure?” I nodded. He looked at me more closely, said, “Yes, of course. Of course. And you walked from Ake? Where did you start from?”

“At the cenotaph. There were other children, but they left me.”

We reached his office and he lifted me on to a chair. “Are you thirsty?” already producing a bottle of orange squash. There was a jar of water on the table and he mixed me a drink in a glass. I drank it to the last drop.

“Do you want another glass?” He did not wait for a reply before mixing another and handing it to me. It followed its predecessor just as rapidly. I began to feel better. I looked round the office for the first time, stretched my legs and took an interest in the papers on the table. I recognized a journal on it which came every week to my father. I looked at the man with greater interest.

“You are reading my father’s paper”.

He looked startled. “Which one?”

“That one. In Leisure Hours.”

“Really! You say it’s your father’s paper?”

“Yes. He has a new one every week.”

He opened it rapidly, looking for something on its pages. “You mean he is the editor?”

I could not understand him. I repeated, “He has it every week.”

And then the man grinned and nodded. “I see, I see.”

I was feeling drowsy. The Sergeant arrived with his bicycle. Half-awake, I felt myself lifted on to the cross-bar and the bumpy ride began. I barely sensed the arrival back home, hands lifting me up, passing me to other arms. My head appeared to weigh a ton when I tried to come awake and respond to the babble of voices I heard around me. I felt the immense expanse of the bed in mother's bedroom coming up to meet me, the room easily recognized by the smell of *ori and camphor. Then I dropped into oblivion.

I woke up in a hazy semi-darkness. A short while later, I realized where I was. I also felt a huge pit in my stomach and climbed down from the bed, heading for the kitchen to see what hour of meal it was. When I opened the door, a wave of human voices engulfed me. The entire front room was crowded with grown-ups and they all seemed to be speaking with excitement. So I turned and walked towards the sound. As I came through the parlour I pushed open the curtain in the intervening door and suddenly everything went silent. A hundred pairs of eyes were turned on me, and I wondered what the matter was. In the silence I spoke out the only thing on my mind:

Mouths opened wide. Then the silence was broken by the bookseller’s wife. She struck her palms together in a gesture of amazement and exclaimed. “E-ch! Omo nla! Did you hear him? He is hungry.”

A babble of voices ensued, mostly echoing the bookseller’s wife. I could not understand that there should be such excitement over the fact of my hunger. It looked like evening in any case, and I had not eaten all day. Then I heard my father’s voice cutting in, and he appeared to be smiling.

“Well, it seems only natural that he should be hungry. Wouldn't you be, after a walk from Ake to Ibara?”

6.3.3 Discussion

The narrative is autobiographical and therefore has only a single point of view. This, of course, does not prevent the same person, the author, from having more than one point of view, as a child for example, and later as an adult, when he is in a better position to look back and see things and events in a different perspective. The episode, however, is told consistently through the eyes of the protagonist. There are no knowing winks and wise asides from the adult author and this is probably why the authenticity of the narrative is so well-preserved. Everything is narrated from a simple, consistent point of view, which is that of a boy about four years old. The humour, the drama and the kindly dramatic irony are genuine and carefully controlled, without the narrative lapsing into sentiment or vague generalities. Wole was, if anything, precocious and knowledgeable beyond his years, but the basic innocence of childhood was very much present in all his thinking, actions and reactions.

Wole happened to hear the band playing outside his home and slipped out of the gate and joined the procession without anyone noticing him. The band consisted of policemen who were on a routine march from Ake to Ibara. The music so appealed to Wole that he hardly realised that he was being carried away by it, with frequent stops at various street corners. Wole got his first opportunity to see the outside world with shops displaying wares of every kind, the markets with their strangely attractive and bewildering merchandise, and the endless groups of curious and excited children who accompanied the procession for some distance and fell off as it moved forward. It attracted large crowds, but it was never the same crowd that was with the band all along, which little Wole failed to notice until it was too late. This was the first occasion that he was allowed outside, unescorted. The passage begins at the point the band finally arrives in Ibara, leaving Wole totally exhausted, and with the realisation that he was hopelessly lost.

Luckily for Wole, events took an unexpected turn. The British Officer felt concerned to see the child looking tired and lost. Although in the beginning he was a little frightened, Wole's self-possession did not desert him. His confidence and his knowledge of English greatly impressed the officer, who, realising what had happened, gave him some orange squash and had him sent back home safely on the Sergeant's bicycle.

Fortunately the Sergeant who belonged to the Hausa tribe, remembered the headmaster and his household in Ake where he himself probably lived with his brother, who was a petty trader. Wole recalled how fascinated he was by the leather goods and brassware that the Hausa traders brought to his house and bartered in exchange for old clothes, refusing to accept money. This part of the narrative is set further back in time, as a narrative within a narrative.

Some of the humour in the passage is provided by Wole's own innocence. His father, addressed HM or Headmaster by practically everyone, was also known by his initials, S.A., which Wole interpreted to mean Essay, which he thought was particularly appropriate because of his father's formal manner and fastidious ways and cultivated handwriting. Wole claimed that the journal that he saw on the officer's table was his father's. Similarly, he was quite dogmatic that 'dates' could only mean the dates in a calendar, and he believed that his father was joking when he called a variety of fruit "dates". At the conclusion of the adventure, the entire household wondered how Wole had managed to walk the entire distance from Ake to Ibara. It was an extraordinary achievement, but Wole saw it in terms of how hungry he was and was mainly interested in what he was being given to eat. The narrative is full of such instances which are related in a matter-of-fact way. This makes for the delightful humorous effects that we experienced, as we read the passage.

Check Your Progress II

- i) How does the writer suggest that the four-year old boy was able to walk the distance that would normally have been considered impossible for such a young child, without clearly stating it in Wole's own words? The small child has walked an incredible distance. How then is this suggested in the narrative?

6.4 LET US SUM UP

In this unit, we have seen how :

- the narrative is handled from different points of view;
- syntax captures the rapidity and breathless excitement of pursuit;
- in autobiography the point of view of the narrative is that of the protagonist but the authenticity of the experience is preserved by maintaining a strict artistic detachment.

6.5 ANSWERS TO EXERCISES

Check Your Progress I

- i) You will notice that Margot's role is very minor and is largely passive as far as the story is concerned. She has a role only in relation to Macomber and Wilson.

- ii) Wilson is a more professional and experienced hunter, while Macomber is obviously an amateur. However, the actual hunt is described and the excitement of the hunt is captured by presenting it through the eyes of Macomber.

Check Your Progress II

- i) The writer makes no direct statement about the child's having walked an incredible distance. This is conveyed by the reactions of the elders and especially that of his father. If you turn to the end of the passage, you will notice expressions such as 'a hundred pairs of eyes', and 'mouths opened wide'. It is the use of such expressions that conveys the impression indirectly.

7.0 OBJECTIVES

In this unit you will read two more interesting selections of narrative prose. After reading this unit carefully, you will be able to:

- identify unusual and very individual styles of narration;
- explain how the point of view determines the manner of narration;
- list the features of a type of narrative that performs a dual function.

7.1 INTRODUCTION

This unit presents two samples of individualised narrative. As we shall see, the shape and stylistic features of the narrative might be representative of an individual as well as a whole culture or way of life. The narrative's point of view determines not only the content of the narration but also the manner. In other words, the artistic design may make the narrative style in some respects unique and complex, making it more challenging and demanding than a straightforward objective kind of reporting. Such narratives are a feature of contemporary literature and it is important that readers develop the sensitivity to be able to respond to such artistic challenges.

7.2 PASSAGE FROM A. K. RAMANUJAN'S FOLK TALE "IN SEARCH OF A DREAM"

This first specimen is a folktale originally told in Santhali language. Santhals are tribals who inhabit remote regions of Jharkhand and Bengal and who till recently did not have a script or a written literature. Most folk tales, no matter which part of the world they are from, belong to a primarily oral culture. Santhali is perhaps one of the few languages in which you can still find a living, extant oral style of story telling being narrated or sung. A. K.

Ramanujan as a poet, translator and scholar was deeply interested in indigenous forms of literature and as an anthropologist had a vast repertoire of folk tales collected from all over India. These, whether found in written form or as parts of a practising living culture, have been translated and documented his collection of folk-tales and subject of much critical discussion in his essays on the subject. The features and narrative characteristics of oral storytelling are vastly different from a literary rendering. This is because the context of oral stories is not mediated through the page. A novel or a story in its written form can be read in the luxury of solitary association, earmarked, pondered over, reread or gone back to. But live storytelling is both narration and performance with a keen live audience absorbing all relevant elements of the story which would be lost if the audience is not alert enough. Read the following story imaginatively, entering not just the fictive world of the story but the absent world of the performance of this story in a Santhali tribal village, to understand the true context of the story.

A raja had no children by his first wife. So he married a second wife, who bore him two sons, and they were all very happy that the raja now had two heirs. But as it often happens, after the two sons had been born, the elder queen also gave birth to a son. This led to endless quarrels, for the younger queen had counted on her sons succeeding to the kingdom, but now feared that the raja might prefer the son of his elder queen. She used all her wiles to persuade him to send away the elder queen and her son. The raja listened to her, gave the first wife a separate estate and house, and sent her away.

One night the raja had a dream, the meaning of which he could not understand. He dreamed that he saw a golden leopard and a golden snake and a golden monkey dancing together. The raja could not rest till he had found out the meaning of the dream, so he sent for his younger wife and her two sons and consulted them. They could give him no explanation, but the younger son said that he had a feeling that his half-brother, the son of the elder queen, could interpret the dream. So that son was sent for, and when he heard the story of the dream, he said, "This is the interpretation: The three golden animals represent the three brothers, for we are like gold to you. God has sent you this dream so that we may not fight hereafter. We cannot all three succeed to the kingdom, and we shall surely fight if one is chosen as the heir. The dream means to say that whichever of us can find a golden leopard, a golden snake, and a golden monkey and make them dance together before the people, he shall be your principal son and shall be your heir." The raja was pleased with this interpretation and told his three sons that he would give the kingdom to the one who could find the three animals by the same day of the coming year.

The sons of the younger queen went away and thought about it, and decided it was useless for them even to try to find those dream animals. Even if they got a goldsmith to make the animals, they would never be able to make them dance.

But the son of the elder queen went to his mother and told her all that had happened, and she told him not to lose heart and he would find the animals. If he went to a gosain, a Vaishnava ascetic who lived in the jungle, he would find out what to do.

So the raja's son set out, and after traveling for some days found himself in a dense jungle when it was nightfall. Wandering about, he at last saw a fire burning in the distance. So he went to it, sat down by it, and began to smoke. Now, the gosain was sleeping nearby. The smell of the smoke woke him up, and he rose and asked who was there.

"Uncle, it's me, your nephew."

"Really, is it you, my nephew? Where have you come from so late at night?"

"From home, Uncle."

"What made you remember me now? You have never visited me before. I'm afraid something has happened."

"Oh, really nothing terrible. I've come to you because my mother tells me that you can help me find the golden leopard and the golden snake and the golden monkey."

At this the gosain promised to help the raja's son to find the animals, and then put a cooking pot on the fire to boil. In it he put only three grains of rice, but when it was cooked they found that they had enough for two meals. When they had eaten, the gosain said, "Nephew, I cannot really tell you what you have to do. But farther on in the jungle lives my younger brother. Go to him and he will tell you."

So the next morning the raja's son set out, and in two days reached the second gosain and told him what he wanted. This gosain listened to his story and also put a cooking pot on to boil, and in it he threw just two grains of rice. When it was cooked, there was enough for both of them. After the meal, the gosain said that he could not tell him where the animals could be found, but that his younger brother would know. So the next morning the raja's son continued his journey, and in two days he came to the third gosain and there he learned what was to be done. This gosain also put a pot on to boil, but in the pot he put only one grain of rice. Yet, when he cooked, it was enough for a meal for both of them.

In the morning, the gosain told the raja's son to go to a blacksmith and have a shield made of twelve mounds of iron, with an edge so sharp that a leaf falling on it would cut in two. So he went to the blacksmith and had the shield made, and took it to the gosain. The gosain said that first they must test it, and set it edgewise under a tree and told the raja's son to climb the tree and shake some leaves down. The raja's son climbed the tree and shook the branches, and not a leaf fell. Then the gosain climbed the tree and gave the tree the gentlest of shakes, and the leaves fell in showers and every leaf that touched the edge of the shield was cut into two. The gosain was satisfied that the shield was made exactly as he wanted it.

Then the gosain told the raja's son that farther on in the jungle he would find a pair of snakes living in a bamboo house, and that they had a daughter whom they never allowed to come out of the house. He must fix the sharp shield in the doorway of the house and hide himself in a tree. When the snakes come out, they would be cut into pieces. Then he should go to the daughter, and she would show him where to find the golden animals. So the raja's son set out and at about noon came to the house of the snakes, he set the shield in the doorway as the gosain had told him. That evening when the snakes tried to come out of their house, they were cut to pieces. A little later, when the daughter peeped out to see what had happened to her parents, the prince saw her. She was not a snake, but a very beautiful woman. He quickly went to her, and began to talk, and it did not take long for them to fall in love. He consoled her, and the snake maiden soon forgot her sorrow over her parents' death. She and the raja's son lived together in the bamboo house for many days.

The snake maiden had strictly forbidden him to go anywhere to the west or south of the house. But one day the raja's son disobeyed her and wandered away to the west. After going a short distance, he saw golden leopards dancing, and as soon as he set eyes on them, he himself was changed into a golden leopard and began to dance with them. The snake maiden soon knew what had happened, and she led him back and restored him back to his own shape.

A few days later, the raja's son went towards the south, and there he found golden snakes dancing at the edge of a tank. As soon as he saw them, he was changed into a golden snake and joined the dance. Again the snake maiden fetched him and restored him to his own shape. But again the raja's son went out, this time to the southwest, and there he saw the golden monkeys dancing together under a banyan tree. When he laid eyes on them, he too became a golden monkey. Again the snake maiden brought him back and restored him to human shape.

After this the raja's son said that it was time for him to go back home. The snake maiden asked him why he had come there at all, and he told her all about the raja's dream. Now that he had found the golden animals, he could go home.

"What about me?" cried the snake maiden. "Kill me first. You have killed my parents and I cannot live here alone."

"No, I will not kill you. I'll take you home with me," said the raja's son, which delighted the snake maiden. Then the raja's son asked how he could take the golden animals with him. So far he had only seen them. The snake maiden said that if he faithfully promised never to desert her nor take another wife, she would produce the animals for him when the time came. So he swore he would never leave her, and they set out for his home.

When they reached the place where the third gosain lived, the raja's son said he had promised to visit him on his way home and show him the golden animals. Now he did not know what to do because he did not have the animals with him. Then the snake maiden tied three knots in his upper cloth and told him to untie them when the gosain asked to see the animals. So the raja's son went to see the gosain, and the gosain asked whether he had brought the golden leopard and snake and monkey.

"I'm not sure," answered the raja's son, "but I've something tied up in my cloth." But when he untied the three knots, he found in them a clod of earth, a potsherd, and a piece of charcoal. He threw them away in disgust, and went back to the maiden and asked her why she had put such worthless rubbish in his cloth.

"You had no faith," said she. "If you had believed, the animals would not have turned into the clod and the potsherd and the charcoal."

So they moved on till they came to the second gosain, who also asked to see the golden animals. This time, the raja's son set his mind hard to believe, and when he untied the knots, there appeared a golden leopard, a golden snake, and a golden monkey. Then they went and showed the animals to the third gosain, and finally went to his mother's house.

When the appointed day came, the raja's son sent word to his father to have a number of booths and shelters erected on a large field, and to have a covered way made from his mother's house to the field. Then he would show the dancing animals. So the raja gave the necessary orders, and on the day fixed for the event people gathered to see the fun. Then the raja's son brought the three animals to the field, and his wife hid herself in the covered way and caused the animals to dance. The people stayed watching all day till evening and reluctantly went home. That night all the booths and shelters turned into houses of gold. When he saw this, the raja left his younger wife and her children and went to live with his first wife.

And the raja's son married the snake maiden, inherited the kingdom, and ruled it justly and happily.

7.2.2 Discussion

The story above follows a very predictable and yet incredible storyline like many other fairy or folk tales that you may have read. A virtuous heir has his rightful position usurped by elements that disturb the balance of justice in the kingdom but only temporarily so. An opportunity arises that gives the rightful heir a chance to win back the position due to him by unquestionable laws of natural inheritance. He does that displaying ingenuity, discrimination, tact and even cunning when necessary, all qualities that are required in an heir incumbent. The story weaves in it not only elements that address social and ethical anxieties about having the rightful Prince rule the throne, it also has elements of a classic quest romance culminating in the hero's marriage to a faithful maiden who also becomes a prime accessory in leading him to the final destination in his trial. It has supernatural elements and those that belong to liminal, subjective levels of human experience like dreams, death, mourning, animal transmogrification, magic etc. But let us leave the thematic elements of the story and look at the structural elements. How is the story different from those that are written and read in a fully literate culture, in terms of narrative aspects like plot progression, characterization etc.?

Well, the very first thing to realize is the fact that oral cultures are fundamentally different from written literature, because in oral cultures there are no permanent texts. There are only stories which are told in various situations, to different audiences according to the varying memory of the speaker who partly remembers and partly improvises the story. The various structural elements of such a tale are directed towards ready recollection and immediate effect. This accounts for the formulaic elements of the tale which function as the grooves on which the story moves steadily with sudden spurts of innovation thrown in to keep interest alive. Characters and situations are portrayed in broad, readily identifiable strokes for the pattern of continuity to be maintained, which is to say that unlike a novel where a character is more effectively rendered in the detail that makes them unique, in a tale it is the representative qualities or the typicality of the character that are important.

There is no physical description of any character, but we are to assume that the prince was tall and handsome as princes are supposed to be. The dialogue is unimpeded by any function of revealing the character, and characters are unambiguously flat. For example if you were asked to come up with a character portrayal of the snake-maiden in the story (the character perhaps most difficult to understand owing to her non-human, mysterious qualities) you wouldn't find much in the story to substantiate whatever your views are.

Folk tales also have patterns of repetition which again aid both the speaker and the listener as tools to remember the tale by. In the above story you must have noticed how each event takes place thrice before the expected result is arrived at. The successive stages of the prince's journey on his quest are punctuated by meeting a gosain, a Vaisnavite holy man, at each step. There are mysterious, inexplicable patterns of intensification and reduction at each step. The power of producing a hearty meal with lessening number of grains of rice suggests the escalating spiritual wisdom of each successive gosain. It functions narratively to suggest that the prince is moving deeper into the forest and closer towards the end of his quest. It also suggests the increasingly difficult obstacles set to him in his trial, each one more difficult than the preceding. Similarly while living with the snake maiden, the prince transmogrifies thrice into each of the golden animals that he has to produce as an end result of his test, and additionally pass the final test of faith to succeed. The effect is incantatory and participative. One can easily imagine the empathy that such a narrative device can accomplish with the gradual heightening of suspense. Such stylistic devices encourage a collective, participatory response rather than individual, critical responses, which solidify the sense of a community by re-asserting through the story some of the common values that the community cherishes. Therefore we understand that the dynamics operating through narrative construction are quite different in a folk tale than in more complex, literate forms of storytelling.

The next passage we shall take up for close study is an extract from William Golding's novel The Inheritors. The Inheritors is a 'difficult' novel in the sense that it attempts to capture the mental as well as the physical life of our primitive ancestor, the Neanderthal man, who was the immediate predecessor of homo sapiens from whom present-day humanity is descended. Golding recreates the history of 'the people' who were doomed to extinction by the very fact that the 'new people' were more intelligent and civilised; they wore clothes made of skin, navigated the rivers and the sea using boats, hunted and ate flesh, unlike 'the people' who considered it 'wicked' to kill and mostly lived on berries and fruit and vegetable matter and only occasionally ate meat that was left after a kill by 'cats'. The 'new people' manufactured and drank liquor, offered human sacrifice and were ruthless and savage in their ways. In the words of H.G. Well (who Golding quotes) "We know very little of the appearances of the Neanderthal man, but this... seems to suggest an extreme hairiness, an ugliness, or a repulsive strangeness in his appearance over and above his low forehead, his beetle brows, his ape neck, and his inferior stature...." Straightforward description of our earliest ancestors might not have been beyond the ability of most writers of fiction, but Golding is not content with that. Instead, he undertakes the challenging task of trying to enter the primitive consciousness and to see the world as 'the people' then saw it, when mankind was still in the process of evolution, when man was just one of the creatures, the hunted rather than the hunter, struggling to survive against odds, and not as today, when man has set out to master the secrets of not only the earth but the entire cosmos. Attempting a narrative of this primitive kind raises numerous problems of communication with the reader. There is the difficulty of imaginatively presenting reality that 'primitive man saw differently from the way we would see it now. Besides presenting the unfamiliar, there is the added difficulty of narrating the seemingly obvious and simple processes and events which seem obscure but become clearer through re-reading.

Therefore, in some places it is difficult to understand both the content and the manner of the narrative because of their lack of ready correspondence with our settled ways of perception and the natural mode of the narrative structure. Language embodies much of man's collective experience and power of reasoning and observation.

Let us now turn to the extract. Lok and Fa are the only two survivors of 'the people', the rest of whom have either died or been killed or captured by the 'new people' who had moved up the river in their boats. They had camped near the river bank in a clearing that had a dead tree thickly covered with ivy. Fa and Lok had taken shelter in the tree before the 'new people' had arrived on the scene. They were hoping to recapture the two children, Liku and the baby. Liku and the 'new one' had earlier been adopted by the 'new people' after killing the grown-ups. Liku was actually sacrificed in a ceremony that took place while Lok and Fa were hiding in the tree, but Fa had managed to prevent Lok from seeing it, and so he did not know that Liku was no longer alive. Note the way 'the people' perceive actions and events. They think of things as being generally unrelated, independent objects and they have no sense of cause and effect, for example, 'her hands left him.... He heard her breathing pass by him....' Also Neanderthal man was much closer to the ape and the animal kingdom in so far as his sense of smell was very acute. The 'new people' had lost most of it while they had acquired new skills like better vision, an upright bearing and greater height and they were much slimmer and fairer. They had also learnt to use the bow and arrow and stone implements and to make crude pots for storing and drinking, while 'the people' still went to the river for water and brought it in their cupped hands, for others. You will, therefore, need a few notes to help you along with the passage. Now start reading.

7.3.1 Text

Lok turned to Fa and whispered.

"Now?"

She came close. There was in her voice the same urgency and command as when she had bidden him obey her on the terrace.

"I shall take the new one and jump the thorns. When I have gone, follow."

Lok thought but no picture would come.

"Liku——"

Her hands tightened on his body.

"Fa says 'do this!'"

He moved quickly so that the ivy leaves brushed each other harshly.

"But Liku——"

"I have many pictures in my head."

Her hands left him. He lay in the treetop and all the pictures of the day began to spin once more. He heard her breathing pass by him and sink into the ivy that rustled again so that he looked quickly into the clearing, but no one stirred. He could just make out the old man's feet sticking out of the hollow log and the holes of deep black where the branch caves were. The fire floated, dull red for the most part, but with a brighter heart where blue flames wandered over the wood. Tuami came out of the cave, stood by the fire, looking down at it. Fa was already half out of the ivy and clinging to the thick branches in the river side of the tree. Tuami took a branch and began to rake the hot ashes together so that they sparkled and sent up a puff of smoke and winking points. The crumpled woman crept out and took the branch from him and for a moment or two they stood swaying and talking. Tuami went away into a cave and the moment after Lok heard a crash as he fell among dry leaves. He waited for the woman to go; but first she dug earth round the fire until there was nothing but a black hummock with a glowing mouth at the top. She carried a sod to the fire and dumped it on the mouth so that the grass flared and crackled while a wave of light shook out over the clearing. She stood, quivering at the end of her long shadow, the light faltered and went out. He half heard, half sensed her as she went feeling towards the cave, fell on hands and knees and crawled inside.

His night-sight came back to him. The clearing was very still again and he heard the noise of Fa's skin scraping against the old bark of the trees as she let herself down. An immediacy of danger came to him; the knowledge that they were about to cheat these strange people and all their inscrutable works, the awful knowledge of Fa creeping towards them caught him by the throat so that he could not breathe and his heart began to shake him. He gripped the rotten wood and cowered behind the ivy with his eyes shut, seeking without knowing for those hours when the dead tree was relatively safe. The scent of Fa rose up to him from the fireward side of the tree and he shared a picture with her of a cave with a great bear standing at the mouth of it. The scent ceased to rise, the picture disappeared and he knew that she had become eyes and ears and nose crawling noiselessly towards the cave by the fire.

His heart slowed a little and his breathing so that he could look again at the clearing. The moon soared from the edge of a thick cloud and poured a grey blue light over the forest. He could see Fa, flattened by the light, clutched down to the ground and not more than twice her length from the dark mound of the fire. The cloud was succeeded by another and the clearing was full of darkness. Over by the thorns that blocked the entry to the trail he heard the guard choke and struggle to his feet. There came the sound of vomiting and then a long moan. Feelings mixed themselves in Lok. He had a half-thought that the new people might choose suddenly to be as they were: to stand up, talk and be wary or infinitely knowing and secure in their strength. With this was mixed a picture of Fa not daring to run first across the log by the terrace; and this feeling of warmth and urgent desire to be with her was part of it. He moved in the ivy cup, parted the leaves towards the river and felt for the branches on the trunk. He let himself down quickly before the feelings had time to change and make an obedient Lok of him; he stood in the long grass at the foot of the dead tree. Now the thought of Liku possessed him and he crept past the tree and tried to see which cave contained her. Fa was moving towards the cave on the right of the fire. Lok moved to the left, he sank on all fours and crept towards the cave that had grown beyond the logs and the pile of unsorted bundles. The hollow logs were lying where the people had left them as though they too had drunk of the honey drink and the old man's feet still struck out of the nearer one. Lok cowered under the height of the log and sniffed cautiously at the foot above him. It had no toes or rather—now he was able to get so close to it—it was covered in hide like the peoples' waists and it smelt strongly of cow and sweat. Lok lifted his eyes above his nose and looked over the edge of the log. The old man was lying full length in it, his mouth open, and he was snoring through his thin, pointed nose. The hair prickled on Lok's body and he ducked down as though the old man's eyes had been open. He cowered in the torn earth and grass by the log, and now that his nose was adjusted to the old man, it discounted him, for there were many other bits of information coming to it. The logs, for example, were connected with the sea. The white on their sides was sea-white, bitter and evocative of beaches and the ceaseless progression of the waves. There was the smell of pine-tree gum, of a peculiarly thick and fiery sort of mud that his nose could identify as different but not name. There were the smells of many men and women and children and, finally, most obscurely but none the less powerfully, there was the smell compounded of many that had sunk beneath the threshold of separate identification into the one smell of extreme age.

Lok stilled his flesh and the pricking of his hair and crawled along by the log until he came to where the round stones had been left a little way from the hot but lightless fire. They maintained their own atmosphere, a smell so powerful that his mind could see it like a glow or a cloud round the holes in the top. The smell was like the new people, it repelled and attracted, it daunted and enticed, it was like the fat woman and at the same time like the terror of the stag and the old man. Lok was reminded of the stag so strongly that he cowered again; but he could not remember where the stag had gone nor where it came from except that it approached the clearing from behind the dead tree. He turned then, looked up and saw the dead tree with its ivy, vast, shock-headed and impending from the clouds like a cave-bear. He crawled quickly to the hut on the left. The guard over by the thorns groaned again.

Lok smelt his way along the leaning branches at the back of the cave and found a man and a man and another man. There was no smell of Liku unless a sort of generalized smell in his nostrils so faint as to be nothing but an awareness might be connected with her. Wherever he cast over the ground the awareness persisted and would not be tracked down to a source. He grew bold. He gave up his random and fruitless casting and made for the open side of the cave. First the people had set up two sticks and laid one other long stick across the top. Then they had leaned innumerable branches against the long stick so that they formed a leafy overhang in between the fire and the thorns where the guard was. The cut ends of the branches had been forced into the earth in a curving line. Lok crawled to the end of the line and put his head round it cautiously. The noise of breathing and snoring that came from the shapes inside was irregular and loud. Someone was asleep not an arm's length from his face. The someone grunted, belched, turned and an arm fell over so that the open palm of the hand brushed Lok's face. He jerked back, quivering, then leant forward and smelt the hand. It was pale, glistening slightly, helpless and innocent as Mal's hand. But it was narrower and longer and of a different colour in its fungoid whiteness.

There was a narrow space between the arm and the place where the ends of the branches slanted into the earth. The picture of Liku so maddeningly present and so hidden drove him forward. He did not know what this feeling required him to do but knew that he must do something. He began to draw his body forward slowly into the narrow space like a snake sliding into a hole. He felt breath on his face and froze. There was a face not a hand's length from his own. He could feel the tickle of the fantastic hair, could see the long, useless cliff of bony skull that prolonged the head above the eyebrows. He could see the dull gleam of an eye beneath a lid that was not tightly shut, see the irregular wolf's teeth, feel now the honey-sour breath on his cheek. Inside—Lok shared a picture of terror with Fa but outside—Lok was coldly brave and still as ice.

7.3.2 Explanations

The extract narrates events that occurred late in the night after the 'new people' had retired.

Para One:

no picture would come — Lok and Fa visualised actions and events in 'pictures'. Lok was unable to understand why Fa had decided not to rescue Liku as planned earlier; she is reluctant to tell him that Liku was no longer alive; hence the misunderstanding that follows.

Para Two:

The hollow log is a boat. Tuami was one of the 'new people'.

the fire floated... where blue flames wandered over the wood—note the unusual mode of seeing the fire.

winking points—sparks

crumpled woman—in comparison, the 'new people' appear famished and thin to 'the people'.

hummock—raised ground (round the fire)

his heart began to shake him—Lok sees hands, feet and other limbs as acting independently.

the dead tree was relatively safe—once it was day light they could be easily seen and captured by the 'new people'.

shared the pictures with her of a cave with a great bear—the feeling of ultimate terror, which keeps haunting Lok and Fa. Note that this 'picture' keeps recurring.

Para Four:

over by the thorn that blocked the entry to the trail—the 'new people' had created an enclosure by placing thorny branches for greater security and posted guards for the night.

the sound of vomiting—they brewed a strong drink with fermented honey; the guard had obviously had too much to drink.

feelings mixed themselves in Lok—Note the way actions and emotions are perceived. We would normally say: 'Lok had mixed feeling'.

picture of Fa not daring to run first across the log by the terrace—Fa had suddenly realized that she was bolder and more capable than Lok and that she had to lead. However, Lok remembered an earlier occasion when Fa was afraid to cross the river near the terrace where a single log was placed across it. He was naturally anxious for her and felt fiercely protective.

make an obedient Lok of him—Fa had clearly instructed him to follow her after she had rescued the 'new' one'. But Lok could not bear the thought of leaving Liku behind. Liku was Lok's daughter by another woman, who had been killed earlier by the 'new people'. Lok was unaware that Liku had been sacrificed by them during the ritual Fa and he had witnessed; but Fa was reluctant to let him see it or tell him about it. It was this that led to the rash actions of Lok which caused the final tragedy.

the hollow logs were lying...as though they too had drunk of the honey drink—the basic difference between animate and inanimate things was not always clear to Lok and his people, who often confused them. Note locutions like 'blue flames wandered over the wood'; "the ivy leaves brushed each other harshly" etc., suggesting independent volition, not to be mistaken for mere stylistic variation.

Lok...sniffed cautiously at the foot above him—the old man was the head of the 'new people', the tribal leader, the sorcerer, the wise man. It is indeed remarkable how much Lok learns through his keen sense of smell. The 'new people' are more 'civilized' in that they wore animal skins and shoes, unlike 'the people' who only covered their waists with hide. But Lok was guileless and generous by instinct. In para three Lok was deeply troubled by his conscience when Fa was intent on cheating them.

thin pointed nose—unlike them, Lok had no bridge to his nose. The 'new people' were closer to modern man, Homo sapiens. But their noses were much less efficient than Lok's. There is a clear thread of irony running through the passage.

pine-tree gum, of a peculiarly thick and fiery sort of mud—used to make the boats water-proof; the fiery sort of mud he had no name for was pitch.

Para Five:

round stones—actually pots containing the fermented honey; Lok and his people were not even able to conceive of pots.

it repelled and attracted—Lok was initially excited by the arrival of the 'new people' and wanted to befriend them. But they were hostile and vicious and determined to destroy 'the people'. Lok had watched Tuami making love to a fair, fat and sexy woman while on the tree and seen the 'new people' drink and perform magic and quarrel among themselves. The 'new people' were evil and sinners in contrast to 'the people' who were innocent and child-like. Lok was both fascinated and disgusted by what he saw and learnt about them. Indeed we could see the whole thing as a parable: the lure of sex, drink, black magic and human sacrifice to which man's ambivalent nature makes him a predestined victim.

The terror of the stag and the old man—The stag's head was used to perform some magical rituals to propitiate mysterious powers before going on a hunt. The old man, as head of the tribe, exercised his tyranny over the rest with the help of every device, including magic and threats and physical violence. Lok was naturally terrified of these. He was confused by the head of the stag, mistaking it for the real one, when it was worn by a man during the ritual.

Para Six:

Mal's hand—the hand of the leader of 'the people' who had died recently.

narrower and longer and of a different colour in the fungoid whiteness—the contrasts between 'the people' and the 'new people' are brought out in several ways. Also see the next para. Lok was intrigued by the shape of their skull, particularly of the brow which was high and raised while Neanderthal man resembled the ape. The body was not covered by reddish hair all over, like his own.

Para Seven:

like a snake sliding into a hole—a specially appropriate comparison.

the irregular wolf's teeth—one more point of contrast between the peoples. The evolution of the powerful canine teeth probably indicated the trend away from a vegetarian diet towards a more aggressively carnivorous one.

Inside—Lok shared a picture of terror with Fa but outside—Lok was coldly brave and still as ice—Note the mode of perception and how Lok had to struggle with each 'picture' or idea before he could find appropriate expression for it. Even simple feelings, actions and objects presented major linguistic challenges to primitive man. At least this is what the narrative succeeds in bringing home to us.

The foregoing analysis and the brief explanatory notes would have helped you to make sense of the narrative, which might otherwise have struck you as baffling, if not needlessly complex and obscure. However, Golding, you will agree, has given us a remarkable insight into the way our ancestors, lost in the mists of time and conjecture, must have gone about making sense of the mysteries of the universe. We are also told of how language came into being. Yet language is not static, it does not always satisfy the need for the precise shade of meaning that is sought to be conveyed by a demanding writer, who strains after newer and newer modes of expressing himself or herself. Whether this kind of eternal quest of original expression is necessary or not is a matter of opinion. But once you respect the creative urge, there is no escape from wrestling with language the way Ramanujan or Golding have tried to do in the extracts we have just examined.

7.4 LET US SUM UP

In this unit we have analysed the type of narrative that is performing a dual function; giving us a taste of the way a particular character or a representative figure of a certain culture or period explores the nature of reality, given the individual handicap or gift or mental bias or disability which the protagonist is endowed with. Besides performing the normal function of narratives, the double-barrelled structure of such narratives delivers simultaneously the message as well as the highly individualised mode or style of the discourse in which the narrative is structured. From the two extracts we get not only the 'story' but we also experience, first hand as it were, the authentic mental bias of the narrator, his or her mental twist or set or characteristic turn of phrase or vision, call it what you will, which may well be unique.

The design of such a discourse imposes a certain deliberately chosen set of expectations or parameters or limitations on both the writer and the reader. In order to successfully negotiate the meaning of this discourse and also to derive the special intellectual rewards of having solved a challenging 'puzzle' by working extra hard for it, we have to keep our compact with the writer, although we willingly take on what might appear to be a gratuitous burden. But then every reader elects to get into such a pact with the writer. These two specimens of discourse are representative of the complexities and 'difficulties' of individualised and stylistically 'marked' narrative which are frequently encountered in modern fiction. Once you learn to tackle such extracts you will be able to successfully cope with such built-in challenges that you are bound to come across in contemporary literature.

7.5 ANSWERS TO EXERCISES

Check Your Progress I

- i) The narrative devices used in the story are quite formulaic in nature. These include:
- Thematic elements of the story like the story of a lawful heir trying to prove his legitimacy to the throne and undertaking a journey to solve a dream puzzle etc.
 - Patterns of continuity in the story by suppressing detail and ambiguity.

- Patterns of repetition to heighten the emotive impact and to encourage audience participation.
- ii) The audience remembers the storyline more vividly because it broadly runs along some established levels of expectation and customary story-telling conventions. Yet at the same time there is involvement with elements of danger and suspense in the story. This allows for principles around which the society is organized to be re-iterated and re-learned through the medium of the story. Social hierarchies are re-established and anxieties about lawlessness put to rest with the happy ending.

Check Your Progress II

- i) Your answer should take into account the fact that there is no logical sequence in the narrative nor can we find a cause and effect sequence. Coordinated actions are also seen as pictures.
- ii) 'Her hands left him'
'the fire floated, dull blue flames wandered over the wood'
'the crumpled woman crept out'
'His heart began to shake him'
'He shared a picture with her'
All these examples do suggest that language and civilisation are interrelated.

8.0 OBJECTIVES

In this Unit, we shall introduce you to expository prose using Richard Wright's essay "Twelve Million Black Voices" as an illustration. After completing the Unit, you will be able to:

- describe the techniques of exposition such as the use of examples, reason and analysis.
- outline the role of descriptive and narrative features, and
- explain the significance of figurative language in expository prose.

8.1 INTRODUCTION

The term 'exposition' refers to an act of explaining something or making it clear. The aim of the writer in the expository writing is not primarily to narrate or describe; it is mainly to explain something – facts, ideas or beliefs. The writer does this by resorting to various techniques of exposition such as:

- explanation of a process,
- use of examples,
- reasons in support of a statement,
- comparison and contrast,
- classification,
- restatement,
- definition,
- analogy,
- cause and effect,
- analysis.

In the units on expository prose we shall illustrate the various techniques of analyzing expository prose. Though Blocks 1 and 2 have dealt with descriptive and narrative varieties of prose, the real distinction among the different varieties is one of focus. In descriptive prose the focus is on describing things as they are or as they appear to be. Narrative writing tries to recreate an actual or imaginary experience in a way that we are also able to experience it mentally. In short, it is a description of events. In expository writing, the focus is on explaining. The writer often combines features of description and narration while explaining. However, expository prose needs to be looked at as a separate variety for the sake of our being able to recognize its distinctiveness in terms of purpose, design and functions of language. We shall also discuss features which lend literary merit to the passages under discussion.

8.2 PASSAGE FROM RICHARD WRIGHT'S TWELVE MILLION BLACK VOICES

The extract we present for discussion is a selection from Richard Wright's Twelve Million Black Voices (1941), subtitled A Folk History of the Negro in the United States. Richard Wright (1908-1960) has the distinction of being the first Afro-American to achieve international fame. His writings include the novels Native Son (1940), The Outsider (1953) and Savage Holiday (1954) and his autobiography, Black Boy: A Record of Childhood and Youth (1945). The second volume of his autobiography, American Hunger, which dealt with his membership of and disillusionment with the American Communist Party, was published posthumously in 1977.

The passage you are going to study is a good example of the organization and style of expository prose. The writer uses a particular tone, selects incidents or details as examples, orders his material, even chooses particular words and phrases to explain the miseries of Blacks in America.

We would like you to first read the passage rapidly to get a general overview. Then you should read it again, carefully and at a slower pace to get the main points. You should also consult the glossary for the meanings of unfamiliar words, besides trying to guess the meanings of words and phrases from the context in which they occur. After you have read and understood the passage, go through the discussion. You must answer the in-text questions which are aimed at making you reflect and refer back to the passage. The in-text questions have also been provided with answers in the discussion for you to check your answers there and then. Finally at the end of the discussion you must complete the exercises. Your answers should then be checked with the answers given by us at the end of the unit.

8.2.1 Text

The word 'Negro', the term by which, orally or in print, we black folk in the United States are usually designated, is not really a name at all nor a description, but a psychological island whose objective form is the most unanimous fiat in all American history; a fiat buttressed by popular and national tradition, and written down in many state and city statutes; a fiat which artificially and arbitrarily defines, regulates, and limits in scope of meaning the vital contours of our lives, and the lives of our children and our children's children.

This island, within whose confines we live, is anchored in the feelings of millions of people, and is situated in the midst of the sea of white faces we meet each day; and, by and large, as three hundred years of time has borne our nation into the twentieth century, its rocky boundaries have remained unyielding to the waves of our hope that dash against it.

The steep cliffs of this island are manifest, on the whole, in the conduct of whites towards us hour by hour, a conduct which tells us that we possess no rights commanding respect, that we have no claim to pursue happiness in our own fashion, that our progress toward civilization constitutes an insult, that our behaviour must be kept firmly within an orbit branded as inferior, that we must be compelled to labour at the behest of others, that as a group we are owned by the whites and that manliness on our part warrants instant reprisal.

Three hundred years are a long time for millions of folk like us to be held in such subjection, so long a time that perhaps scores of years will have to pass before we shall be able to express what this slavery has done to us, for our personalities are still numb from its long shocks; and, as the numbness leaves our souls, we shall yet have to feel and give utterance to the full pain we shall inherit.

More than one-half of us black folk in the United States are tillers of the soil, and three-fourths of those of us who till the soil are sharecroppers and day labourers.

The land we till is beautiful, red and black and brown clay, with fresh and hungry smells, with pine trees and palm trees, with rolling hills and swampy delta – an unbelievably fertile land, bounded on the north by the states of Pennsylvania, Ohio, Illinois, and Indiana, on the south by the Gulf of Mexico, on the west by the Mississippi River, and on the east by the Atlantic Ocean.

Our southern springs are filled with quiet noises and scenes of growth. Apple buds laugh into blossom. Honeysuckles creep up the sides of houses. Sunflowers nod in the hot fields. From mossy tree to mossy tree – oak, elm, willow, aspen, sycamore, dogwood, cedar, walnut, ash, and hickory – bright green leaves jut from a million branches to form an awning that tries to shield and shade the earth. Blue and pink kites of small boys sail in the windy air.

In summer the magnolia trees fill the countryside with sweet scent for long miles. Days are slumberous, and the skies are high and thronged with clouds that ride fast. At midday the sun blazes and bleaches the soil. Butterflies flit through the heat; wasps sing their sharp, straight lines; birds fluff and flounce, piping in querulous joy. Nights are covered with canopies, sometimes blue and sometimes black, canopies that sag low with ripe and nervous stars. The throaty boast of frogs momentarily drowns out the call and counter-call of crickets.

In autumn the land is afire with colour. Red and brown leaves lift and flutter dryly, becoming entangled in the stiff grass and cornstalks. Cotton is picked and ginned, cane is crushed and its juice is simmered down into molasses; yams are grubbed out of the clay; hogs are slaughtered and cured in lingering smoke; corn is husked and ground into meal. At twilight the sky is full of wild geese winging ever southward, and bats jerk through the air. At night the winds blow free.

In winter the forests resound with the bite of steel axes eating into tall trees as men gather wood for the leaden days of cold. The guns of hunters snap and crack. Long days of rain come, and our swollen creeks rush to join a hundred rivers that wash across the land and make great harbours where they feed the gulf or the sea. Occasionally the rivers leap their banks and leave new thick layers of silt to enrich the earth, and then the look of the land is garish, bleak, suffused with a first day stillness, strangeness and awe.

But whether in spring or summer or autumn or winter, time slips past us remorselessly, and it is hard to tell of the iron that lies beneath the surface of our quiet, dull days.

To paint the picture of how we live on the tobacco, cane, rice, and cotton plantations is to complete with mighty artists: the movies, the radio, the newspapers, the magazines, and even the Church. They have painted one picture: charming, idyllic, romantic; but we live another: full of the fear of the Lords of the Land, bowing and grinning when we meet white faces, toiling from sun to sun, living in unpainted wooden shacks that sit casually and insecurely upon the red clay.

In the main we are different from other folk in that, when an impulse moves us, when we are caught in the throes of inspiration, when we are moved to better our lot, we do not ask ourselves: "Can we do it?" but: "Will they let us do it?" Before we black folk can move, we must first look into the white man's mind to see what is there, to see what he is thinking, and the white man's mind is a mind that is always changing.

In general there are three classes of men above us: the Lords of the Land – operators of the plantations; the Bosses of the Buildings – the owners of industry; and the vast numbers of poor white workers – our immediate competitors in the daily struggle for bread. The Lords of the Land hold sway over the plantations and over us; the Bosses of the Buildings lend money and issue orders to the Lords of the Land. The Bosses of the Buildings feed upon the Lords of the Land, and the Lords of the Land feed upon the 5,000,000 landless poor whites and upon us, throwing to the poor whites the scant solace of filching from us 4,000,000 landless blacks what the poor whites themselves are cheated of in this elaborate game.

Back of this tangled process is a long history. When the Emancipation Proclamation was signed, there were some 4,000,000 of us black folk stranded and bewildered upon the land which we had tilled under compulsion for two and a half centuries. Sundered suddenly from the only relationship with Western civilization we had been allowed to form since our captivity, our personalities blighted by two hundred and fifty years of servitude, and eager to hold our wives and husbands and children together in family units, some of us turned back to the same Lords of the Land who had held us as slaves and begged for work, resorted to their advice; and there began for us a new kind of bondage: sharecropping.

Glad to be free, some of us drifted and gave way to every vagary of impulse that swept through us, being held in the line of life only by the necessity to work and eat. Confined for centuries to the life of the cotton field, many of us possessed no feelings of family, home, community, race, church, or progress.

We could scarcely believe that we were free, and our restlessness and incessant mobility were our naïve way of testing that freedom. Just as a kitten stretches and yawns after a long sleep, so thousands of us tramped from place to place for the sheer sake of moving, looking, wondering, landless upon the land. Arkansas, Missouri, Tennessee, Kentucky, North Carolina, South Carolina, Louisiana, Alabama, Mississippi, Georgia, Virginia, and West Virginia became the home states of us freed blacks.

In 1890 many white people predicted that we black folk would perish in a competitive world; but in spite of this we left the land and kept afloat, wandering from Natchez to New Orleans, from Mobile to Montgomery, from Macon to Jacksonville, from Birmingham to Chattanooga, from Nashville to Louisville, from Memphis to Little Rock – labouring in the sawmills, in the turpentine camps, on the road jobs; working for men who did not care if we lived or died, but who did not want their business enterprises to suffer for lack of labour. During the first decade of the twentieth century more than one and three-quarter millions of us abandoned the plantations upon which we had been born; more than a million of us roamed the states of the South and the remainder of us drifted north.

Our women fared easier than we men during the early days of freedom; on the whole their relationship to the world was more stable than ours. Their authority was supreme in most of our families inasmuch as many of them had worked in the 'Big Houses' of the Lords of the Land and had learned manners, had been taught to cook, sew, and nurse. During slave days they did not always belong to us, for the Lords of the Land often took them for their pleasure. When a gang of us was sold from one plantation to another, our wives would sometimes be kept by the Lords of the Land and we men would have to mate with whatever slave girl we chanced upon. Because of their enforced intimacy with the Lords of the Land, many of our women, after they were too old to work, were allowed to remain in the slave cabins to tend generations of black children. They enjoyed a status denied us men, being called 'Mammy', and through the years they became symbols of motherhood, retaining in their withered bodies the burden of our folk wisdom, reigning as arbiters in our domestic affairs until we men were freed and had moved to cities where cash-paying jobs enabled us to become the heads of our own families.

The economic and political power of the South is not held in our hands; we do not own banks, iron and steel mills, railroads, office buildings, ships, wharves, or power plants. There are some few of us who operate small grocery stores, barber shops, rooming houses, burial societies, and undertaking establishments. But none of us owns any of the basic industries that shape the course of the South, such as mining, lumber, textiles, oil, transportation, or electric power. So, in the early spring, when the rains have ceased and the ground is ready for plowing, we present ourselves to the Lords of the Land and ask to make a crop. We sign a contract – usually our contracts are oral – which allows us to keep one-half of the harvest after all debts are paid. If we have worked upon these plantations before, we are legally bound to plant, tend, and harvest another crop. If we should escape to the city to avoid paying our mounting debts, white policemen track us down and ship us back to the plantation.

The Lords of the Land assign us ten or fifteen acres of soil already bled of its fertility through generations of abuse. They advance us one mule, one plow, seed, tools, fertilizer, clothing, and sorghum molasses. If we have been lucky the year before may be we have saved a few dollars to tide us through the fall months, but spring finds us begging an 'advance credit' from the Lords of the Land.

8.2.2 Glossary

- fiat: an order or decree, it means 'let it be done'.
- statutes: written laws of a legislative body.
- cliffs: steep rugged side of rocks on a coast.
- swampy: spongy land filled with water.
- honeysuckle: a climbing plant with sweet smelling yellow, pink, or white flowers in the shape of long narrow tubes.
- ginned: to separate cotton from its seeds by use of a machine called a gin.
- yam: a variety of sweet potato.
- a first day stillness: as quiet as if it were the first day of creation.
- Emancipation Proclamation: the Emancipation Proclamation was an order by President Abraham Lincoln on January 1, 1863 during the American Civil War, which freed most of the slaves in the United States.

- sorgham: a cereal plant known as Indian millet, a variety of jowar.
- fall: autumn is called fall in the U.S.A.

8.2.3 Discussion

The extract from Richard Wright's book Twelve Million Black Voices is an account of the life of blacks in America. It tells us about

- i. the occupation available to blacks (paragraphs 5, 15 and 19),
- ii. the conduct of whites towards blacks (paragraphs 3, 4 and 13),
- iii. social status of blacks (paragraphs 3, 12 and 14),
- iv. historical account of events (paragraphs 15, 16 and 17), and
- v. lives of black women (paragraph 18).

Richard Wright uses several techniques to tell us about the miseries of the blacks. One way is substantiation by quoting figures. Refer to para 5 where black occupations are mentioned. What is the proportion of the black population involved in the cultivation of land? (You may use the space provided below for writing your answer)

When the writer states that one half of the black population is involved in tilling the soil he is elaborating the central thesis that black men lived a life of misery; the jobs available to them were limited. In para 14, Wright classifies the population of America into three categories – Landlords, Industrialists and Workers. He mentions that the landless blacks were 4,000,000 and in para 15 he repeats ‘4,000,000 of us black folk’.

In para 5 the author states that the tillers are also sharecroppers, sharecropping (if you consult the glossary) is an agreement between the landowner and the tiller according to which the tiller gives part of the harvest as rent to the landowner. While enumerating the reasons why sharecropping favoured the whites, Wright resorts to first person narrative. His tone by which we mean the writer’s attitude: angry, melancholy, cheerful, is controlled. He gives objective facts such as: the contracts were oral. Secondly the blacks were legally bound to plant, tend and harvest the land they had tilled before and in case they ran away to avoid paying the debts, white policemen tracked them down and sent them back to the place of work. Finally, the lands given to them for raising crops had lost all fertility due to repeated use. Also the tools given for ploughing proved inadequate. As a result they were left with no choice but to borrow money from the landlords and this had to be repaid in the form of crops.

He makes precise, convincing statements. The inhuman treatment of blacks comes out more prominently through the rational and quiet manner of the sentences proceeding one after another, with no outraged comment. The intention is to make us think about the poor blacks. Are they treated better than animals? If we look for clues, we find that statements such as ‘We present ourselves’ are ironic in tone. (para 19) The tone, without being aggressive, suggests that all is not well as ‘white policemen track us down and ship us back to the plantations’.

In order to describe the conduct of whites towards blacks, refer to paragraphs 3, 4 and 13. There were arbitrary official orders or flats and laws against the negroes. The parameters of black existence are defined in para 3. Write in your own words, how blacks were expected to behave.

Have you included the following strictures imposed on the blacks?

- i. Should not claim respectful behaviour from Whites.
- ii. Should not seek happiness in any form.
- iii. Should not seek to progress in a civilized manner.
- iv. Should work for others.
- v. Should accept that they are owned by Whites.

8.2.4 Style

We shall now examine the style of writing and the devices the author has used to convey his meaning effectively.

The title 'Twelve Million Black Voices' is not a simple account of the life of blacks in America. The word 'black' seen figuratively also expresses despair, a gloomy, dismal, sullen state of mind on account of unrelieved suffering. There are words, phrases and sentences that illustrate the significance of the title. The harsh attitude of white men is like rocky boundaries and steep cliffs. Blacks cannot express their feelings, emotions and thoughts for 'our personalities are still numb from shocks of slavery'. In a land of plenty and beauty, 'time slips past us remorselessly, and it is hard to tell of the iron that lies beneath the surface of our quiet, dull days'. They live in 'unpainted wooden shacks that sit casually and insecurely upon the red clay.' The harsh lives are summed up in the words 'black voices'.

Read paragraphs 1, 2 and 3 where the author uses metaphorical expression when he says that the term Negro is like an island. Bring out the significance of the metaphor and how it illustrates the author's point of view.

The metaphor 'island' is able to explain an abstract concept in the author's mind which is stated at the beginning of the passage where the term negro is defined in an unusual manner. It is a 'psychological island'. What is meant is that the black is isolated like an island in the middle of the sea of white faces. Just as the sea exercises control over the conditions existing on the island, white men exercise control over the blacks. The image of an island is an extended one. The unrelenting harsh attitude of the whites is compared to the rocky boundaries of the island. The hopes and aspirations of negroes are like waves that dash against the rocks producing no effect.

Read paragraphs 6, 7, 8, 9 and 10. There is the description of landscape and seasons. The description acts as a scenic backdrop providing a contrast between the bounty of nature on the one hand and the cruelty reigning supreme in human hearts.

How has the fertility of the land been suggested?

.....
.....
.....

The red, black and brown clay are types of soil conducive to vegetation. The fresh and hungry smells can come only from healthy, exuberant trees. Palm trees and pine trees and swampy delta exist where rainfall is heavy and the land is fertile.

The author brings out the beauty of landscape and seasons with the help of word pictures. Can you list some of them below (you could refer to paragraphs 6, 7 and 8).

You must also have listed the following: the panoramic view of red and black and brown clay, rolling hills and swampy delta, apple buds laughing into blossom, honey-suckles creeping up the sides of houses, sunflowers nodding in the hot fields, bright leaves jutting from a million branches to form an awning that tries to shield and shade the earth. Nights are covered with canopies, sometimes blue and sometimes black canopies that sag low with ripe and nervous stars. The author has described the scene in such vivid detail that one can almost 'see' the stars and 'smell' the honeysuckle. But is the author's aim simply to communicate these sensations? As we know, the author's aim is to communicate the experience of the Blacks in America and by describing the plenty and prosperity of American soil, he only serves to highlight the exploited condition of the blacks.

The use of literary devices serves to enrich the prose style of an author.

Alliteration is a literary device which is the repetition of consonantal sounds in stressed syllables in a sequence of words. Give examples of alliteration from paragraph 8.

.....
.....
.....
.....
.....
.....
.....
.....

You must have observed the following:

Sweet scent: blazes and bleaches, sharp, straight, fluff and flounce; covered with canopies; call and counter-call of crickets.

Refer to para 9. There is use of such verbal phrases as suggest vigorous activity:

.....
.....
.....
.....
.....
cane is crushed; juice is simmered down into molasses; yams are grubbed out of the clay; hogs are slaughtered and cured in lingering smoke; and corn is husked and ground into meal.

In para 16 we find an example of the use of a simile. Explain in your own words.

The restlessness and movement of negroes as a consequence of reconstructive measures is compared to the yawning and stretching of a kitten after a long sleep. Earlier we learnt that their personalities were numb under the shock of slavery. Till the time they were set free, they were, as if, sleeping like a kitten in a state of inertia and happy to stretch and yawn when woken up, oblivious of any demand of exacting action on them.

8.3 LET US SUM UP

In this unit we have discussed a passage of expository prose from the point of view of techniques of development and features of style. In the course of the discussion we have also studied the descriptive and narrative features of writing which act as tools of exposition. We have also seen the use of figurative language such as metaphor and simile which improve expression and convey the author's meaning in a more effective and forceful style.

Check Your Progress 1

1. The term negro is designated as a psychological island in the minds of both whites and blacks, (note the unusual analogy). The island is a metaphorical expression and the metaphor is an extended one. The negro is isolated like an island in the sea of white faces. Just as the sea exercises control over the island, white men exercise control over the blacks. The unrelenting harsh attitude of the whites is compared to the rocky boundaries of the island. The hopes and aspirations of negroes are like waves that dash against the rocks, producing no effect.
2. Rocky boundaries; steep cliffs of the island, personalities are still numb from its long shocks, time slips past us remorselessly, and it is hard to tell of the iron that lies beneath the surface of our quiet, dull days.

 - i. Negro women commanded respect in their families as they had learnt manners, to cook, sew and nurse by virtue of working in the big houses owned by whites.
 - ii. Whites had a soft attitude towards them as they were used by white men for sexual pleasure. As such they were allowed to stay in servant cabins well past their youth, and looked after generations of children.
 - iii. As they became symbols of motherhood and the repositories of folk wisdom, the black women exercised more authority in domestic matters. The black men had no source of income, and could become real heads of their families only after they started earning money after emancipation.

9.0 OBJECTIVES

In the previous Unit, you read a prose passage which is an example of how a writer combines descriptive and narrative features in expository writing. In this unit an examination of Leach's lecture 'Men and Learning' will illustrate:

- the use of argument to persuade while explaining, and
- the use of synthesis to put together ideas into a conceptual framework.

After completing the unit you will understand how the writer organizes his ideas skillfully, determining the order of presenting his argument and finally building it up to a logical and convincing conclusion.

9.1 INTRODUCTION

In this unit, we shall focus on a slightly different aspect of expository writing. In the previous unit, we analysed how a writer uses both description and narration in explaining and presenting his views. We also discussed how examples are used to make an argument more convincing and how figurative language is used to make the communication more effective. Logical sequencing of ideas in an expository composition relates to the arrangement of ideas in a way that each determines the next as its proper outcome. In the following discussion on Professor Leach's lecture 'Men and Learning' we shall examine Leach's unorthodox views on education to bring out the role of logic and reasoning in the organization of expository writing. We shall also examine the role of synthesis in determining the dominant theme.

9.2 PASSAGE FROM EDMUND LEACH'S 'MEN AND LEARNING'

'Men and Learning' by Professor Edmund Leach (b. 1910), forms part of a series of lectures broadcast over the British Broadcasting Corporation (or BBC as it is popularly known). These lectures were later published under the title A Runaway World. The present extract is an example of expository prose when it expounds personal views. The unorthodox ideas are logically drawn to their conclusion. He specifically examines the role of education in our times. He maintains that the present system of education, which is based on competition, cannot help to meet the demands of social and technological change. The authorial tone of a decisive point of view takes precedence over other considerations and the undercurrents of argument, logic and reasoning persist throughout the passage.

Professor Edmund Leach has done field research in anthropology (study of the evolution of man and human societies and customs) in Formosa, Kurdistan, Burma, Borneo and Sri Lanka. His publications include Political Systems of Highland Burma (1986), Social Anthropology (1982).

Education is not something primarily associated with technical college or university; it takes place mainly in the home. Its really fundamental component is the habit of communication established in extreme infancy, within the first year of life before the child begins to talk at all. Here, at the very beginning, when the mother first starts to convert her animal baby into a human being, the sole purpose of education is to link things together, to establish communication, to make the child conscious that it is part of the family group. The separation of identity comes much later. But when it comes we British go over to the opposite extreme and carry self-identification much too far.

The fact that people in other countries do things quite differently need not mean that we are wrong, but the difference here is striking. In the less sophisticated corners of the world, the kind of isolated loneliness which we consider normal – the emphasis on the uniqueness of the individual self separated from all others – is never cultivated at all. The child is born into a community which consists of whole classes of fathers and mothers, brothers and sisters, uncles and aunts, cousins and so on. In almost any situation there are half a dozen or so individuals who can act as stand-ins for any other. Moreover this is not just a temporary phase of early childhood; most people spend their whole lives surrounded and supported by kinsfolk.

In such circumstances the normal mode of self-expression is to say ‘We do this’, not ‘I do this’.

Let me pursue this point: it is a very striking fact that almost everywhere outside the centres of Western Capitalism the normal emphasis of education is on group identity rather than individual identity...

Now our society provides a great variety of institutions into which the individual may merge his identity – family, school, sports club, trade union, church, firm, political party – there are literally dozens of contexts in which the lonely individual can sink his I into a collective we and gain greater confidence by doing so, yet paradoxically a great deal of our explicit educational effort, both at school and at home, is aimed in exactly the opposite direction.

The overt values of English formal schooling are that the individual should be self-reliant and show initiative. From the age of ten upwards the whole system becomes viciously competitive. The aim is to discover and cultivate the powers of latent leadership in the few with total disregard for the emotional suffering that this imposes on the many. In Britain this objective is common both to the private school system, which is rigged so as to preserve the vested interests of the wealthy, and to the State school system, which pretends to offer 'equal opportunity for all'. In practice, the State system is devoted to the needs of a meritocracy in which all the rewards go to the most able.

In private sector and public sector alike, every attempt to introduce a touch of socialist justice – the principle 'from each according to his capacity: to each according to his needs' – is resisted up to the hilt. We are told that we must segregate the clever just as we must segregate the criminal Many people take it for granted that the 'best' schools are those which cater for the children of the very rich. But if you can't afford to send your son to Eton then the next best thing is cut-throat competition – to the death.

This is a sad business. Even if it were true, which it isn't, that success at school and university guaranteed success in adult life, the rat race is conducted at a terrible cost. Over the past fifty years we in England have partly replaced the old system of class stratification based on hereditary wealth by a new class system based on achieved status. Simultaneously our educational system has developed into an entirely ruthless machine for the elimination of the unworthy. Suicide and mental breakdown are now so common in the student population that they are almost taken for granted.

Let's try to get this straight. We instil competitive value into our children from entirely dishonest motives. Few of us have any deep concern about whether our offspring become civilized human beings; we are only worried about social class. We are hag-ridden by the fear and envy endemic to a society which combines class stratification with the possibility of social mobility. Those who are high up in the existing order are driven to compete by fear and contempt for those below; those lower down are driven by envy of those above. Schooling is a means to an end: the child must better himself, or consolidate an established position. Only a tiny minority thinks of education as a means by which individuals are given human interests and values so that they can fit together into the total jigsaw of society; for most of us education is an instrument of war, a weapon by which the individual beats down his competitors and defends himself against adversity. I assure you, I do not exaggerate.

It seems probable that everyone, including those who are now most successful, would feel much more comfortable in a less competitive world, and if we are looking towards the future this should be one of our long-term objectives. It won't be easy to achieve but this much is quite plain: in order to arrive at a system in which less value is placed on the relative merit of individuals we shall need to make quite basic changes to the overall structure of formal school education. If we are to produce adults who are inspired by an ethic of cooperation rather than an ethic of fratricide then we must start out by devising a school system in which passing competitive examinations and proving that Tom is much cleverer than Harry ceases to be part of the exercise.

Oh, I know this is very Utopian. A General Certificate of Education at A level is worth the money, and even more so a university degree.... This is why parents and children alike hurl themselves into the fray with such ferocity. If you take away the carrot of financial reward, standards really will fall all along the line. But this is only because the children and the parents and the schoolmasters and the university dons are all so totally confused.

The confusion starts out with a clash of basic assumptions. The schoolmasters and the dons tend to believe that innate intelligence is a quality which varies very greatly from one individual to another but that you can't do much about it except measure it. That being so, school education is not much concerned with 'developing the intelligence'; it simply stuffs the wretched pupil full of facts, and measures the result by an examination. Parents, on the other hand, start out with the sentimental idea that the intellectual potential of all children is basically the same. In that case the only way to get your beloved child out in front is either to cheat by sending him to a privileged school, or to chastise and bully him so that he passes examinations which the other fellow fails.

Both sides are right up to a point; and both sides are entirely wrong. Intelligence is a very complicated affair involving a mixture of all sorts of mental capacities and psychological attitudes – powers of perception, memory, vocabulary, logical facility, curiosity, scepticism, persistence, the ability to make unexpected associations and goodness knows what else. The underlying mental faculties are inborn, the product of the individual's genetic constitution. No amount of education or parental devotion will ever turn a dull boy into a genius. On the other hand, the way in which we use and develop our potential skills will be determined by things that happen to us after we are born. The trouble here is that many of the really critical events seem to occur very early on, perhaps even in the first few weeks of life or even in the course of the birth trauma itself, and I don't think that there is the slightest evidence that at this very early age a child is at an advantage if it happens to have a mother who is especially prosperous, or intelligent, or ambitious. Just how far the intellectual potential of a child can still be modified even after it reaches school age is a moot point; certainly the margin of flexibility is not very great. On the other hand, it is absolutely clear that by the time children do get to school they already have abilities of very different kinds. Also it is plain that any attempt to 'measure' intelligence by examination will simply measure certain sorts of ability and ignore the rest. But the open-ended non-measurable kind of ability may be just what we are looking for. I want to stress this....

The people who are going to be able to cope with our rapidly changing future are those who are temperamentally unorthodox – the curious, the sceptical, the ones who don't care a fig for established opinion....

Now if all this is true the implications for education should be fairly obvious. We should be looking for people with divergent unorthodox kinds of intelligence, not conformist orthodox types. But since all methods of selection by competitive examination can only be based on established orthodoxies, we must try to get rid of competitive examinations altogether. The aim must be to maximize variation. We need to give all children equal opportunity to learn how to learn, but after that they should be encouraged to follow their own special interests instead of the textbook conventions of examination syndicates.

Fine words, but what a hope! The academic machine is supposed to be searching for genius but, with things set up as they are now, it can only recognize those who are both very clever and very obedient. It turns out excellent bureaucrats but rejects or perhaps never notices those genuinely imaginative characters who refuse to toe the line.

Higher education is necessarily selective. It isn't everyone who can benefit from life in a university; but clearly those who do go to a university should include the innovators who are going to lead us forward into our bewildering future. To see what sort of people these are, we might consider who they have been in the past. Who are the people who really stand out over the past few centuries as having completely altered our Western view of where man stands in relation to the universe? Newton, Darwin, Marx, Freud, Picasso – there are only a dozen or so world shakers in this class. And if we ask: 'Are these the sort of people who are likely to flourish and gain approval in our present educational garden?' the answer in most cases must be an unqualified 'No'...

So to go right back to my original question: Yes, more and better education could help us to cope with the problems of an expanding technology, but only if we take a more enlightened view about what we mean by 'better' education. Education ought to be concerned with training people to exercise their imaginations creatively, instead of which it is too often little more than a selection device for picking out the clever conformists.

It wouldn't matter so much if education diplomas simply give a list of the courses in which the owner has shown reasonable proficiency; what is outrageous is that an entirely anonymous examination machine should have the arrogance to grade its victims as 'adequate', 'good', and 'excellent', without any personal knowledge and indeed without any evidence at all except a few written scripts compiled in a great hurry under highly artificial conditions. Let's face it, school and university examinations in their present form do not test ability or personality or knowledge, they simply test a capacity for passing examinations, an aptitude which is of rather marginal utility in ordinary adult life.....

In the context of my general theme, there are two main points I am getting at here. The first is the straightforward one that our competitive examination system of selection simply fails to pick out the kind of people who can cope most effectively with problems of social and technological change; the second is that the emphasis which our system places on individual achievement is entirely misdirected.

Much of our adult state of fear is linked up with the feeling that I, an individual, have to cope single-handed with a hostile world, the details of which have become far too complicated for me to understand. This feeling of isolation is in part a by-product of the way we have been educated and the stress that is put on passing examinations. The more 'successful' your education, the more likely you are to feel alone, because the process of segregation has been more complete....at every stage you proved how much cleverer you are than all those other fellows, until in the end you stand quite alone and afraid.

It ought to be possible to manage things in a different way so that we go forward into the future together, collaborating as a team instead of looking around for every possible opportunity to knife each other in the back.

Don't blame the schoolmasters for the kind of education you received; they crammed you with facts instead of teaching you how to enjoy the pleasures of civilization because the ethos of a competitive society compels them to behave in this way. If society insists that individuals be segregated out into categories – first class, second class, third class, upper, middle, lower – then the system will always have to waste an enormous amount of time and energy allocating individuals to the right slots and marking them up with the proper labels, but so far as education is concerned the whole operation is utterly irrelevant. Those of you who have, like me, been right through the mill know very well that this is so. It is up to us to get the system changed....

9.2.2 Glossary

identity:	the qualities, belief and ideas which make one feel different from everyone else or a group.
rigged:	arranged dishonestly for a selfish advantage.
meritocracy:	group of persons selected according to merit in competition.
Eton:	one of the most prestigious public-schools in England.
the rate race:	fiercely competitive struggle to maintain one's position in work or life.
class stratification:	arrangement or division of people into sections, one above the other, according to their social positions.
hag-ridden:	continually worried by something, having nightmares.
endemic:	regularly found only in a particular nation, region, locality or group.
social mobility:	changing of social status by movement from one social class to another.
Utopian:	ideal, but unpractical. Utopia is an imaginary country which has a perfect social and political system, described in Sir Thomas More's Utopia (published in 1516).
A General Certificate of Education at A level:	General Certification of Education at Advanced Level, an examination in Britain taken about two years after the General Certificate of Education at Ordinary Level and before entering a university, at the age of eighteen. We could broadly say that it is somewhat equal to our 10+2 examination.
hurl themselves into the fray:	throw themselves into the battle.
the carrot of financial reward:	the promised advantage of wealth.
dons:	here, university teachers. The term 'don' is generally used for fellows and tutors at Oxford and Cambridge.
trauma:	experience or shock which has a lasting and damaging psychological effect.
moot:	debatable; undecided.

open-ended:	without any predetermined limit.
don't care a fig:	to not care at all.
examination syndicates:	University committees, councils, or bodies set up for the purpose of conducting examinations.
toe the line:	conform to the general policy.
Newton:	Sir Isaac Newton (1642-1727), English physicist and mathematician. He formulated the law of gravitation. His Principles of Natural Philosophy (1687) is one of the most important single works in the history of modern science.
Darwin:	Charles Darwin (1809-82), English naturalist. His theory of evolution, set out in On the the Origin of Species by Means of Natural Selection (1859) and The Descent of Man (1871), stated that through the ages, all living things developed from a few simple forms and only those forms of life survived which were best suited to a given environment. This theory undermined the biblical belief that man was the supreme product of God's design, and it revolutionized human knowledge.
Marx:	Karl Marx (1818-83), revolutionary, economist, sociologist and founder of modern communist theory, was born in Germany and died in London. His works include Das Kapital and the Communist Manifesto (1848), in which he advocated the abolition of private property. He believed in the principle: "From everyone according to his faculties, to everyone according to his needs." His theories had far-reaching effects, intellectually and politically.
Freud:	Sigmund Freud (1856-1939), Austrian physician and the founder of psychoanalysis. He is author of the Interpretations of Dreams and Civilisation and its Discontents .
Picasso:	Pablo Picasso (1881-1973), was born in Spain and died in France. He is one of the greatest and most influential painters of the twentieth century.
marginal utility:	of very little use.
knife each other in the back:	try to defeat each other by unfair means.
ethos:	the characteristic and distinguishing habits, attitudes and beliefs of any group.
through the mill:	undergo intensive training or labour.

9.2.3 Discussion

Leach's views on education can briefly be stated as:

- a. shortcomings of English formal school education (para 6, 7, 8, 9, 16, 20 and 21),
- b. measures to improve education (paragraphs 10, 15, 17, 18 and 22),
- c. views on intelligence (paragraphs 13, 14, and 15), and
- d. relationship between education and society.

The author's observation is that formal education in Britain aims at promoting individual identity which encourages competitiveness. He builds up his argument by talking of a paradoxical situation. What is it? (Answer in the space provided below by referring to para 1)

It is clear that Leach believes that during infancy and pre-school age a child is helped by its mother in establishing communication and familiarity with people around him. But formal school reverses this process by encouraging the child to prove himself better than others by being unique and different from them. As such a child fails to identify himself with people. The paradox thus lies in the reversal of the educational process as a child turns from his mother to formal education in school.

The main argument in the passage is that individual isolation and alienation result from competitiveness. The negative role of competitive examinations is logically debated in paras 8, 9, 12 and 21. Can you sum up Leach's views?

If you have studied the text carefully you will find that:

- i. a child who does well in examinations alone is considered self-reliant and equipped with latent powers of leadership. This causes psychological hardships for those who lag behind, often driving them to suicide.
- ii. both the public and private schools separate the students on the basis of wealth and merit. The clever are separated from the ordinary as though they were criminals to be separated from the rest of society.
- iii. heredity and wealth are no longer important factors in determining position in society. One achieves status by one's efforts and abilities.
- iv. the system leaves behind the mediocre by a process of selection leaving fewer and fewer people to move up the educational ladder.

- v. Individual interests among children should be promoted, instead of making them learn from text books.
- vi. Education should be oriented to cope with the problems arising out of social and technological changes.

You will agree that these ideas are as relevant in our own context as they were when Leach delivered changes.

The skillful writer, keenly aware of the various relationships among the ideas about which he is going to write, must establish the order in which he is going to deal with the ideas. Logic in Leach's case determines the order. He has first dealt with the premise that the formal education system instils competitiveness. Having dealt with this premise he draws his own conclusions. Moving from less important material to more important material or from easier to more difficult material or from less controversial to more controversial are commonly used as a means of ordering material. We see that a properly formulated guiding purpose plays a major role in determining the order of ideas.

About intelligence and methods of measuring intelligence, Leach takes into account the two views put forth by teachers and parents on the subject and then makes his own synthesis. For this refer to paras 12 and 13. Leach's contention is that teachers believe that intelligence varies from person to person and that a teacher can measure intelligence by filling the student's mind with a lot of information and testing his ability to reproduce it through examinations.

Parents on the contrary, feel that all children have the same intellectual potential. However, to promote a child to do well in life, he should be sent to a privileged school; or else the child must be pressurized into doing well in examinations.

Leach's handling of divergent views on intelligence shows how a skillfull writer illustrates that a subordinate element can be adequately treated, its significance and relationship to the main line of argument made clear and yet its subordinate position maintained. The mark of maturity is being aware that few opinions can be held without giving credit to the validity of an opposing opinion.

Having understood these two extreme views on intelligence, now reproduce Leach's views on intelligence.

Does he not say that heredity is a significant factor in determining intelligence?. Education or parental devotion cannot improve intelligence. Even the development of potential skills is determined by experiences soon after birth. The faculties which constitute intelligence are: powers of perception, memory, vocabulary, logical facility, curiosity, scepticism, persistence, the ability to make unexpected associations and so on.

What is the key role of education in relation to society as suggested by Leach?

with training people to exercise their intellectual faculties creatively and for constructive purposes, to enable men to live in harmony in society.

9.2.4 Style

As we know, the text we have just read was broadcast over the radio. As such the style is suitably oratorical and public. The British insistence on 'self-identification' is gradually introduced by taking into account the 'isolated loneliness' – the hallmark of British upbringing and its consequences. This attitude of the British is compared and contrasted with that of the Orient. Having, thus, built on the premise that English formal schooling is 'viciously competitive', he proves by force of argument, logical sequencing of ideas, reasoning and analysis the dangers of such an education. Leach transacts with the reader in a way that the reader's responses are guided carefully over the various aspects of the argument.

Look at the tone itself which is sometimes fervent: "Let's try to get this straight. We instill competitive values into our children from entirely dishonest motives". "Oh, I know this is very Utopian"; mocking and sarcastic: 'We are told that we must segregate the clever just as we must segregate the criminal.....', 'If you can't afford to send your son to Eton then the next best thing is cut-throat competition – to the death'. At its best, the tone of his writing is ironical: 'The aim is to discover and cultivate the powers of latent leadership in the few with total disregard for the emotional suffering that this imposes on the many;' 'It ought to be possible to manage things in a different way so that we go forward into the future together, collaborating as a team instead of looking around for every possible opportunity to knife each other in the back'.

There are a few allusions to literature: 'this is very Utopian', to Das Kapital "from each according to his capacity; to each according to his needs."

To support his argument that great men are temperamentally unorthodox, – he gives examples of great men like Newton, Darwin, Marx, Freud and Picasso.

Leach is most metaphorical when most earnest. He does not use metaphors as a substitute for thought or as ornamentation. His thoughts are expressed as metaphors: 'carrot of financial reward', social 'jigsaw of society', 'hag-ridden', etc.

His choice of words is also governed by his concern to study men in relation to society. The use of words and phrases point out the social behaviour pattern: class stratification, social mobility, jigsaw of society, ethic of fratricide, divergent unorthodox kinds of intelligence, conformist orthodox, etc. These words are used in key positions as they help Leach to advance his argument.

1. Though the purpose of expository writing is primarily to explain ideas, facts or beliefs, a writer often uses argument to persuade the reader to accept the writer's point of view as correct. What arguments does the author give to prove the negative role of competitive examinations? (You may refer to paragraphs 6, 7, 8, 9, and 12).

2. About intelligence and methods of measuring intelligence, Leach first discusses the two views put forth by teachers and parents and then makes his own synthesis. Sum up the two views and the author's comment by referring to paras 12 and 13.
3. Does the author lend support to his arguments by citing examples of revolutionary thinkers and scientists? In what context does he quote them?

9.3 LET US SUM UP

In this unit we have discussed a passage of expository prose from the point of view of skilful organization of ideas, the use of argument to persuade while explaining and drawing to a logical and convincing conclusion. We have also seen features of literary style.

 - i. A child who does well in examinations is alone considered self reliant and equipped with latent powers of leadership. This causes psychological hardships for those who lag behind, often driving them to suicide.
 - ii. Both the public and private schools separate the students on the basis of wealth and merit. The clever are separated from the ordinary as though they are criminals to be separated from the rest of society.
 - iii. Examinations are not a true test of intelligence, competitive examinations only test the students' ability to do well in examinations.
 - iv. It promotes a system of segregation; the more successful you are in passing examination, leaving others behind, the more alone and afraid you become.
2. About intelligence and methods of measuring intelligence, Leach takes into account the two views put forth by teachers and parents. Teachers believe the intelligence varies from person to person and a teacher can measure intelligence by filling the student's mind with a lot of information and testing his ability to reproduce it through examination. Parents, on the other hand, feel that children have the same intellectual potential. However, for a child to fare well in life, he should be sent to a privileged school, or else the child must be pressurized to do well in examinations. Leach's own views are that intelligence is largely inborn. It is a complex affair involving mental and psychological qualities. The faculties which constitute intelligence are: powers of perception, memory, vocabulary, logical facility, curiosity, scepticism, persistence, the ability to make unexpected associations and so on.

3. He cites the examples of revolutionary thinkers and scientists – men like Newton, Darwin, Freud, Marx and Picasso— who brought significant changes in the thinking and ideas of people by contributing new ideas to available knowledge. If they had restricted their thinking to old scientific ideas and outdated political theories, they could not have contributed significantly to scientific advancement and the growth of human thought.

10.0 OBJECTIVES

In this unit we will study the various kinds of rhetorical strategies employed in an expository piece, especially one that is prominently philosophical and contemplative in nature, like Rabindranath Tagore’s “The Artist”.

After reading this passage you will be able to:

- understand how an argument is structured around a central thesis
- understand the importance of orderly development of coherent logic to an expository piece
- understand the importance of the inner consistency of the argument
- identify the various rhetorical and textual strategies employed by the author to make his own line of reasoning about the topic more assertive and convincing.

10.1 INTRODUCTION

In this unit we will try and understand one of the key stylistic aspects of a good expository piece. Expository texts could include essays, speeches, journals, government documents, newspaper and magazine articles, book reviews, tutorial assignments, instructions among other things. While each type of text shares certain characteristics with the others, they each make their own demands on the reader through the unique use of structure, devices, features, and conventions. Students need to know how to read each type as they encounter it if they are to read them successfully.

Unlike previous units, the essay below is purely reflective and abstract in nature which is to mean that substantiating its argument through laid down, verifiable facts is not going to be possible for the author. This renders his purpose of convincing you about the significance of art and the artist in society far more difficult than usual. He has to resort to creating abstract categories useful to his own thesis and to explain intangible yet relevant relationships between these categories. Therefore, through this unit you will learn a very important requirement of a good expository passage, namely the coherence and inner consistency of argument.

10.2 PASSAGE FROM RABINDRANATH TAGORE'S "THE ARTIST"

Rabindranath Tagore (1861-1941) also known by his sobriquet Gurudev, a poet, playwright, painter, novelist, musician and educator, was a key figure of the Bengali cultural Renaissance. His main works include Geetanjali, Gora, Ghare-Bhaire, and various short stories, novels, poems and plays. His vast repertoire of the stylised rabindrasangeet has given at least two nations, Bangladesh and India, their national anthems. The passage below is one amongst a series of lectures and articles that he wrote on the topic of Art. He was also a talented painter.

The fundamental desire of life is the desire to exist. It claims from us a vast amount of training and experience about the necessities of livelihood. Yet it does not cost me much to confess that the food that I have taken, the dress that I wear, the house where I have my lodging, represent a stupendous knowledge, practice and organisation which I helplessly lack; for I find that I am not altogether despised for such ignorance and inefficiency. Those who read me seem fairly satisfied that I am nothing better than a poet or perhaps a philosopher – which latter reputation I do not claim and dare not hold through the precarious help of misinformation.

It is quite evident in spite of my deficiency that in human society I represent a vocation, which though superfluous has yet been held worthy of commendation. In fact, I am encouraged in my rhythmic futility by being offered moral and material incentives for its cultivation. If a foolish blackbird did not know how to seek its food, to build its nest, or to avoid its enemies, but specialized in singing, its fellow creatures, urged by their own science of genetics, would dutifully allow it to starve and perish. That I am not treated in a similar fashion is the evidence of an immense difference between the animal existence and the civilization of man. His great distinction dwells in the indefinite margin of life in him which affords a boundless background for his dreams and convictions. And it is in this realm of freedom that he realizes his divine dignity, his great human truth, and is pleased when I as a poet sing victory to him, to man the self-revealer, who goes on exploring ages of creation to find himself in perfection.

Reality, in all its manifestations, reveals itself in the emotional and the imaginative background of our mind. We know it, not because we can think about it, but because we directly feel it. And therefore, even if rejected by the logical mind, it is not banished by the consciousness. As an incident it may be beneficial or injurious, but as a revelation its value lies in the fact it offers us an experience through emotion or imagination; we feel ourselves in a special field of realisation. This feeling itself is delightful when it is not accompanied by any great physical or moral risks; we love to feel even fear or sorrow if it is detached from all practical consequences. This is the reason of our enjoyment of tragic dramas, in which the feeling of pain rouses our consciousness to a white heat of intensity.

The reality of my own self is immediate and indubitable to me. Whatever effects me in a like manner is real for myself, and it inevitably attracts and occupies my attention for its own sake, blends itself with my personality, making it richer and larger and causing it delight. My friend may not be beautiful, useful, rich or great, but he is real for me; in him I feel my own extension and my joy.

The consciousness of the real within me seeks for its own corroboration the touch of the real outside me. When it fails, the self in me is depressed. When our surroundings are monotonous and insignificant, having no emotional reaction upon our mind, we become vague to ourselves. For we are like pictures, whose reality is helped by the background if it is sympathetic. The punishment we suffer in solitary confinement consists in the obstruction to the relationship between the world of reality and the real in ourselves, causing the latter to become indistinct in a haze of inactive imagination: our person is blurred, we miss the companionship of our own being through the diminution of ourselves. The world of our knowledge is enlarged for us through the extension of our information; the world of our personality grows in its area with a large and deeper experience of our personal self in our own universe through sympathy and imagination. In the dim twilight of insensitiveness a large part of our world remains to us like a procession of nomadic shadows. According to the stages of our consciousness we have more or less been able to identify ourselves with this world, if not as a whole, at least in fragments; and our enjoyment dwells in that wherein we feel ourselves thus united. In art we express the delight of this unity by which this world is realized as humanly significant to us. I have my physical, chemical and biological self; my knowledge of it extends through the extension of my knowledge of the physical, chemical and biological world. I have my personal self, which has its communication with our feelings, sentiments and imaginations, which lends itself to be coloured by our desires and shaped by our imageries.

Science urges us to occupy by our minds the immensity of the knowable world; our spiritual teacher enjoins us to comprehend by our soul the infinite spirit which is in the depth of the moving and changing facts of the world; the urging of our artistic nature is to realize the manifestation of personality in the world of appearance, the reality of existence which is in harmony with the real within us. Where this harmony is not deeply felt, there we are aliens and feel perpetually homesick. For man by nature is an artist; he never receives passively and accurately in his mind a physical representation of things around him. There goes on a continual adaptation, a translation of facts into human imagery, through constant touches sentiments and imagination. The animal has the geography of its place; man has his country, the geography of his personal self. The vision of it is not merely physical; it has its artistic unity, it is perpetual creation. In his country, his consciousness being unobstructed, man extends his relationship, which is of his own creative personality. In order to live efficiently man must know facts and their laws. In order to be happy he must establish harmonious relationship with all things with which he has dealings. Our creation is the modification of relationship.

The great men who appear in our history remain in our mind not as a static fact but as a living historical image. The sublime suggestion of their lives becomes blended into a noble consistency in legends made living in the life of ages. Those men with whom we live constantly modify in our minds, making them more real to us than they would be in a bare presentation. Men's ideal of womanhood and women's ideal of manliness are created by the imagination through mental grouping of qualities and conducts according to our hopes and desires, and men and women consciously and unconsciously move towards its attainment. In fact, they reach a degree of reality for each other according to their success in adapting these respective ideals to their own nature. To say that these ideals are imaginary and therefore not true is wrong in man's case. His true life is in his own creation, which represents the infinity of man. He is naturally indifferent to things that merely exist; they must have some ideal value for him, and then only his consciousness fully recognizes them as real. Men are never true in their isolated self, and their imagination is the faculty that brings before their mind the vision of their own greater being.

We can make truth ours by actively modulating its inter-relations. This is the work of art; for reality is not based in the substance of things but in the principle of relationship. Truth is the infinite pursued by metaphysics; fact is the infinite pursued by science, while reality is the definition of the infinite which relates truth to the person. Reality is human; it is what we are conscious of, by which we are affected, that which we express. When we are intensely aware of it, we are aware of ourselves and that gives us delight. We live in it, we always widen its limits. Our arts and literature represent this creative activity which is fundamental in man.

But the mysterious fact about it is that though the individuals are separately seeking their expression, their success is never individualistic in character. Men must find and feel and represent in all their creative works man the eternal, the creator. Their civilization is a continual discovery of the transcendental humanity. In whatever it fails it shows the failure of the artist, which is the failure in expression; and that civilization perishes in which the individual thwarts the revelation of the universal. For reality is the truth of man, who belongs to all times, and any individualistic madness of men against man cannot thrive for long.

Man is eager that his feeling for what is real to him must never die; it must find an imperishable form. The consciousness of this self of mine is so intensely evident to me that it assumes the character of immortality. I cannot imagine that it ever has been or can be non-existent. In a similar manner all things that are real to me are for myself eternal, and therefore worthy of a language that has a permanent meaning. We know individuals who have the habit of inscribing their names on the walls of some majestic monument of architecture. It is a pathetic way of associating their own names with some works of art which belongs to all times and to all men. Our hunger for reputation comes from our desire to make objectivity real that which is inwardly real to us. He who is inarticulate is insignificant, like a dark star that cannot prove itself. He ever waits for the artist to give him his fullest worth, not for anything specially excellent in him but for the wonderful fact that he is what he certainly is, that he carries in him the eternal mystery of being.

A Chinese friend of mine while travelling with me in the streets of Peking suddenly exclaimed with vehement enthusiasm: "Look here is a donkey!"

Surely it was an utterly ordinary donkey, like an indisputable truism, needing no special introduction from him. I was amused but it made me think. The animal is generally classified as having certain qualities that are not recommendable and then hurriedly dismissed. It was obscured to me by an envelopment of commonplace associations; I was lazily certain that I knew it and therefore I hardly saw it. But my friend, who possessed the artistic mind of China, did not treat it with a cheap knowledge but could see it afresh and recognize it as real. When I say real I mean that it did not stay at the outskirts of his consciousness tied to a narrow definition, but it easily blended in his imagination, produced a vision, a special harmony of lines, colors and life and movement, and became intimately his own. The admission of a donkey in a drawing-room is violently opposed; yet there is no prohibition against it finding a place in a picture which may be admiringly displayed on the drawing-room wall.

The only evidence of truth in art exists when it compels us to say, "I see." A donkey we may pass by in nature, but a donkey in art we must acknowledge even if it be a creature that disreputably ignores all its natural history responsibility, even if it resembles a mushroom in its head and a palm-leaf in its tail.

In the Upanishad it is said in a parable that there are two birds sitting on the same bough, one of which feeds and the other looks on. This is an image of the mutual relationship of the infinite being and the finite self. The delight of the bird which looks on is great, for it is a pure and free delight. There are both of these words in man himself, the objective one with its business of life, the subjective one with its disinterested joy of vision.

A child comes to me and commands me to tell her a story. I tell her of a tiger which is disgusted with the black stripes on its body and comes to my frightened servant demanding a piece of soap. The story gives my little audience immense pleasure, the pleasure of a vision, and her mind cries out, "It is here, for I see!" She knows a tiger in the book of natural history, but she can see the tiger in the story of mine.

I am sure that even this child of five knows that it is an impossible tiger that is out on its untigerly quest of an absurd soap. The delightfulness of the tiger for her is not in its beauty, its usefulness, or its probability; but in the undoubted fact that she can see it in her mind with a greater clearness of vision than she can see the walls around her- the walls that brutally shout their evidence of certainty which is merely circumstantial. The tiger in the story is inevitable, it has the character of a complete image, which offers its testimonial of truth in itself. The listener's own mind is the eyewitness whose direct experience could not be contradicted. A tiger must be like every other tiger in order that it may have its place in a book of science; there it must be a commonplace tiger to be at all tolerated. But in the story it is uncommon, it can never be reduplicated. We know a thing because it belongs to a class; we see a thing because it belongs to itself. The tiger of the story completely detached itself from all others of its kind and easily assumed a distinct individuality in the heart of the listener. The child could vividly see it, because by the help of the imagination it became her own tiger, one with herself, and this union of the subject and object gives us joy. Is it because there is no separation between them in truth, the separation being the maya, which is creation?

There come in our history occasions when the consciousness of a large multitude becomes suddenly illumined with the recognition of a reality which rises far above the dull obviousness of daily happenings. The world becomes vivid; we see, we feel it with all our soul. Such an occasion there was when the voice of Buddha reached distant shores against physical and moral impediments... then our life and our world found their profound meaning of reality in their relation to the central person who offered us emancipation of love. Men, in order to make this great experience ever memorable, determined to do the impossible; they made rocks to speak, stones to sing, caves to remember; their cry of joy and hope took immortal forms along the hills and the deserts, across barren solitudes and populous cities. A gigantic creative endeavour built up its triumph in stupendous carvings, defying obstacles that were overwhelming. Such heroic activity over the greater part of the Eastern continents clearly answers the question: "What is Art?" It is the response of man's creative soul to the call of the real.

Once there came a time, centuries ago in Bengal, when the divine love drama that made its eternal playground in human soul was vividly revealed by a personality radiating its intimate realization of God. The mind of the whole people was stirred by a vision of the world as an instrument, through which sounded an invitation to the meeting of bliss. The ineffable mystery of God's love call, taking shape in the endless panorama of colours and forms, inspired activity in music that overflowed the restrictions of classical conventionalism. Our kirtan music of Bengal came to its being like a star flung up by a burning whirlpool of emotion in the heart of the whole people, and their consciousness was aflame with a sense of reality that must be adequately acknowledged.

The question may be asked as to what place music occupies in my theory that art is for evoking in our mind the deep sense of reality in its richest aspect. Music is the most abstract of all arts, as mathematics is in the region of science. In fact these two have a deep relationship with each other. Mathematics is the logic of numbers and dimensions. It is therefore employed as the basis of our scientific knowledge. When taken out of its concrete associations and reduced to symbols, it reveals its grand structural majesty, the inevitableness of its own perfect concord. Yet there is not merely a logic but also a magic of mathematics which works at the world of appearance, producing harmony- the cadence of inter-relationship. This rhythm of harmony has been extracted from its usual concrete context, and exhibited through the medium of sound. And thus the pure essence of expressiveness in existence, is offered in music. Expressiveness finds its least resistance in sound, having freedom unencumbered by the burden of facts and thoughts. This gives us power to arouse in us an intimate feeling of reality. In the pictorial, plastic or literary arts, the object and our feelings with regard to it are closely associated, like the rose and its perfumes. In music, the feeling distilled in sound becomes itself in an independent object. It assumes a tune-form which is definite, but a meaning which is undefinable, and yet which grips our mind with a sense of absolute truth.

It is the magic of mathematics, the rhythm which is in the heart of all creation, which moves in the atom and, in its different measures, fashions gold and lead, the rose and the thorn, the sun and the planets. These are the dance steps of numbers in the arena of time and space, which weave the maya, the patterns of appearance, the incessant flow of change, that ever is and is not. It is the rhythm which churns up images from the vague and makes tangible what is elusive. This is maya, this is the art of creation, and art in literature, which is the magic of rhythm.

And must we stop here? What we know as intellectual truth, is that also not a rhythm of the relationship of facts, that weaves the pattern of theory, and produces a sense of convincingness to a person who somehow feels sure that he knows the truth? We believe any fact to be true because of a harmony, a rhythm in reason, the process of which is analyzable by the logic of mathematics, but not its result in me, just as we can count the notes but cannot account for the maya of creation, whose one important, indispensable factor in this self-conscious personality that I represent.

And the Other? I believe it is also a self-conscious personality, which has its eternal harmony with mine.

concord:	in harmony or agreement with something.

- cadence: a unit of tone or rhythm modulation in music and poetry.
- incessant: never ending, constantly.
- maya: commonly understood as the transient and illusory aspect of life, illusion; here used in its esoteric form to mean the fabric and nature of creation.

10.2.3 Discussion

Tagore’s ideas on the value of art can be broadly summarised as:

- i) Art is a uniquely human response to the mystery of creation.
- ii) The creative impulse exceeds the logic of existence and material usefulness.
- iii) An artist enriches life by responding to the call of reality and in fundamentally sharing in the divine process of creation.
- iv) Art represents the inter-relatedness of human existence.

Tagore is a philosopher inspite of the polite disclaimer that he makes in the first paragraph. But his philosophical insights on art are based on the views and ideas that he was forced to confront as a poet and an artist himself. What seems to be the drift of his argument in the first two paragraphs?

In these two paragraphs, Tagore uses his own example to argue that unlike birds and animals, humans give respect and recognition to art. He uses specific techniques to draw the reader into the relevance of the whole debate. He uses these techniques quite effortlessly so that they appear to be a seamless part of his argument. What are these techniques?

Tagore uses the autobiographical ‘I’ which helps build a direct relationship with the reader and draws a sympathetic response from them. At the same time it is also a generic ‘I’ since the assertion made applies not just specifically to Tagore but to any artist in general. Thereafter he goes on to draw a traditional analogy between an artist and a singing bird, perhaps a nightingale. But he uses it not to depict similarities but to contrast the difference between animal and human existence. The status accorded to a poet in human community gives Tagore the confidence to make his first statement about art and the aesthetic compulsion. How does Tagore describe this human compulsion in the following paragraphs? Art occurs first in the realm of imagination. What, according to Tagore, are the qualities of imaginative experience?

Human beings have the capacity to go beyond the limitedness of their day-to-day experience in the world of imagination and realise the reality of their beings more fully there. Art is an expression of this totality of existence that a person may experience through imagination. Since this experience is one which is beyond the self, it does not follow self-interest nor is it driven strictly by personal motivation. Tagore emphasises both the delight of self-validation and the joy of sharing that are a part of this process. The delight is in participating in the world of feelings even if the feelings are not altogether pleasant. Tagore argues that the impulse towards artistic expression arises from a need to re-establish more harmoniously and fully the relationship felt between the self and reality. It's in fact when the artist is able to verify this connection through his own composition that reality becomes more real for us. We are able to recognize our own feelings and experiences in those that are represented in art. In spite of the intense nature of these feelings the experiences don't put us personally at any great risk and yet we enjoy participating in them. Art also serves a heuristic purpose that is to say that one of its key impulses is our urge to explore phenomena and culminate in some realisation about them. Even when this occurs in the world of imagination it fulfils our innate curiosity about other people's experiences.

So what is this special kind of knowledge that art gives us? As you must have already realised Tagore's is a very philosophical contemplation and by the very nature of the subject matter it is quite abstract. The argument is very much in the realm of ideas without much factual information or social or scientific data to support it. Therefore it becomes imperative to proceed logically with a carefully unfolding rationale guiding the argument. Tagore is able to raise profound questions and provide credible answers only because of this logical procedure underlying his own thought. He is not in the business of making extreme assertions without the support of rigorous argument and verification. In the following paragraphs he resorts to a strategy useful to anyone writing an expository piece which is that of classification and categorising different aspects of the debate. What are these broad categories that he uses to answer the questions about artistic knowledge?

The categories are those of science, spirituality and art.

Science provides us with information about the phenomenal world and thus responds to intellectual stimuli. Spirituality is a metaphysical response to knowing the absolute and eternal truth. Art therefore seems to perform a very special function which is to represent the ever shifting aspects of human experience.

Tagore believes the artistic process to be a quality innate to human beings. In that he does not valorise the poet as a special individual occupying privilege position vis-à-vis reality but perhaps one who is unfettered by the mundane matters of existence and one who has a more pronounced and developed sense of artistic unity. He also rejects in passing the tabula rasa theory of the human mind, grounded as it is, in European empiricism, which says that a mind is a blank slate taking in passive impressions. He instead argue that man's nature is essentially creative and transforming.

Argument regarding knowledge and reality being built into three distinct categories, art being the most personal, human category in these. According to Tagore, Art is the medium that is best suited to represent general feelings and sentiments and to realise universally accepted truths. Thus it would be correct to say that Tagore's idea of art is humanistic.

When one presents a thesis one must also convince a wide range of readership of not only applicability of the thesis but the way in which the supposition can be deduced through the use of some credible examples. Examples are an excellent way to support your own speculations. What are the examples that Tagore use to substantiate his argument? Where are these taken from?

Tagore substantiates with the help of examples drawn both from personal life and scriptural sources. Personal anecdotes add a narrative angle to even the most dryly intellectual of hypothesis. They can be persuasive and also very entertaining. He follows his amusing anecdote about his Chinese friend and the donkey with perhaps the most logical inferences. The sheer joy that animates his story of the little girl who can see the tiger in her 'mind's eye' is equally powerful in convincing one of the awe inspiring qualities of even the most far-fetched stories.

The example of the two birds has the weight of scriptural authority behind it. . Tagore borrows heavily from ancient Hindu metaphysical debates about the nature of reality and how it is apprehended. The entire relationship between self and reality in Tagore's article is seeped in ancient Upanishadic theories of existence and cognition. It comes as no surprise then that the argument reaches a more esoteric level of talking in terms of maya and 'the self-conscious personality'.

Tagore then goes on to elucidate art not just as individual expression but as collective enterprise. He mentions two historical examples of the organisation of artistic inspiration in collective, social terms. What are these? What inference does he draw from these examples?

The examples are taken from the cultural efflorescence that followed in the wake of such divinely inspired personalities such as Gautam The Buddha and the medieval bhakti saint Chaitanya Mahaprabhu. Not only do these examples impress upon us the widespread social change that such divine inspiration can bestow, but also the many artistic forms which benefit from such spontaneously creative individuals.

The latter example takes Tagore to another subject close to his heart, music. Not only was Tagore an accomplished pianist and musician, he also contributed avidly to modern Bengali music through his repertoire of original songs and compositions. Being both abstract and immediately real at the same time, music for Tagore exemplifies the ability of art to communicate the intangibles of human experience in its purest form. In its weaving together of rhythm, melody, tone and mood, Tagore finds music not just resembling life but almost symbolic of the act of creation.

10.2.4 Style

Tagore uses a fairly wide variety of styles and literary-linguistic registers given the subject matter. As established earlier, the subject is very philosophical in nature and touches upon topics ranging from psychological and social relevance of art to questions of knowledge, reality and various modes of apprehending reality etc.

Tagore begins on an autobiographical note which is very cleverly juxtaposed with the very general observations about art related topics such as the uselessness of art to questions of physical existence. In spite of the formality of tone quite necessary for such a passage, Tagore develops a rapport with the reader through the use of self-berating humour. It also additionally gives a very self-reflexive, contemplative tone to the passage and one feels as if the writer is turning around his own life and work in his mind.

In the second paragraph, he uses an analogy between the artist and a singing bird which has been used in many a conventional poem and parable. But he develops the comparison to show that a bird utterly devoted to singing might die of hunger but a poet such as himself will be provided for by a society appreciative of the value of his art. Comparison therefore becomes a useful logical tool to establish an important point about the human pursuit of art. So quite early in the essay we realise that there are advanced conceptual tools which are being used to develop the central point in an orderly, coherent fashion.

But one must not forget that Tagore is a poet at heart and his intense lyricism frequently punctuates the logical progression of his ideas. For example, towards the end of the second paragraph when he is expected to make a mere statement based on what he has surmised from the preceding poet-bird comparison, what we instead get is a free flow of effect oriented poetic rhetoric. The effect is so extraordinary that it makes you feel as if the writer himself has been freed of logical encumbrances and hurled himself into the world of imagination. The use of the hyperbole suggests sudden intensification following the opening out of imaginative vistas and a freedom that an artist experiences when moving untrammelled in this world of imagination.

Immediately Tagore launches into the language of feeling. He has to talk about human feelings and the relationship that art mediates between a harsh external reality and the internal need to revive the soul with fuller emotions. Noteworthy is the precise and well controlled articulation of emotional processes belonging to the sphere of feeling. These, whether it is joy at the sense of fulfilment or mental torpor at the sense of loss, are being not just described but theorised in the context of the relationship between self and reality. Therefore the general thrust of ideas is still towards conceptualising as belonging not only to artists or the Upanishadic doctrines but also to the common everyday world of the marketplace, something that even a child can experience. It helps in broadening the scope of the issue. The repetitive use of rhetorical sentences adds to the gravity and the intensity of the conclusion.

- 2) Both human and animals are similar in their aspect of creating beautiful things. Yet it is only human beings who can appreciate this beauty in all its forms. This aesthetic impulse or the appreciation of beauty is what distinguishes man from bird and beast.
Human beings are able to transcend questions of physical existence. Human beings are able to transcend questions of usefulness and appreciate something quite as useless as art. This is because of the human faculty of realizing the importance of reality in the emotional, imaginative background of the mind.
- 3) Art helps man transcend his mundane day-to-day existence and realise the nature of reality in its wholeness.
Art helps man realise the harmony that exists between him and the external phenomenal world. It brings out the unique character of the thing that it represents even if that be something so common and absurd as a donkey.
Above all, art is the most natural response of man to the call of reality. It is an expression of truth known through inspired minds. It is capable of generating mass movements.
Art is able to capture the mystery of human creation.

11.0 OBJECTIVES

In this unit we shall study another essay entitled 'Notes on the English Character' by E.M. Forster.

After completing the unit you will be familiar with:

- the antithetical method of developing expository prose,
- the use of comparison and contrast in explaining a point,
- narrative support to illustrate an argument,
- features of a semi-formal style of writing and
- the role of metaphor in explaining abstract concepts.

11.1 INTRODUCTION

In this unit on expository prose that we have studied so far we have been discussing how ideas are organized in a proper sequence, what are the techniques of developing an argument and the features of style. In this unit, we shall introduce you to yet another technique of developing expository prose, namely antithesis. When we talk of antithesis we mean that contrasting ideas can be put together in such a manner so as to produce an effect of balance. Antithesis helps the writer to give equal weightage to both sides of an argument so that the reader/audience can make an intelligent choice and come to a logical conclusion.

In the passage that follows, you will discover that the writer pays due attention to features of good exposition while elaborating the two view points on Englishmen. His plan is as follows:

- i. Introduction
- ii. Statement of the case
- iii. Proof in support of the case
- iv. Conclusion.

11.2 ESSAY BY E.M. FORSTER 'NOTES ON THE ENGLISH CHARACTER'

E.M. Forster (1879-1979) wrote only five novels, but is ranked among the best writers of the first half of the twentieth century. Howards End (1910) and A Passage to India (1924) both deal delicately with relationships, the former between individuals, and the latter between races. Forster is known for attacking the insularity, shallowness and smugness of the English middle-class. In this essay he analyses the 'underdeveloped' emotional nature of Englishmen and shows that they are not as unfeeling as they appear to be. They are misunderstood because they measure out their emotional responses prudently. We have selected this passage to show how skilful Forster is in expressing his sensitive perceptions. Also when the style of writing is semi-formal, the vocabulary expresses a certain tone which relates to the writer's attitude towards the subject. The discussion that follows will examine some of these issues.

I had better let the cat out of the bag at once and record my opinion that the character of the English is essentially middle class. There is a sound historical reason for this, for, since the end of the eighteenth century, the middle classes have been the dominant force in our community. They gained wealth by the Industrial Revolution, political power by the Reform Bill of 1832; they are connected with the rise and organization of the British Empire; they are responsible for the literature of the nineteenth century. Solidity, caution, integrity, efficiency, lack of imagination, hypocrisy. These qualities characterize the middle classes in every country, but in England they are national characteristics also, because only in England have the middle classes been in power for one hundred and fifty years. Napoleon, in his rude way, called us 'a nation of shopkeepers'. We prefer to call ourselves 'a great commercial nation' – it sounds more dignified – but the two phrases amount to the same. Of course there are other classes; there is an aristocracy, there are the poor. But it is on the middle classes that the eye of the critic rests—just as it rests on the poor in Russia and the aristocracy in Japan. Russia is symbolized by the peasant or the factory worker; Japan by the samurai; the national figure of England is Mr. John Bull with his top hat, his comfortable clothes, his substantial stomach, and his substantial balance at the bank. St. George may caper on banners and in the speeches of politicians, but it is John Bull who delivers the goods. Even Saint George – if Gibbon is correct – wore a top hat once; he was an army contractor and supplied indifferent bacon. It all amounts to the same in the end.

Just as the heart of England is the middle classes, so the heart of the middle classes is the public-school system. This extraordinary institution is local. It does not even exist all over the British Isles. It is unknown in Ireland, almost unknown in Scotland (countries excluded from my survey), and though it may inspire other great institutions – Aligarh, for example, and some of the schools in the United States – it remains unique, because it was created by the Anglo-Saxon middle classes, and can flourish only where they flourish. How perfectly it expresses their character – far better, for instance, than does the university, into which social and spiritual complexities have already entered.

With its boarding-houses, its compulsory games, its system of prefects and fagging, its insistence on good form and on esprit de corps, it produces a type whose weight is out of all proportion to its numbers.

On leaving his school, the boy either sets to work at once – goes into the army or into business, or emigrates – or else proceeds to the university, and after three or four years enters some other profession – becomes a barrister, doctor, civil servant, schoolmaster, or journalist. (If through some mishap he does not become a manual worker or an artist). In all these careers his education, or the absence of it, influences him. Its memories influence him also. Many men look back on their school days as the happiest of their lives. They remember with regret that golden time when life, though hard, was not yet complex; when they all worked together and played together and thought together, so far as they thought at all; when they were taught that school is the world in miniature, and believed that no one can love his country who does not love his school. And they prolong that time as best as they can by joining their Old Boys' Society; indeed some of them remain Old Boys and nothing else for the rest of their lives. They attribute all good to the school. They quote the remark that 'the battle of Waterloo was won on the playing fields of Eton'. It is nothing to them that the remark is inapplicable historically and was never made by the Duke of Wellington, and that the Duke of Wellington was an Irishman. They go on quoting it because it expresses their sentiments; they feel that if the Duke of Wellington didn't make it he ought to have, and if he wasn't an Englishman he ought to have been. And they go forth into a world that is not entirely composed of public-school men or even of Anglo-Saxons, but of men who are as various as the sand of the sea; into a world of whose richness and subtlety they have no conception. They go forth into it with well developed bodies, fairly developed minds, and undeveloped hearts. An undeveloped heart – not a cold one. The difference is important, and on it my next note will be based.

For it is not that the Englishman can't feel – it is that he is afraid to feel. He has been taught at his public-school that feeling is bad form. He must not express great joy or sorrow, or even open his mouth too wide when he talks – his pipe might fall out if he did. He must bottle up his emotions, or let them out only on a very special occasion.

Once upon a time (this is an anecdote) I went for a week's holiday on the Continent with an Indian friend. We both enjoyed ourselves and were sorry when the week was over, but on parting our behaviour was absolutely different. He was plunged in despair. He felt that because the holiday was over all happiness was over until the world ended. He could not express his sorrow too much. But in me the Englishman came out strong. I reflected that we should meet again in a month or two, and could write in the interval if we had anything to say; and under these circumstances I could not see what there was to make a fuss about. It wasn't as if we were parting forever or dying. 'Buck up', I said, 'do buck up.' He refused to buck up, and I left him plunged in gloom.

The conclusion of the anecdote is even more instructive. For when we met the next month our conversation threw a good deal of light on the English character. I began by scolding my friend. I told him that he had been wrong to feel and display so much emotion upon so slight an occasion; that it was inappropriate. The word 'inappropriate' roused him to fury. 'What?' he cried. 'Do you measure out your emotions as if they were potatoes?' I did not like the simile of the potatoes, but after a moment's reflection I said, 'Yes, I do; and what's more, I think I ought to. A small occasion demands a little emotion, just as a large occasion demands a great one. I would like my emotions to be appropriate. This may be measuring them like potatoes, but it is better than slopping them about like water from a pail, which is what you did.' He did not like the simile of the pail. 'If those are your opinions, they part us forever,' he cried, and left the room. Returning immediately, he added: 'No – but your whole attitude toward emotion is wrong. Emotion has nothing to do with appropriateness. It matters only that it shall be sincere. I happened to feel deeply. I showed it. It doesn't matter whether I ought to have felt deeply or not'.

This remark impressed me very much. Yet I could not agree with it, and said that I valued emotion as much as he did, but used it differently; if I poured it out on small occasions I was afraid of having none left for the great ones, and of being bankrupt at the crisis of life. Note the word 'bankrupt'. I spoke as a member of a prudent middle class nation, always anxious to meet my liabilities. But my friend spoke as an Oriental, and the Oriental has behind him a tradition, not of middle class prudence, but of kindly munificence and splendour. He feels his resources are endless, just as John Bull feels his are finite. As regards material resources, the Oriental is clearly unwise. Money isn't endless. If we spend or give away all the money we have, we haven't any more, and must take the consequences, which are frequently unpleasant. But, as regards the resources of the spirit, he may be right. The emotions may be endless. The more we express them, the more we may have to express.

True love in this differs from gold and clay,
That to divide is not to take away, says Shelley. Shelley, at all events, believes that the wealth of spirit is endless; that we may express it copiously, passionately, and always; and that we can never feel sorrow or joy too acutely.

In the above anecdote, I have figured as a typical Englishman. I will now descend from that dizzy and somewhat unfamiliar height, and return to my business of note taking. A note on the SLOWNESS of the English character. The Englishman appears to be cold and unemotional because he is really slow. When an event happens, he may understand it quickly enough with his mind, but he takes quite a while to feel it. Once upon a time a coach, containing some Englishmen and some Frenchmen, was driving over the Alps. The horses ran away, and as they were dashing across a bridge the coach caught on the stonework, tottered, and nearly fell into the ravine below. The Frenchmen were frantic with terror: they screamed and gesticulated and flung themselves about, as Frenchmen would. The Englishmen sat quite calm. An hour later the coach drew up at an inn to change horses, and by that time the situations were exactly reversed. The Frenchmen had forgotten all about the danger, and were chattering gaily; the Englishmen had just begun to feel it, and one had a nervous breakdown and was obliged to go to bed. We have here a clear physical difference between the two races – a difference that goes deep into character. The Frenchmen responded at once; the Englishmen responded in time. They were slow and they were also practical. Their instinct forbade them to throw themselves about in the coach, because it was more likely to tip over if they did. They had this extraordinary appreciation of FACT that we shall notice again and again. When a disaster comes, the English instinct is to do what can be done first, and to postpone the feeling as long as possible. Hence they are splendid at emergencies. No doubt they are brave – no one will deny that – but bravery is partly an affair of the nerves, and the English nervous system is well equipped for meeting a physical emergency. It acts promptly and feels slowly. Such a combination is fruitful, and anyone who possesses it has gone a long way toward being brave. And when the action is over, then the Englishman can feel.

There is one more consideration – a most important one. If the English nature is cold, how is it that it has produced a great literature and a literature that is particularly great in poetry? Judged by its prose, English literature would not stand in the first rank. It is its poetry that raises it to the level of Greek, Persian, or French. And yet the English are supposed to be so unpoetical. How is this? The nation that produced the Elizabethan drama and the Lake Poets cannot be a cold, unpoetical nation. We can't get fire out of ice. Since literature always rests upon national character, there must be in the English nature hidden springs of fire to produce the fire we see. The warm sympathy, the romance, the imagination, that we look for in Englishmen whom we meet, and too often vainly look for, must exist in the nation as a whole, or we could not have this outburst of national song. An undeveloped heart – not a cold one.

The trouble is that the English nature is not at all easy to understand. People talk of the mysterious East but the West also is mysterious. It has depths that do not reveal themselves at the first gaze. We know what the sea looks like from a distance; it is of one colour, and level, and obviously cannot contain such creatures as fish. But if we look into the sea over the edge of a boat, we see a dozen colours, and depth below depth, and fish swimming in them. That sea is the English character – apparently imperturbable and even. The depths and the colours are the English romanticism and the English sensitiveness – we do not expect to find such things, but they exist. And – to continue my metaphor – the fish are the English emotions, which are always trying to get up to the surface, but don't quite know how. For the most part we see them moving far below, distorted and obscure. Now and then they succeed and we exclaim, 'Why, the Englishman has emotions! He actually can feel!' And occasionally we see that beautiful creature the flying fish, which rises out of the water altogether into the air and the sunlight. English literature is a flying fish. It is a sample of the life that goes on day after day beneath the surface; it is a proof that beauty and emotion exist in the salt, inhospitable sea.

11.2.2 Glossary

let the cat out of the bag: reveal the hidden truth, the essence of the matter.

middle class: a class of people in society who are not working-class or upper class. Middle class comprises business people, managers, doctors, lawyers, and teachers. They share common social characteristics and values.

Industrial Revolution: the mechanization of industry which took place in England in the late 18th and early 19th century. This led to the rise of a new wealthy class called the Industrial class. This affected the social set-up in England.

Reform Bill of 1832: after the Industrial Revolution, the Reform Bill was passed in 1832 by the British Parliament which provided for proportionate representation in the House of Commons. It extended the franchise (right of voting) to the middle class.

samurai: Warrior class under the feudal system of Japan.

St. George and Mr Bull: figures symbolic of certain aspects of Englishmen – St. George symbolizes chivalry, that is, defending the weak against the oppressor; John Bull stands for the aggressive and confident Englishman who built the Empire and, in the later part of the nineteenth century, enjoyed the commercial domination of the world. These figures are often depicted in political cartoons.

Gibbon: Edward Gibben (1737-1794) eminent English historian, author of The History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire.

Aligarh: Aligarh Muslim University established by Sir Syed Ahmed Khan in 1877 in Aligarh, on the pattern of Oxford and Cambridge.

Anglo-Saxon:	member of the mixed race which developed after the Germanic tribes of Angles and Saxons settled in England in the 5 th and 6 th centuries, now used for persons of English descent wherever found.
prefect:	senior pupil with authority to maintain discipline
fagging:	the practice in public-schools of senior pupils making juniors work for them.
esprit de corps:	French phrase, meaning regard for the honour of the organization one belongs to.
the battle of Waterloo:	the battle in which the Duke of Wellington defeated Napoleon and changed the course of European history.
bottle up emotions:	not to express emotions for a long time.
Oriental:	the Orient refers to the East and an Oriental is a person who comes from the part of the world that includes India, China and Japan.
Elizabethan drama:	drama that flourished in Britain in Queen Elizabeth's reign, in the second half of the 16 th century. The important dramatists of this age were Shakespeare (1564-1616), Marlowe (1564-93) and Ben Jonson (1572-1637).
English romanticism:	a literary, artistic and philosophical movement originating at the end of the 18 th century but flourishing in the 19 th century characterized by an emphasis on the imagination and emotions and the exaltation of the common and primitive man, an appreciation of external nature, an interest in the remote, or the supernatural, a preference for melancholy.
the Lake Poets:	the early nineteenth century poets Wordsworth (1770-1850), Coleridge (1772-1834) and Southey (1774-1843) so called because they lived in and used the English Lake district as the setting for their nature poetry.
mysterious East:	a popular belief in the West that the East holds mysteries.
solidity:	the quality of being solid, firm or hard.
caution:	to be on one's guard, to pay careful attention to the probable effects of a step that one may take.
integrity:	the quality of possessing sound moral principles; uprightness, honesty and sincerity.
hypocrisy:	to pretend to be what one is not.

11.2.3 Discussion

Forster's observations on the character of Englishmen can be broadly stated as:

- i. statements in support of essentially middle class characteristics of Englishmen (paras 1,2,3),
- ii. concept of an undeveloped heart (para 3),

iii. comments on the undeveloped emotional nature of Englishmen (paras 9 and 10).

Forster begins with the premise that Englishmen are essentially middle class in character. Read paragraph 1. What events have helped middle classes to be powerful in Britain?

Have you also listed the following: the Industrial Revolution, Reform Bill of 1832 and the literature of the nineteenth century – Forster calls middle class characteristics national traits. What are they?

We hope you have included these traits in your response: solidity, caution, integrity, efficiency, lack of imagination and hypocrisy.

We find Forster’s essay a closely reasoned and eloquent argument on a subject of vital importance to every Englishman. Part of its power comes from its organization and the emphasis given to elaborating the argument.

Now refer to paragraph 2. Forster thinks that the English public-school system is responsible for developing middle class characteristics and values in Englishmen. In what ways is the English public-school system unique? What is its chief drawback? (For the last question please turn to lines 8-9 of para 2).

.....
.....

It is characterized by its boarding-houses, compulsory games, system of prefects and fagging, insistence on good form and esprit de corps. Its chief drawback is that it produces people, who are small in number; because the majority of people are not so fortunate as to be taught at public-schools, but who exercise tremendous influence on others because of the positions they come to occupy in society. Forster does not leave anything vague. He gives specific features of the public school system that can be termed unique. Concreteness is a necessary ingredient in exact, accurate, and efficient communication. Forster is constantly aware of abstractions that need to be made concrete, of general statements that have to be substantiated by specific examples.

In the next paragraph Forster talks of the euphoria, a feeling of great happiness and elation that the Englishmen experience when they recall the time spent in school. Why do Englishmen consider school days the golden time of their lives?

.....
.....
.....

We hope you have included the following points in your answer.

- i. Life is hard but not complicated while at school,
- ii. Pupils learn to live in harmony.
- iii. School is considered a miniature world and one who loves school must love the world.

Thereafter, in paragraph 3, there is a pun on the word 'old'. A pun is a use of words that have more than one meaning. 'Old' here refers to students who have left school after completing study. But in another sense 'old' could mean conservative, reactionary or traditional-minded or those who find it difficult to accept new ideas.

Forster is satirical when he talks of old Boys' Society's beliefs. Satire is a literary weapon directed against persons or institutions that the author believes should be corrected. The writer often describes a completely different situation, but makes indirect parallels and references to the things we know so that we realize what it is that the writer is criticizing. Satire is humorous and witty. A writer of satire aims at correcting an undesirable situation or human folly.

Now refer to para 3. What is the misconception in the minds of old boys that Forster talks about?

Anything good in life should be attributed to the education one gets in the public-school. Read further and write in a sentence on how this misconception is illustrated.

.....
.....

The battle of Waterloo was won on the playing fields of Eton.

How does Forster prove the falsity of the oft-quoted remark?

.....
.....
.....

The comment was not made by the Duke of Wellington and the Duke of Wellington was an Irishman and not an Englishman.

Refer again to para 3. Are the products of public-schools well-equipped when they go out into the wide world?

.....
.....
.....

No, because the school they have studied in is not a replica of the outside world, where they have to meet people who are as varied as the sand particles of the sea. Their rigid training at school comes in the way of their amicably adjusting in a highly complex world. They are people with sound bodies, sound knowledge but undeveloped hearts.

Now refer to the paragraph where the concept of the undeveloped heart is given. How would you distinguish between a 'cold heart' and an 'undeveloped heart'? Why is an Englishman's heart undeveloped?

A cold heart relates to a person who cannot feel. But a person who puts a restraint on his feelings is the one who has an 'undeveloped heart'. An Englishman's heart is undeveloped because he does not express his emotions, or at best expresses them only on very special occasions.

We have several methods of developing expository writing. The narrative element can act as a stimulant for further discussion and explication of the subject. The two anecdotes mentioned in paragraphs 5, 6, and 8 act as signposts to Forster's antithesis that Englishmen appear cold and unemotional but are not so.

The first anecdote in para 5 describes Forster's continental holiday with his Indian friend, at the end of which Forster behaved sensibly. He hoped to meet his friend soon, and said that they could write to each other in the interval, if they had anything to say. But the Indian friend became emotional and dejected at the time of parting. The later part of the anecdote explicates Forster's views on emotions. Whereas Forster believed that emotions should be used sparingly and on appropriate occasions, his Indian friend thought that what is important is not the occasion for emotion but the sincerity of it.

Forster is candid in his statements about his own behaviour. His inability to express his feelings to his friend relates to his training at his public-school that one should exercise restraint in feeling great joy or sorrow.

Comparison and contrast act as tools of exposition. Comparison has the following uses:

- a. to explain related ideas to illustrate a point;
- b. to convince in an argument that one element is superior, more important, or more useful than the other.

In para 7 we have comparison of attitudes. (Comparison by aspects could be more effective and more specific than comparison of the whole units.) Forster compares the Western man's and the Oriental's attitudes towards materials. The middle class Englishman is wise in spending money whereas the Oriental is generous. The Englishman thinks his resources are limited, so he should not spend lavishly just as the Oriental feels that his resources are unlimited so that he can afford to spend lavishly. Also the Oriental feels emotions are endless, to be expressed endlessly, the Englishman's views on emotions are conditioned by his prudent middleclass outlook.

In para 8 Forster relates another anecdote to prove the slowness of the English character.

Describe the anecdote in your own words.

.....
.....
.....
.....
.....
.....
.....
.....

Once a coach carrying some Englishmen and Frenchmen to the Alps, nearly fell into a deep ravine. The Frenchmen screamed and gesticulated as they were terror-stricken, but the Englishmen sat calmly. An hour after this incident, when they were safely sitting in an inn, the French chatted gaily, having forgotten the incident, whereas the English were found to be grave, one of them even suffered a nervous breakdown because they had just begun to feel the seriousness of the situation they had been in.

With the help of this anecdote Forster suggests the need to take into account the situation when in crisis. If one can act rationally and not be sentimental in a crisis one is well-equipped to meet the challenges of life.

The concluding part of this passage, where Forster comments on the unemotional nature of Englishmen, works as an antithesis to his earlier observations where he had seemingly upheld the generally accepted views on the English character. He seems to correct some of the misconceived notions about English character by argument. Read para 9. What is the most significant argument that Forster makes to prove that the English are not cold?

.....
.....
.....
.....
.....

He points to the greatness of English poetry. A nation that can produce one of the greatest literatures in the world, and in particular Elizabethan drama and the poetry of the Lake Poets, cannot be cold and unemotional. The imagination that creates literature can thrive only where emotions, imagination, romance, etc. are valued.

Lastly, Forster makes use of metaphors which cut short the abstractions of learned language and appeal to our experience and senses. As you are aware, a metaphor is a figure of speech in which we use a name or a descriptive term or phrase for an object or action to which it is not literally applicable. A metaphor suggests a comparison between two things not usually thought of as similar. Let us see the comparisons in para 10. English character is compared to a sea. The depths and colours visible in a sea are English romanticism and the English sensitivity. The fishes under the tranquil sea water are the emotions that do not easily surface. The flying fish are symbolic of the emotional richness and literary creativity of the English.

Thus the explanatory metaphors, Forster's image-making devices, explain the hidden emotional nature of Englishmen.

11.2.4 Style

Forster uses the first person pronoun to talk in a relaxed, chatty, conversational informal manner. The informal style is a suitable vehicle for communicating the whimsical view Forster holds with regard to English character. The style becomes conversational with his use of proverbs such as 'let the cat out of the bag', 'get fire out of ice,' and suggestive such as 'bottle up emotions', 'weight out of proportion to its numbers'. There are words such as 'buck up', 'make a fuss about' and striking similes such as 'measuring emotions like potatoes', 'slopping them about like water from the pail', 'as various as the sand of the sea', etc.

He uses words in new connotations such as 'bankruptcy of emotions', 'anxious to meet my liabilities', 'dizzy and somehow unfamiliar height'.

We also observe role shifting – he says the English nervous system is well equipped for meeting a physical emergency. It acts promptly and feels slowly. Such a combination, he reiterates, is fruitful, and one who possesses it is considered brave. This shift of attitude is evident in the arguments he makes such as 'If the English nature is cold, how is it that it has produced a great literature and a literature that is particularly great in poetry?'

Compare and contrast his attitude in the first half of the passage with that of the later half. In the earlier part he accepts the generally held views about English character: insularity, shallowness and smugness. He even extends reasons for such views. He accounts for the dominant role played by the middle classes, he attacks the English public school system for the kind of unrealistic education it gives.

The first shift of stance comes in paragraph 4 when he says 'for it is not that the Englishman can't feel – it is that he is afraid to feel'. The rest of the essay is a discussion on the unfeeling nature of Englishmen.

We have seen the use of metaphors and similes earlier. The language is suggestive and skilfully used to suit his change in tone and the antithetical position he assumes in the course of discussion.

12.0 OBJECTIVES

You will read four short stories in this Block. But before we begin to read them, let us look at the characteristics of the short story briefly, in this Unit. This will provide us with general guidelines on how to read a short story analytically. If you read this Unit carefully, you should be able to:

- explain what a short story is;
- outline the rise and development of the short story as a literary form;
- distinguish between a short story and a novel;
- analyze the elements of the short story.

12.1 INTRODUCTION

As you know in this course we shall study different forms of prose such as the short story, novel, essay, biography, autobiography, letters, travelogue and speeches. In this Block, we shall read four short stories. But before we do that, we shall give you an introduction to the short story as a literary form. What is a short story? When was it first written? When we read a short story, what must we look for in order to decide whether it has artistic merit or not? These are some of the questions we shall address in this Unit.

Moreover, we shall discuss the main features of a short story. This will give you some idea about how to read a short story analytically. We must, however, point out that literary appreciation does not proceed like a mathematical exercise. We cannot acquire a set of critical formulae and apply these to each and every story that we come across. Such guidelines can only be of partial help. It is only by extensive reading and close analysis of a large number of short stories that we find we are getting better with practice.

We hope that you will not only read the stories in your course but also read other stories from anthologies and magazines. We suggest that you complete the given exercises before looking at the answers provided at the end of the Unit.

12.2 CHARACTERISTICS OF A SHORT STORY

You must have noticed that most discussions of literature concentrate on the novel, drama and poetry. The short story is often regarded as a sort of poor relation, not worth serious consideration. Katherine Mansfield a famous short story writer was once asked:

‘What do you do in life’?

‘I am a writer’.

‘Do you write dramas?’

‘No’. It sounded as if she were sorry she did not.

‘Do you write tragedies, novels, romance?’ I persisted, because she looked as if she could write these. ‘No’, she said, and with still deeper distress; ‘only short stories; just short stories’.

Later on she told me she felt so wretched at that moment she would have given anything if she could have answered at least one ‘yes’ to the ‘big’ things. (Quoted in Anthony Alpers, The Life of Katherine Mansfield (1980, p. 381).

It is clear that Mansfield is apologetic about writing short stories. On the other hand, there is another practitioner of the art, Edgar Allan Poe, who believes that the short story is superior to the novel. It is not necessary to agree with either of these opinions. Let us begin with the notion that the short story is equal to any other literary genre be it poetry, drama or the novel.

12.2.1 What Is a Short Story?

We can all recognize a short story when we see one. But when it comes to defining a short story, there are problems. There are so many different kinds of short stories, that no single definition would cover all. So, at best, we can only attempt to define a short story in the most general terms.

A short story is a piece of prose fiction complete in itself and of a moderate length. This definition excludes all stories written in verse. For example, Chaucer’s Canterbury Tales, written in the closing years of the fourteenth century, can be seen as an interesting collection of stories, but as they are written in verse they cannot be taken as examples of the short story.

Moreover, a short story is different from a tale or fable because it is not just a story but a complex and developed literary form that can be traced only to the early nineteenth century. A tale is primarily an oral form. The oral tradition of story telling still exists in the villages of India where generations of children, sitting round the fire of a winter evening, still listen in awe to stories of fairies, gods and demons.

A fable is a short tale which usually conveys a moral. The characters in a fable are usually animals talking like human beings. Perhaps you are familiar with the tales of Panchatantra which is a collection of fables. Short stories are also different from parables. A parable is a story which presents a moral. The contemporary short story also has a meaning, a point to be made, but it is not a parable because that meaning in itself is not important. A short story is also different from an anecdote. An anecdote relates an interesting happening or a series of happenings or events. A short story may also present these events. But the difference lies in the fact that in a short story these happenings or events are not important in themselves but are a manifestation of the true nature and significance of a character or situation.

12.2.2 How 'Short' is a Short Story?

It is difficult to establish the average length of a short story. Edgar Allan Poe (1809-1849), an American short story writer, says that it requires 'from half an hour to one or two hours in its perusal'. Let us look at this prize-winning short story:

I was on the train from London to Edinburgh.
There was this man, seated across from me.
'Do you believe in ghosts?' he said,
'No', I said,
He disappeared.

Do you think this is a short story? It seems more like an anecdote. You will find that most stories are anecdotal but as we know, in a short story the events are not, in general important in themselves but usually highlight a character/characters or situation. The point that has to be stressed here is that we can either find very short short stories or rather long ones like those of Joseph Conrad (1857-1924) which can be called novellas. A novellas is somewhere between a short story and the novel in length. Whatever the length, it should generally be possible to complete a short story at one sitting, as Poe has suggested.

12.2.3 What is a Short Story About?

A short story has an unlimited range of possible themes just like any other literary genre. A short story may be about a particular scene, a series of connected incidents, a moral issue, an aspect of life, a phase of character or an interesting experience. In sum, a short story can be about anything.

The modern short story may not even have a story, but it is certainly fictional. A short story illuminates some aspects of life or characters. A well-written short story must convey the impression of completeness. In some stories there is no clear cut ending or resolution of the crisis; yet the effect is one of organic unity. What do we mean by organic unity? It is not just a unity of a beginning, a middle and an end. The unity lies in the way the writer has given shape to a mass of details. As we know, a writer is faced with a range of possible ways in which to write the story. S/he must select the relevant details as it is not possible to narrate everything. The writer then works these selected details into a complete organic whole. What do we mean by 'organic whole'? For example, if we cut an arm off a body, the body is no longer an organic whole but is mutilated. Just as it is not possible to remove a single limb without mutilating the body, similarly in a well-constructed short story, it should not be possible to remove a single detail.

12.2.4 What is it that Matters in a Short Story?

Is it the writer's preoccupation with form? Or does the greatness of a story depend on the extent to which it has depicted the range of human experience? Is a short story great because of the writer's technique? Or does a short story have literary merit because of its originality of theme and style? Or is it because a certain kind of story is in fashion? Or does a story matter because it has the power to move us? A short story defies exact definition. However, an effective short story must arouse and hold the reader's interest and must convey a sense of completeness, in a style that suits the content. All these elements then contribute to the final effect that the story may have.

12.3 THE SHORT STORY AND THE NOVEL

Let us now examine the similarities and differences between the short story and the novel. The novel and the short story are both written in prose, both are fictional and make use of varieties of prose such as narrative and descriptive. But it is in scope that they differ. A novel is wide-ranging and long, the short story is brief and deals with a limited subject. A short story is not a novel in a condensed form. You cannot summarize a novel and call it a short story.

In the novel, you will notice, the interest is spread over a larger area. In a short story, you will find a narrower focus, but a greater concentration of interest. For instance in a novel there are many characters whereas in a short story you have only a very few characters or in some, only one. A novelist has the time and space to make his/her characters unfold and develop gradually, but the short story writer must create and reveal the characters in a few suggestive strokes.

In a novel, there is usually a main plot and several sub-plots. But in a short story you will find only one plot with one main aim. Each word used helps in furthering the aim of the story. A novel may extend over several years but a short story usually covers a more limited time span. In a novel, the narrator may indulge in meditative remarks, digressions and detailed descriptions, but the short story writer achieves his/her effects by brevity. A short story may dispense with the narrator completely and achieve his/her effects by presenting events as they occur. S/he makes use of suggestion rather than explanation. These then are some of the ways in which the short story differs from the novel. It also makes us appreciate the fact that the art of story-writing is not as simple as it may appear. It demands great mastery of technique so that an effect of brevity, unity, concentration and intensity is achieved.

We have already mentioned that the short story as a literary form only came to be written in the early nineteenth century. Let us then survey its rise and development.

12.4 THE RISE AND DEVELOPMENT OF THE SHORT STORY

Stories have always held a great fascination for us and you may remember many stories told to you as young children. Interest in stories is as old as human history. Even before the art of writing was known, early human beings must have narrated tales of the day's hunting or stories of gods and demons to one another. These were probably transmitted by word of mouth from one generation to the next. The oldest recorded example is probably the Egyptian tale of The Two Brothers dating from 3200 B.C. The Jataka (a collection of stories of Buddha's earlier incarnations) and Panchatantra tales (Sanskrit tales that are designed to impart worldly wisdom and are about animals) are India's contribution to the world of stories and have continued to interest people through the ages. These along with the fables of Aesop (Greek fables with animals as characters and having a moral), stories in the Bible and the tales from the Arabian Nights are all precursors or forerunners of the short story.

12.4.1 The Rise of the Short Story

The short story as a literary form began to be written in the early nineteenth century. However, it was only in the second half of the nineteenth century that the term 'short story' was used. The rise of the short story can be attributed to:

- a) the rise of the reading public; more and more people were beginning to read fiction in the nineteenth century;
- b) the increase in the number of periodicals which could publish fiction;
- c) widespread literacy; education was now more widely accessible;
- d) hurry and pace of modern life.

The first three factors also contributed to the rise of the novel in the eighteenth century. The novels written in those days were rather lengthy. In fact, in the nineteenth century, the three-decker novel was a popular phenomenon. A single novel usually came in three volumes. These days people do not have the time to read such long stories. Short stories, on the other hand, can be read while traveling or relaxing and do not require a substantial investment of time.

12.4.2 The Development of the Short Story

The short story developed in the hands of writers many of whom were also novelists. But as you will notice, the techniques of the novelist and the short story writer are to some extent similar as well as different. This may sound a bit confusing at this stage, but it will get clearer as you read the section on the short story and the novel. This will become clear after you have read this Block as well as Block 5 on the novel.

Let us now tell you about some well-known story writers, who were masters of this art. Nathaniel Hawthorne (1804-1864) is an American novelist and short story writer. Another famous nineteenth century American short story writer is Edgar Allan Poe (1809-1849). Both have written about the unusual and the terrible. Their stories are full of horror and the supernatural. Poe's story 'The Masque of the Red Death' is worth reading.

Guy de Maupassant (1850-93), a French writer is considered one of the masters of the short story. He wrote about the private joys and sorrows of individuals rather than about momentous events. Because of his acute observation, Maupassant portrayed the world as he saw it, describing it in clear and simple prose. His stories move swiftly and logically giving only the essential details of character and situation. His stories end with a sting in the tail or an ironic twist that takes the reader by surprise. Consider, for example, the ending of his famous story 'The Necklace'. A pretty and vain young wife of a clerk aspires to a higher social status on account of her extraordinary beauty. She borrows a diamond necklace from a rich friend to wear at the Minister's ball. She is a tremendous success as even the minister notices her. But the fabulous evening carries the seeds of tragedy, for she loses the necklace. What then follows is a ten-year period of drudgery and deprivation to buy a necklace to replace the lost one. When she finally reveals this to her friend, from whom she had borrowed the necklace, the friend remarks: 'But mine was fake!' This then is the sting-in-the-tail, a technique that Anton Chekov (1860-1904), the Russian master of the story also adopted.

Chekov's stories probe the tragic element of the trivial things in life. 'The Kiss' is the story of a shy young man who during the course of a dinner-party ventures into a dark room. Here he is kissed by a young lady who had probably mistaken him for her lover. The young man builds up an absurd romantic dream around this incident which only shatters when he finally realizes that the kiss was not meant for him. Chekov explores the pathos of the situation. You will be reading a story by Chekov in this Block.

There have been great English short story writers starting with R.L. Stevenson (1850-1894). His stories feature evil action and moral corruption. Hardy's (1840-1928) Wessex Tales carry a sense of tragedy that pervades all Hardy's work. Henry James (1843-1946) and Joseph Conrad (1857-1924) were interested not so much in brevity as in form. The conventional short story has a beginning, a middle and an end. Recent stories are more open-ended, in the sense that there is no clear beginning, middle and end, as you will discover when you read the stories prescribed for you.

What about Indian short story writers? The short story as a literary form is popular in all the Indian languages and many of these short stories are translated into English. In fact the Sahitya Akademi encourages the translation of regional literatures into English and vice versa. Penguin also publishes translated short stories and if you come across Deliverance and Other Stories by Premchand and translated by David Ruben, you will find the collection most interesting. We have selected a short story by Dina Mehta for you. Mulk Raj Anand, R.K. Narayan, Raja Rao, Anita Desai and Kamala

Das are some of the famous Indian short story writers in English. That the short story is alive in India is quite clear from the fact that serials like 'Ek Kahani' are popular on TV.

The short story has developed in so many directions that it is impossible to list all the varieties within it. There are the short stories that one can find in popular periodicals and 'literary' short stories that are found in anthologies. When we buy a magazine which has short stories in it to read on a railway journey, we often find these stories racy and full of interesting incidents. We read them purely for enjoyment. On the other hand, when we read a 'literary' short story we often find that along with enjoyment, it also contributes to our understanding of life and human nature. This distinction is similar to the difference between 'highbrow' and 'lowbrow'—categories that we find applied to separate the 'popular' from what is considered great.

12.5 SOME HINTS ON READING A SHORT STORY

Whenever we read a piece of literature, whether it is a poem, a novel or a play, we respond to it in many ways. One of the responses may be that we either like it or we don't. In any case, we should be able to say why we liked it or why it did not appeal to us.

Different persons like different kinds of stories and for different reasons. One may like a story because it immediately engages our attention. But does that alone constitute the merit of a story? When we read a story, no doubt, the development of the plot arrests our immediate attention. But along with this we also notice the way language is used, the particular style, the use of images, irony and symbolism. How effectively are time and place used? Are the descriptions vivid, relevant or redundant? What point of view does the author adopt? What is the theme and what are the effects that the author wishes to achieve? These are some of the questions that we must keep in mind while reading a story.

12.5.1 Plot

Every story has a plot. It is the sequence of events or incidents of which a story is composed. These events or incidents are inter-related as one thing happens because of another. A well-constructed plot would have conflict either between individuals, groups, the individual and forces such as nature, society, etc. It would also have elements of surprise and mystery. But above all the plot must have unity—each event must grow logically out of the previous one.

12.5.2 Characters

All stories have characters. The main character is called the protagonist. How does the author present character? S/he either tells us about the character or shows him/her interacting with other characters in the story or reacting to different situations. This gives us an idea about what the character is like. How do we know if the presentation of character is successful? When the author is able to create a life-like character, we know that s/he has achieved his/her aim. It should seem as if the fictional character is someone whom we could meet in real life. In detective stories or stories where the action is dominant, characters are not significant.

As we know, in real life there are no perfectly good or purely evil characters but persons with complex virtues and vices. Similarly, fictional characters must have a range of different traits. And when we are writing a character sketch we should not repeat what a person has done but what a person is. In short, we have to pick out the traits in his/her characters and just give a summary of the story.

12.5.3 Time and Place

Each story is set in a particular time and place. The author can either tell the story in a chronological sequence or may start at the end and keep going back and forth in time. Place is equally important and you should try to identify the details that form part of the setting of the story. The next point is to try and discover how the author has tried to use setting in order to heighten the effect of the story. For example, in horror stories, the setting is usually a dark ancient castle or a bleak graveyard. Thus setting contributes to the atmosphere or mood of the story. But setting is not important in all stories. In some character may be important, in other situation. When we are reading a story, we must keep this aspect in mind.

12.5.4 Style

Each author has his/her own style. For example, it is possible to say that Mulk Raj Anand has a certain distinct style of writing but even then we must be aware that each author uses a different style in different works. When we try to analyze an author's style, we should try and determine whether his/her selection of words (diction) is precise and clear and whether the ideas or actions are conveyed vividly and powerfully. We have discussed the various literary devices and techniques used by various authors to enrich their style in Blocks 1,2, and 3 of this course.

12.5.5 The Techniques of Story-Telling

R.L. Stevenson (1850-94) has described three ways of writing a story. The writer can either begin with a plot and fit characters into it, or s/he can begin with a character and choose incidents and situations to develop it. Further an author may try to create a particular atmosphere by getting his characters and action to realize it. In earlier stories, the story-teller's personality would intrude into the narrative. In the modern short story, the author may not wish to make his/her presence felt but tries to convey the impression that the reader is witnessing or overhearing the story. The writer can make him/herself totally unobtrusive by recording the dialogue and actions objectively. In a first-person narrative, the author disappears completely and the reader enters directly into the experiences of the character/s. The author may make use of the omniscient point of view or take recourse to selective omniscience whereby we experience events from the point of view of what one or two characters see and hear. Some of the techniques of the novelist (as you will see in the next Block) are also the techniques of the short storywriter. But the story is working within the limitations of space and form therefore his/her task is all the more difficult. In a short story the author must:

Forms of Prose:
Short Story

- a) convey the impression of spontaneity;
- b) avoid intellectual comments and digressions;
- c) know when enough has been said;
- d) avoid too many explanations.

In short, as a story has limited form the writer must work by suggestion rather than by long-drawn explanations. Different elements like character, style, point of view, setting cannot be analyzed in isolation, but must be seen as part of the larger whole. What is important is how far these elements contribute to the final effect of the story.

Each story would necessarily have a different effect on different people. It is for this reason that there can be many interpretations of a particular story. What we wish to stress here is that your response to a story is as valid as that of anyone else. And as you read the stories in your course, we hope that you will not only enjoy them but will also read them analytically.

A SERVANT OF THE PEOPLE
Premchand
(Translated into English by David Rubin)

The servant of the nation said, 'there is only one way to redeem the country and that is to treat the low as brothers, the outcastes as equals. In the world we are all brothers; no one is high, no one is low'.

The world cheered. 'How sublime a vision, how compassionate a heart!'

His beautiful daughter Indira heard and was plunged into a sea of care.

The servant of the people embraced a young man of low caste.

The world said, 'He is an angel, an apostle, the pilot of the ship of state!'

Indira watched and her eyes began to glow.

The servant of the people brought the young man of low caste inside the temple into the presence of God and said, 'Our God is in poverty, in misfortune and in degradation'.

The world said, 'How pure in heart he is! How wise!'

Indira looked and smiled.

Indira went to the servant of the people and said, 'Respected father, I wish to marry Mohan'.

The servant of the people looked at her with loving eyes and asked, 'Who is Mohan?'

Indira said joyously, 'Mohan is the honest, brave and good young man you embraced and brought into the temple'.

The servant of the people looked at her with the eyes of doom and turned away.

12.6 LET US SUM UP

Let us now recapitulate what we discussed in this Unit, We have looked at:

- the main characteristics of the short story;
- the difference between a short story and a tale, fable, parable, anecdote, novella and novel;
- the rise and development of the short story as a literary form;
- the aspects to look for when reading a short story .

Why do we read short stories? No, not for getting through examinations. Not purely for enjoyment, but also because they deepen our awareness of life. By illuminating some aspect of human life or behaviour, a short story presents an insight into the nature and conditions of our existence. You will read the stories that we have selected for you in the next four Units. We hope you will find it an interesting and rewarding experience.

12.7 SUGGESTED READING

If you would like to read more about the short story as a literary form, you may like to look at the following books:

Walter Allen, The Short Story, London: Oxford University Press, 1981.

John Bayley, The Short Story: Henry James to Elizabeth Bowen, Brighton, Harvester, 1988; New York: St. Martin's Press, 1988.

If you are interested in reading some short stories by Indian authors, you might look at the anthology: Mulk Raj Anand and S. Balurao (eds.) Panorama, New Delhi, Sterling Publishers, 1986.

12.8 ANSWERS TO EXERCISES

Check Your Progress I

- i) Even though it is difficult to define a short story exactly, it is (a) a piece of prose fiction, (b) complete in itself, (c) of moderate length.

A short story as a literary form only dates back to the early nineteenth century. It is different from a tale, an anecdote and a parable.

- ii) (a) A tale is generally an oral form of story-telling and has a long history. A short story on the other hand, is a developed literary form that can be traced only to the nineteenth century.
- (b) An anecdote relates an event or a series of events. Even a short story may relate an event or a series of events but in a short story the events are not important in themselves. The focus is mainly on the character/s and situation.
- (c) A parable is a story with a moral. It is the meaning that is important. A short story has meaning, but here that is not the central point.
- iii) & (iv) Refer to Section 12.2.2 and 12.2.4.

Check Your Progress II

- i) The servant of the people seems noble indeed. Not only does he declare that all men are equal but he also embraces a young man of low caste. The public cheers as he leads this young man into the temple. The importance of this action becomes clear when we realize that when Premchand was writing, untouchability was widely prevalent in society and persons of low caste were denied entry into temples. The public adulation seems justified. It is only when Indira his own daughter expresses her desire to marry Mohan, the young man

- of low caste, that the real character of the “servant of the people” is exposed.
- ii) The title of the story is ironical. The man is only masquerading as a servant of the people. The story effectively exposes the hypocrisy and double standards of politicians who fool the public by such fake acts of virtue.
 - iii) When discussing the technique, you can take into account the following points:
 - (a) how Premchand works by suggestion rather than detail;
 - (b) the omniscient narrator who ‘shows’ the actions of the “servant of the people” on the one hand and the effect on the public on the other.
 - (c) The final sting-in-the-tail or surprise ending.

13.0 OBJECTIVES

The main objective of this Unit is to introduce you to Judah Waten and one of his famous short stories— 'Mother'. A short background of the relevance of Australian writing is also provided. A detailed analysis of the plot and characters of this story will also be undertaken.

13.1 INTRODUCTION

In the past few decades, there has been a tremendous growth of interest in literature and cultures apart from those of Britain and America which had till recently dominated the literary scene. Even in India there has been an enthusiastic upsurge of interest in these literatures, and they are being given added importance in English departments across the country. Australian literature is now being seen as an interesting subject of literary studies, with special relevance to us Indians for various reasons. The shared colonial experience led to many similarities as well as differences between the experiences of the two countries and these have found their way into the literatures of both countries. Here it must be pointed out that even though there was a history of colonialism in both the countries—there were differences in this shared colonial experience. Australia was a settler colony where the main aim of the British colonizers was to create a new British colony for their deported convicts. The British in India, however, saw trade and commerce as their main reason for being here. In spite of these differences there are many reasons why a knowledge about Australia is relevant to us as Indians.

When we study literature from Australia, not only do we develop a social, political, historical and cultural awareness of the country, but we are also able to explore connections between Australia and India. When we speak of Australian literature we include literature written by people of British or European origin who settled there during the early eighteenth century. We also include writings by the original inhabitants of the land—the Aborigines as well as the diasporic people—i.e. the new immigrants to Australia. Therefore, since there are so many varied groups writing in the country, the themes too are varied in nature. The early settlers wrote about their desire to deal with the new land and native people. The Aborigines wrote about the traumatic invasions by the British. And the later groups of immigrants had their own issues to project in their writing. It is to this group that Judah Waten belongs and his story 'Mother' amply reflects his diasporic nature.

13.2 JUDAH WATEN

Judah Leon Waten (1911-1985), short story writer, novelist and essayist, was born in Odessa (then part of the Russian empire) to a Jewish Russian Family. His parents migrated to Australia in 1914. So he can be called a Russian born Jewish Australian writer. He was educated at Perth, and later at University High School, Melbourne when his family moved to Melbourne in 1926. His father worked as a draper, and later as a traveling salesman. Judah Waten learnt English as a young child, and wrote in English, but he was very conscious of his Yiddish linguistic and literary heritage, and translated the work of Yiddish writer like Pinchas Goldhar (1901-1947) and Herz Bergner (1907-1970) into English. Waten lived in Melbourne for the rest of his life. He joined the Communist Party of Australia in 1926 while still at school, and remained loyal to communism and the U.S.S.R. till the end of his life. He received the Patrick White Award (posthumously) for his contribution to Australian Literature. He has written a number of short stories and seven novels, which include The Unbending (1954), Time of Conflict (1961), Distant Land (1964), Season of Youth (1966) and Scenes of Revolutionary Life (1982).

In the 1940's Goldhar encouraged Waten to write about his childhood; his fictionalized reminiscences appeared as short stories, collected in the book, Alien Son (1952). This was the first work about the life of non-British immigrants in Australia; it evoked a sympathetic response because Australian society was changing, with the influx of a large number of Jewish immigrants after the 1930's following the rise of Hitler. Waten writes about diasporic existence, particularly the difficulties (and simple pleasures) experienced by non-English speaking migrants in Australian society. Differences in culture, food and family are emphasized, as are particular displacement difficulties experienced by older, non-English speaking immigrants, particularly women who look after their families and the home. His tales are based on his own experiences – we learn about how he was treated by other children, about life in his impoverished family, with his somewhat eccentric, traveling-salesman father. 'Mother' represents an immigrant mother's complex experience as envisaged by her male child. It captures the tensions that go with migration even in seemingly new havens.

Let us read the text of the story now.

13.3 'MOTHER'

13.3.1 Text

When I was a small boy I was often morbidly conscious of Mother's intent, searching eyes fixed on me. She would gaze for minutes on end without speaking one word. I was always disconcerted and would guiltily look down at the ground, anxiously turning over in my mind my day's activities.

But very early I knew her thoughts were far away from my petty doings; she was concerned with them only in so far as they gave her further reason to justify her hostility to the life around us. She was preoccupied with my sister and me; she was for ever concerned with our future in this new land in which she would always feel a stranger.

I gave her little comfort, for though we had been in the country for only a short while I had assumed many of the ways of those around me. I had become estranged from her. Or so it seemed to Mother, and it grieved her.

When I first knew her she had no intimate friend, nor do I think she felt the need of one with whom she could discuss her innermost thoughts and hopes. With me, though I knew she loved me very deeply, she was never on such near terms of friendship as sometimes exist between a mother and son. She emanated a kind of certainty in herself, in her view of life, that no opposition or human difficulty could shrivel or destroy. "Be strong before people, only weep before God," she would say and she lived up to that precept even with Father.

In our little community in the city, acquaintances spoke derisively of Mother's refusal to settle down as others had done, of what they called her propensity of highfalutin day-dreams and of the severity and unreasonableness of her opinions.

Yet her manner with people was always gentle. She spoke softly, she was measured in gesture, and frequently it seemed she was functioning automatically, her mind far away from her body. There was a grave beauty in her still, sad face, her searching, dark-brown eyes and black hair. She was thin and stooped in carriage as though a weight always lay on her shoulders.

From my earliest memory of Mother it somehow seemed quite natural to think of her as apart and other-worldly and different, not of everyday things as Father was. In those days he was a young-looking man who did not hesitate to make friends with children as soon as they were able to talk to him and laugh at his stories. Mother was older than he was. She must have been a woman of nearly forty, but she seemed even older. She changed little for a long time, showing no traces of growing older at all until, towards the end of her life, she suddenly became an old lady.

I was always curious about Mother's age. She never had birthdays like other people, nor did anyone else in our family. No candles were ever lit or cakes baked or presents given in our house. To my friends in the street who boasted of their birthday parties I self-consciously repeated my Mother's words, that such celebrations were only a foolish and eccentric form of self-worship.

"Nothing but deception," she would say. "As though life can be chopped into neat twelve-month parcels! It's deeds, not years, that matter."

Although I often repeated her words and even prided myself on not having birthdays I could not restrain myself from once asking Mother when she was born.

"I was born. I'm alive as you can see, so what more do you want to know?" she replied, so sharply that I never asked her about her age again.

In so many other ways Mother was different. Whereas all the rest of the women I knew in the neighbouring houses and in other parts of the city took pride in their housewifely abilities, their odds and ends of new furniture, the neat appearance of their homes, Mother regarded all those things as of little importance. Our house always looked as if we had just moved in or were about to move out. An impermanent and impatient spirit dwelt within our walls; Father called it living on one leg like a bird.

Wherever we lived there were some cases partly unpacked, rolls of linoleum stood in a corner, only some of the windows had curtains. There were never sufficient wardrobes, so that clothes hung on hooks behind doors. And all the time Mother's things accumulated. She never parted with anything, no matter how old it was. A shabby green plush coat bequeathed to her by her own mother hung on a nail in her bedroom. Untidy heaps of tattered books, newspapers, and journals from the old country mouldered in corners of the house, while under her bed in tin trunks she kept her dearest possessions. In those trunks there were bundles of old letters, two heavily underlined books on nursing, an old Hebrew Bible, three silver spoons given her by aunt with whom she had once lived, a diploma on yellow parchment, and her collection of favourite books.

From one or other of her trunks she would frequently pick a book and read to my sister and me. She would read in a wistful voice poems and stories of Jewish liberators from Moses until the present day, of the heroes of the 1905 Revolution and pieces by Tolstoy and Gorki and Sholom Aleichem. Never did she stop to inquire whether we understood what she was reading; she said we should understand later if not now.

I liked to hear Mother read, but always she seemed to choose a time for reading that clashed with something or other I was doing in the street or in a nearby paddock. I would be playing with the boys in the street, kicking a football or spinning a top or flying a kite, when Mother would unexpectedly appear and without even casting a glance at my companions she would ask me to come into the house, saying she wanted to read to me and my sister. Sometimes I was overcome with humiliation and I would stand listlessly with burning cheeks until she repeated her words. She never reproached me for my disobedience nor did she ever utter a reproof to the boys who taunted me as, crestfallen, I followed her into the house.

Why Mother was as she was only came to me many years later. Then I was even able to guess when she was born.

She was the last child of a frail and overworked mother and a bleakly pious father who hawked reels of cotton and other odds and ends in the villages surrounding a town in Russia. My grandfather looked with great disapproval on his offspring, who were all girls, and he was hardly aware of my mother at all. She was left well alone by her older sisters, who with feverish impatience were waiting for their parents to make the required arrangements for their marriages.

During those early days Mother rarely looked out into the streets, for since the great pogroms few Jewish children were ever to be seen abroad. From the iron grille of the basement she saw the soles of the shoes of the passers-by and not very much more. She had never seen a tree, a flower, or a bird.

But when Mother was about fifteen her parents died and she went to live with a widowed aunt and her large family in a far-away village. Her aunt kept an inn and Mother was tucked away with her cousins in a remote part of the building, away from the prying eyes of the customers in the taprooms. Every evening her aunt would gaze at her with startled eyes as if surprised to find her among the family.

“What am I going to do with you?” she would say. “I’ve got daughters of my own. If only your dear father of blessed name had left you just a tiny dowry it would have been such a help. Ah well! If you have no hand you can’t make a fist.”

At that time Mother could neither read nor write. And as she had never had any childhood playmates or friends of any kind she hardly knew what to talk about with her cousins. She spent the days cheerlessly pottering about the kitchen or sitting for hours, her eyes fixed on the dark wall in front of her.

Some visitor to the house, observing the small, lonely girl, took pity on her and decided to give her an education. Mother was given lessons every few days and after a while she acquired a smattering of Yiddish and Russian, a little arithmetic, and a great fund of Russian and Jewish stories.

New worlds gradually opened before Mother. She was seized with a passion for primers, grammars, arithmetic and story books, and soon the idea entered her head that the way out of her present dreary life lay through these books. There was another world, full of warmth and interesting things, and in it there was surely a place for her. She became obsessed with the thought that it wanted only some decisive step on her part to go beyond her aunt’s house into the life she dreamed about.

Somewhere she read of a Jewish hospital which had just opened in a distant city and one winter’s night she told her aunt she wanted to go to relatives who lived there. They would help her to find work in the hospital.

“You are mad!” exclaimed her aunt. “Forsake a home for a wild fancy! Who could have put such a notion into your head? Besides, a girl of eighteen can’t travel alone at this time of the year.”

It was from that moment that Mother’s age became something to be manipulated as it suited her. She said to her aunt that she was not eighteen, but twenty-two. She was getting up in years and she could not continue to impose on her aunt's kindness.

"How can you be twenty-two?" her aunt replied greatly puzzled.

A long pause ensued while she tried to reckon up Mother's years. She was born in the month Tammuz according to the Jewish calendar, which corresponded to the old style Russian calendar month of June, but in what year? She could remember being told of Mother's birth, but nothing outstanding had happened then to enable her to place the year. With all her nieces and nephews, some dead and many alive, scattered all over the vastness of the country only a genius could keep track of all their birthdays. Perhaps the girl was twenty-two, and if that were so her chance of getting a husband in the village was pretty remote; twenty-two was far too old. The thought entered her head that if she allowed Mother to go to their kinsmen in the city she would be relieved of the responsibility of finding a dowry for her, and so reluctantly she agreed.

But it was not until the spring that she finally consented to let her niece go. As the railway station was several miles from the village Mother was escorted there on foot by her aunt and cousins. With all her possessions, including photographs of her parents and a tattered Russian primer tied in a great bundle, Mother went forth into the vast world.

In the hospital she didn't find that for which she hungered; it seemed still as far away as in the village. She had dreamed of the new life where all would be noble, where men and women would dedicate their lives to bringing about a richer and happier life, just as she had read.

But she was put to scrubbing floors and washing linen every day from morning till night until she dropped exhausted into her bed in the attic. No one looked at her, no one spoke to her but to give her orders. Her one day off in the month she spent with her relatives who gave her some cast-off clothes and shoes and provided her with the books on nursing she so urgently needed. She was more than ever convinced that her deliverance would come through books and she set about swallowing their contents with renewed zest.

As soon as she had passed all the examinations and acquired the treasured diploma she joined a medical mission that was about to proceed without a moment's delay to a distant region where a cholera epidemic raged. And then for several years she remained with the same group, moving from district to district, wherever disease flourished.

Whenever Mother looked back over her life it was those years that shone out. Then she was with people who were filled with an ardour for mankind and it seemed to her they lived happily and freely, giving and taking friendship in an atmosphere pulsating with warmth and hope.

All this had come to an end in 1905 when the medical mission was dissolved and several of Mother's colleagues were killed in the uprising. Then with a heavy heart and little choice she had returned to nursing in the city, but this time in private houses attending on well-to-do ladies.

It was at the home of one of her patients that she met Father. What an odd couple they must have been! She was taciturn, choosing her words carefully, talking mainly of her ideas and little about herself. Father bared his heart with guileless abandon. He rarely had secrets and there was no division in his mind between intimate and general matters; he could talk as freely of his feelings for Mother or of a quarrel with his father as he could of a vaudeville show or the superiority of one game of cards as against another.

Father said of himself he was like an open hand at solo and all men were his brothers. For a story, a joke, or an apt remark he would forsake his father and mother, as the saying goes. Old tales, new ones invented for the occasion, jokes rolled off his tongue in a never-ending procession.

Every trifle, every incident was material for a story and he haunted music-halls and circuses, for he liked nothing better than comedians and clowns, actors and buskers.

He brought something bubbly and frivolous into Mother's life and for a while she forgot her stern precepts. In those days Father's clothes were smart and gay; he wore bright straw hats and loud socks and fancy, buttoned-up boots. Although she had always regarded any interest in clothes as foolish and a sign of an empty and frivolous nature Mother then felt proud of his fashionable appearance. He took her to his favourite resorts, to music-halls and to tea-houses where he and his cronies idled away hours, boastfully recounting stories of successes in business or merely swapping jokes. They danced nights away, though Mother was almost stupefied by the band, the bright lights, and looked with distaste on the extravagant clothes of the dancers who bobbed and cavorted.

All this was in the early days of their marriage. But soon Mother was filled with misgivings. Father's world, the world of commerce and speculation, of the buying and selling of goods neither seen nor touched, was repugnant and frightening to her. It lacked stability, it was devoid of ideals, it was fraught with ruin. Father was a trader in air, as the saying went.

Mother's anxiety grew as she observed more closely his mode of life. He worked in fits and starts. If he made enough in one hour to last him a week or a month his business was at an end and he went off in search of friends and pleasure. He would return to business only when his money had just about run out. He was concerned only with one day at a time; about tomorrow he would say clicking his fingers, his blue eyes focused mellowly on space, "We'll see."

But always he had plans for making great fortunes. They never came to anything but frequently they produced unexpected results. It so happened that on a number of occasions someone Father trusted acted on the plans he had talked about so freely before he even had time to leave the tea-house. Then there were fiery scenes with his faithless friends. But Father's rage passed away quickly and he would often laugh and make jokes over the table about it the very same day. He imagined everyone else forgot as quickly as he did and he was always astonished to discover that his words uttered hastily in anger had made him enemies.

"How should I know that people have such long memories for hate? I've only a cat's memory," he would explain innocently.

"If you spit upwards, you're bound to get it back in the face!" Mother irritably upbraided him.

Gradually Mother reached the conclusion that only migration to another country would bring about any real change in their life, and with all her persistence she began to urge him to take the decisive step. She considered America, France, Palestine, and finally decided on Australia. One reason for the choice was the presence there of distant relatives who would undoubtedly help them to find their feet in that far-away continent. Besides, she was sure that Australia was so different from any other country that Father was bound to acquire a new and more solid way of earning a living there.

For a long time Father paid no heed to her agitation and refused to make any move.

"Why have you picked on Australia and not Tibet, for example?" he asked ironically, "there isn't much difference between the two lands. Both are on the other side of the moon."

The idea of leaving his native land seemed so fantastic to him that he refused to regard it seriously. He answered Mother with jokes and tales of travellers who disappeared in balloons. He had no curiosity to explore distant countries, he hardly ever ventured beyond the three or four familiar streets of his city. And why should his wife be so anxious for him to find a new way of earning a living? He had never given one moment's thought to his mode of life and he could not imagine any reason for doing so. It suited him like his gay straw hats and smart suits.

Yet in the end he did what Mother wanted him to do, though even on the journey he was tortured by doubts and he positively shouted words of indecision. But he was no sooner in Australia than he put away all thoughts of his homeland and he began to regard the new country as his permanent home. It was not so different from what he had known before. Within a few days he had met some fellow merchants and, retiring to a café, they talked about business in the new land. There were fortunes to be made here, Father very quickly concluded. There was, of course, the question of a new language but that was no great obstacle to business. You could buy and sell—it was a good land, Father said.

It was different with Mother. Before she was one day off the ship she wanted to go back.

The impressions she gained on that first day remained with her all her life. It seemed to her there was an irritatingly superior air about the people she met, the customs officials, the cab men, the agent of the new house. Their faces expressed something ironical and sympathetic, something friendly and at the same time condescending. She imagined everyone on the wharf, in the street, looked at her in the same way and she never forgave them for treating her as if she were in need of their good-natured tolerance.

Nor was she any better disposed to her relatives and the small delegation of Jews who met her at the ship. They had all been in Australia for many years and they were anxious to impress newcomers with their knowledge of the country and its customs. They spoke in a hectoring manner. This was a free country, they said it was cultured, one used a knife and fork and not one's hands. Everyone could read and write and no one shouted at you. There were no oppressors here as in the old country.

Mother thought she understood their talk; she was quick and observant where Father was sometimes extremely guileless. While they talked Father listened with a good-natured smile and it is to be supposed he was thinking of a good story he could tell his new acquaintances. But Mother fixed them with a firm, relentless gaze and, suddenly interrupting their injunctions, said in the softest of voice, "If there are no oppressors here, as you say, why do you frisk about like house dogs? Whom do you have to please?"

Mother never lost this hostile and ironical attitude to the new land. She would have nothing of the country; she would not even attempt to learn the language. And she only began to look with a kind of interest at the world round her when my sister and I were old enough to go to school. Then all her old feeling for books and learning was re-awakened. She handled our primers and readers as if they were sacred texts.

She set great aims for us. We were to shine in medicine, in literature, in music; our special sphere depended on her fancy at a particular time. In one of these ways we could serve humanity best, and whenever she read to us the stories of Tolstoy and Gorki she would tell us again and again of her days with the medical mission. No matter how much schooling we should get we needed ideals, and what better ideals were there than those that had guided her in the days of the medical mission? They would save us from the soulless influences of this barren land.

Father wondered why she spend so much time reading and telling us stories of her best years and occasionally he would take my side when I protested against Mother taking us away from our games.

"They're only children," he said. "Have pity on them. If you stuff their little heads, God alone knows how they will finish up." Then, pointing to us, he added, "I'll be satisfied if he is a good carpenter; and if she's a good dressmaker that will do, too."

"At least," Mother replied, "you have the good sense not to suggest they go in for business. Life has taught you something at last."

"Can I help it that I am in business?" he suddenly shouted angrily. "I know it's a pity my father didn't teach me to be a professor."

But he calmed down quickly, unable to stand for long Mother's steady gaze and compressed lips.

It exasperated us that Father should give in so easily so that we could never rely on him to take our side for long. Although he argued with Mother about us he secretly agreed with her. And outside the house he boasted about her, taking a peculiar pride in her culture and attainments, and repeating her words just as my sister and I did.

Mother was very concerned about how she could give us a musical education. It was out of the question that we both be taught an instrument, since Father's business was at a low ebb and he hardly knew where he would find enough money to pay the rent, so she took us to a friend's house to listen to gramophone records. They were of the old-fashioned, cylindrical kind made by Edison and they sounded far away and thin like the voice of a ventriloquist mimicking far off musical instruments. But my sister and I marvelled at them. We should have been willing to sit over the long, narrow hall for days, but Mother decided that it would only do us harm to listen to military marches and the stupid songs of the music-hall.

It was then that we began to pay visits to musical emporiums. We went after school and during the holidays in the mornings. There were times when Father waited long for his lunch or evening meal, but he made no protest. He supposed Mother knew what she was doing in those shops and he told his friends of the effort Mother was making to acquaint us with music.

Our first visits to the shops were in the nature of reconnoitering sorties. In such emporium Mother looked the attendants up and down while we thumbed the books on the counters, stared at the enlarged photographs of illustrious composers, and studied the various catalogues of gramophone records. We went from shop to shop until we just about knew all there was to know about the records and sheet music and books in stock.

Then we started all over again from the first shop and this time we came to hear the records.

I was Mother's interpreter and I would ask one of the salesmen to play us a record she had chosen from one of the catalogues. Then I would ask him to play another. It might have been a piece for violin by Tchaikovsky or Beethoven or an aria sung by Caruso or Chaliapin. This would continue until Mother observed the gentleman in charge of the gramophone losing his patience and we would take our leave.

With each visit Mother became bold and several times she asked to have whole symphonies and concertos played to us. We sat for nearly an hour cooped up in a tiny room with the salesman restlessly shuffling his feet, yawning and not knowing what to expect next. Mother pretended he hardly existed and, making herself comfortable in the cane chair, with a determined, intent expression she gazed straight ahead at the whirling disc.

We were soon known to everyone at the shops. Eyes lit up as we walked in, Mother looking neither this way nor that with two children walking in file through the passageway towards the record department. I was very conscious of the humorous glances and the discreet sniggers that followed us and I would sometimes catch hold of Mother's hand and plead with her to leave the shop. But she paid no heed and we continued to our destination. The more often we came the more uncomfortably self-conscious I became and I dreaded the laughing faces round me.

Soon we became something more than a joke. The smiles turned to scowls and the shop attendants refused to play us any more records. The first time this happened the salesman mumbled something and left us standing outside the door of the music-room.

Mother was not easily thwarted and without a trace of a smile she said we should talk to the manager. I was filled with a sense of shame and humiliation and with downcast eyes I sidled towards the entrance of the shop.

Mother caught up with me and, laying her hand upon my arm, she said. "What are you afraid of? Your mother won't disgrace you, believe me." Looking at me in her searching way she went on, "Think carefully. Who is right—are they or are we? Why shouldn't they play for us? Does it cost them anything? By which other way can we ever hope to hear something good? Just because we are poor must we cease our striving?"

She continued to talk in this way until I went back with her. The three of us walked into the manager's office and I translated Mother's words.

The manager was stern, though I imagine he must have had some difficulty in keeping his serious demeanour.

"But do you ever intend to buy any records?" he said after I had spoken.

"If I were a rich woman would you ask me that question?" Mother replied and I repeated her words in a halting voice.

"Speak up to him," she nudged me while I could feel my face fill with hot blood.

The manager repeated his first question and Mother, impatient at my hesitant tone, plunged into a long speech on our right to music and culture and in fact the rights of all men, speaking her own tongue as though the manager understood every word. It was in vain; he merely shook his head.

We were barred from shop after shop, and in each case Mother made a stand, arguing at length until the man in charge flatly told us not to come back until we could afford to buy records.

We met with rebuffs in other places as well.

Once as we wandered through the university, my sister and I sauntering behind while Mother opened doors, listening to lectures for brief moments, we unexpectedly found ourselves in a large room where white-coated young men and women sat on high stools in front of arrays of tubes, beakers and jars.

Mother's eyes lit up brightly and she murmured something about knowledge and science. We stood close to her and gazed round in astonishment; neither her words nor what we saw conveyed anything to us. She wanted to go round the room but a gentleman wearing a black gown came up and asked us if we were looking for someone. He was a distinguished looking person with a florid face and a fine grey mane.

Repeating Mother's words I said, "We are not looking for anyone; we are simply admiring this room of knowledge."

The gentleman's face wrinkled pleasantly. With a tiny smile playing over his lips he said regretfully that we could not stay, since only students were permitted in the room.

As I interpreted his words Mother's expression changed. Her sallow face was almost red. For ten full seconds she looked the gentleman in the eyes. Then she said rapidly to me, "Ask him why he speaks with such a condescending smile on his face."

I said, "My mother asks why you talk with such a superior smile on your face?"

He coughed, shifted his feet restlessly and his face set severely. Then he glared at his watch and without another word walked away with dignified steps.

When we came out into the street a spring day was in its full beauty. Mother sighed to herself and after a moment's silence said, "That fine professor thinks he is a liberal-minded man, but behind his smile he despises people such as us. You will have to struggle here just as hard as I had to back home. For all the fine talk it is like all other countries. But where are the people with ideals like those back home, who aspire to something better?"

She repeated these words frequently, even when I was a boy of thirteen and I knew so much more about the new country that was my home. Then I could argue with her.

I said to her that Benny who lived in our street was always reading books and papers and hurrying to meetings. Benny was not much older than I was and he had many friends whom he met in the park on Sunday. They all belonged to this country and they were interested in all the things Mother talked about.

"Benny is an exception," she said with an impatient shrug of her shoulders, "and his friends are only a tiny handful." Then she added, "And what about you? You and your companions only worship bats and balls as heathens do stone idols. Why, in the old country boys of your age took part in the fight to deliver mankind from oppression! They gave everything, their strength and health, even their lives, for that glorious ideal."

"That's what Benny wants to do," I said, pleased to be able to answer Mother.

"But it's so different here. Even your Benny will be swallowed up in the smug, smooth atmosphere. You wait and see."

She spoke obstinately. It seemed impossible to change her. Her vision was too much obscured by passionate dreams of the past for her to see any hope in the present, in the new land.

But as an afterthought she added, "Perhaps it is different for those like you and Benny. But for me I can never find my way into this life here."

She turned away, her narrow back stooped, her gleaming black hair curled into a bun on her short, thin neck, her shoes equally down at heel on each side.

13.4 DISCUSSION

Waten's stories of his Russian-Jewish family have been critically acclaimed for their lucidity, depth of feeling, and fine sense of comedy. 'Mother', is a much anthologized story. It was included in the Oxford Book of Australian Short Stories edited by Michael Wilding (OUP, South Melbourne, 1994) and also in Contemporary Australian Short Stories edited by Santosh K. Sareen (Affiliated East-West Press, New Delhi, 2001). It is about the life of an orphan girl, who is addressed as "mother". It is narrated in the first person by her son. The story is about the narrator's mother, whose name and date of birth is not clear. Her life is filled with challenges which she overcomes bravely. These challenges also bring a tremendous change in her attitude towards life; she suffers from a sense of insecurity. Her marriage does not help much, as her husband is a happy-go-lucky sort of person, who "worked in fits and starts. . . . He would return to business only when his money had just about run out." He does not believe in saving for the future, and cannot provide the security and warmth which she constantly craves.

The short story 'Mother' is a fictional account of Judah Waten's own life. It shows how his mother worked hard for a better life, trying to fill their home with literature and music. Many of the Jewish immigrants in Australia and America left their homes in Europe because of persecution by the Nazis; the situation in Waten's short story is different, they have migrated in search of better economic opportunities (like the vast number of immigrants from India and the third world in the second half of the twentieth century). Of course, anti-Semitism also plays a role in the pathetic condition of the mother in her childhood:

During those early days Mother rarely looked out into the streets, for since the great pogroms few children were ever to be seen abroad. From the iron grille of the basement she saw the soles of the shoes of the passers-by and not very much more. She had never seen a tree, a flower, or a bird.

She faces discrimination as a girl child, because of the pernicious dowry system then prevalent in Russia: her father "looked with great disapproval on his offspring, who were all girls", while her widowed aunt says, "If only your dear father of blessed memory had left you just a tiny dowry it would have been such a help". The story gives us an idea of the society of the time, not through direct statements but by implication: we realize that no importance was given to the education of girls, at the age of fifteen the narrator's mother was still illiterate. She learns to read only because a visitor takes pity on her; but she is filled with a passion for knowledge, and is "convinced that her deliverance would come through books". She is "put to scrubbing floors and washing linen every day from morning till night until she dropped exhausted into her bed in the attic", but she persists with her studies and acquires a nurse's diploma.

Disappointed in her husband, her life revolves around her son and daughter, to whom she always wants to give the best. Unfortunately, most of her dreams come to naught as she realizes that even in the new land where she had hoped to make a new beginning, life is just as tough for the underprivileged as anywhere else. But she is determined that her son (the narrator) and her daughter should shine, "in medicine, in literature, in music". As Mother very feelingly says "Just because we are poor must we cease our striving?" Her efforts to secure some sort of decent education and culture for her children are doomed to failure because of lack of funds. This scenario succeeds in defeating her early optimism and at the end of the story the mother is a dejected, disheartened and demotivated soul who says ". . . I can never find my way into this life here". The only ray of hope is that her children may be able to fit in and not be swallowed up in "the smug, smooth atmosphere" of the new country. The story portrays the anxieties and tensions which the new immigrants had to undergo while settling on the new land. Their dreams and aspirations were very often thwarted by the early settlers and they could not make a place for themselves in the new land as they had hoped to do.

However, it was slightly easier for their children to adjust to their new surroundings and put down roots in the new place—since they were young and thus more pliable. That is why the narrator finds it easier to call the new country "my home" and does not face many adjustment problems like his mother does.

13.5.1 Mother

The protagonist of the story is addressed throughout as mother. She has a sad face, dark brown eyes and black hair. She has a thin physique and stoops a little. Although she is gentle and soft spoken, her gestures are "measured" and at times she "functions automatically, her mind far away from her body". As the story reveals, she has had a neglected childhood. As is reflected in "...from the iron grille of the basement she saw the soles of the shoes of the passers-by and not very much more. She had never seen a tree, a flower, or a bird." Orphaned at the young age of fifteen, she had lived with her aunt who, "tucked her away from the prying eyes of the customers in the taprooms. Every evening her aunt would gaze at her with startled eyes as if surprised to find her among the family." For the first time Mother finds a way to end her "present dreary life" through books; which opens "another world filled with warmth and interesting things, and in it there was surely a place for her". Mother educates herself, which gives her courage to pursue a job in a hospital, and also finds a husband. Her married life has its own share of grief and sorrow. Her husband is all that she is not. After the initial romance is over, she fails to understand his attitude towards life, work, and family. This forces her to take the decision to migrate to Australia where she always remains consciously an outsider. Her desire to give the best to her son and daughter and her possessive love towards them, reflects the complexities that life offers.

13.5.2 Father

He is the father of the narrator of the story. He is an extrovert by nature and good looking as well. He is fashionable and wears smart and colourful clothes. "He wore bright straw hats and loud socks and fancy, buttoned-up boots". He is friendly and "bared his heart with guileless abandon. He rarely had any secrets and there was no division in his mind between intimate and general matters". He tries to bring some happiness into Mother's life by taking her "to his favorite resorts, to music halls, and to tea-houses ...they danced nights away". However, this does not gain Mother's appreciation for too long. After the initial blissful years of marriage, his "world of commerce and speculation ...is repugnant and frightening to her." Their attitude towards life is opposite. While Mother is a person of ideals he is carefree; so much so that he often returns to work after he has exhausted his money though he does harbour plans of making a fortune. It is this attitude that makes her desire migration to another country hoping that that would bring stability in their lives.

13.5.3 Son

He is the narrator of the story, and so he does not talk much about himself. But we learn a lot about his character from his interaction with his mother. The child is conscious of his growing estrangement from his mother, because he quickly adjusts to the new land, while she hangs on to her old memories, "Before she was one day off the ship she wanted to go back." The child is very conscious of the fact that his mother is very different from other women; while others take pride in their "housewifely abilities", their house is always in a mess. But the child respects her love of literature, "I liked to hear Mother read." But she often creates embarrassing situations for him – he would be busy playing with other boys of his age, and she would call him in "saying she wanted to read to me and my sister." The children resent the way she takes them away from their games. The narrator turns to his father for support; he argues with the mother, asking why she spends so much time reading to the children. But his father does not take their side for long. The son also blushes at the way the mother makes them listen to music, by asking the salesman in the music shop to play gramophone records. The boy tries to reassure his mother by telling her about Benny, "who lived in our street and was always reading books and papers." But she refuses to concede the possibility of art and culture in the new land. He can argue with her successfully only when he is thirteen years old.

Thus the author delineates both the characters, through description, dialogue, and incident.

13.6 BACKGROUND

Background or setting is an important element in a short story. It creates the mood as well as the psychological and physical affects appropriate to the theme of the story. The physical atmosphere describes the attitude of Mother:

"Our house always looked as if we had just moved in or were about to move out. An impermanent and impatient spirit dwelt within our walls;..."

This is reflected upon further:

"whenever we lived there were some cases partly unpacked, rolls of linoleum stood in a corner, only some of the windows had curtains. There were never sufficient wardrobes, so that clothes hung on hooks behind doors."

When they migrate to Australia, Mother's description is on similar lines. To her "there was an irritated superior air about the people ..., the customs officials, the cab men, the agent of the new house. Their face expressed something ironical and sympathetic, something friendly and at the same time condescending..."

13.7 PROSE STYLE

Though his work is based on his own experiences in Australia during the first half of the twentieth century, there is a timeless, universal quality about Waten's writing. His narrative has a vivid, bittersweet quality – though there is a touch of humour, pathos is never far away. Consider the scene in the stores, for instance; there is a comic quality to the way the mother goes to store after music store, and listens to the music, though she has no intention of buying anything, because she does not have the money to do so. Without any comment by the author, the irony of the situation is obvious – music stores are ready to play gramophone records only for customers who plan to buy them, and these are the very people who can take the records home and listen to music. The reactions of the store managers are described very vividly:

The manager was stern, though I imagine he must have had some difficulty in keeping his serious demeanour.

"But do you ever intend to buy any records?"

The manager repeated his first question and Mother, impatient at my hesitant tone, plunged into a long speech on our right to music and culture and in fact the rights of all men, speaking her own tongue as though the manager understood every word.

One of the most important qualities of Judah Waten's prose style is its suggestiveness. In the passage quoted above, he never comments on the unfairness of society's treatment of the poor, this is implied by Waten's description of the way the storekeepers rudely rebuff them. Many examples can be found of this quality. A good example is the last line of the story, which indicates the hopelessness and poverty of the mother: "She turned away, her narrow back stooped, her gleaming black hair curled into a bun on her short, thin neck, her shoes equally down at heel on each side."

Waten has impressive descriptive powers. Through small details, he creates a word picture of the scene. Consider the description of the house:

Wherever we lived there were some cases partly unpacked, rolls of linoleum stood in a corner, only some of the windows had curtains. There were never sufficient wardrobes, so that clothes hung on hooks behind doors. And all the time Mother's things accumulated. She never parted with anything, no matter how old it was. A shabby green plush coat bequeathed to her by her own mother hung on a nail in her bedroom. . . . In those trunks there were bundles of old letters, two heavily underlined books on nursing, an old Hebrew Bible, three silver spoons given her by the aunt with whom she had once lived, a diploma on yellow parchment, and her collection of favourite books.

Such descriptions not only recreate the scene, they also tell us about the character of Mother, and her sense of values – she is not a brainless house-proud housewife, she values literature.

Another characteristic of Waten’s prose style in this short story is the use of dialogue. He presents incidents in a dramatic way:

“If I were a rich woman would you ask me that question?” Mother replied and I repeated her words in a halting voice.

“Speak up to him,” she nudged me while I could feel my face fill with hot blood.

Waten makes good use of adjectives – “halting” voice, the boy blushing as his face fills with “hot” blood. He also supplies necessary details – the Mother refuses to learn English, and waits for the son to translate, and nudges him when he feels shy; later, she gets so emotional that she does not wait for the child to translate, she starts “speaking her own tongue as though the manager understood every word”.

Waten’s prose is lucid, he does not use complex structures or difficult vocabulary. His powers of description and suggestion are impressive.

Exercise 1

- a) Write about Judah Waten’s prose style as reflected in ‘Mother’.
- b) Write a brief sketch of the character of Mother. (100 words).
- c) Justify the comment, “Be strong before people, only weep before God”

13.8 LET US SUM UP

In “Mother” Waten tells the story of a mother who bears with dignity a number of hardships throughout her life. She had her fixed notions and principles in life, and refuses to compromise with them. The story at one level is about the individual mother; on the other about relationships. Through description, dialogue and incidents, these relationships come alive.

13.9 ANSWERS TO EXERCISES

- a) Judah Waten’s prose style is lucid, and effectively recreates the background and the characters. He does not comment directly — he shows us the poverty of the mother by referring to her down at heel shoes. Instead of reporting events, he adopts the dramatic device of presenting dialogues which are in keeping with the characters— the father’s speeches are humorous, while the mother’s are full of philosophy and ideals.
- b) The Mother has had a tough childhood; found no solace even in marriage; the new land too did nothing to contain her hardships. But she remained a striver throughout and left no stone unturned to provide for her children. In spite of material poverty she sees to it that her children are exposed to music and literature.

'Mother' by Judah Waten

- c) These words show the resilience and strength of the Mother who has always had to fight for her share. She believes that if you show your weakness to people, they would take advantage of you. This comment reveals her character — she is an introvert, who will not reach out to others for help.

After reading the story and this Unit carefully, you should be able to

- look at the story in terms of human misery
- understand the meaning of the title 'Misery'
- appreciate the simple narrative prose style of Anton Chekhov

14.1 INTRODUCTION

Anton Pavlovich Chekhov is a well-known Russian short story writer and playwright. He was born on January 29, 1860 and died at the early age of 44. He was a doctor by profession and a writer by temperament and aptitude. He once said, "Medicine is my wife and literature is my mistress." He began by writing short humorous stories for journals, and light one-act comedies. Among the greatest of his mature short stories are "Ward No. Six" (1899), "Gooseberries" (1898) and "The Lady with the Little Dog" (1899). Plays like Uncle Vanya (1900), Three Sisters (1901) and The Cherry Orchard (1904) are considered classics of world drama. He wrote sympathetically about characters of all classes, the bored upper classes as well as the deprived poor. His work is known for its unique combination of comedy, tragedy and pathos. Chekhov has enjoyed great popularity in England. English translations of his works started appearing as early as 1903, and influenced leading playwrights and fiction writers.

Chekhov is considered the most important influence on the development of the modern short story. His stories dispensed with plot; he concentrated on what is happening in the minds of his characters, their "stream of consciousness", rather than external incidents. He was an early practitioner of the "stream of consciousness" technique used by novelists like Henry James, Virginia Woolf and James Joyce. In Chekhov, plot is subordinate to character. Because the short story as a form is too short for the development of character, Chekhov's stories focus on a particular mood. This new way of writing a story at times poses difficulties to the reader. Chekhov defended his open-ended stories saying "the role of an artist is to ask questions and not to answer them".

The story 'Misery', first published in 1886, does not pose any difficulty as it deals with an experience that touches all of us at some point in our lifetime. Let us now read the story, in an English translation by Ralph E. Matlaw.

14.2 'MISERY'

14.2.1 Text

"To whom shall I tell my grief?"

The twilight of evening. Big flakes of wet snow are whirling lazily about the street lamps, which have just been lighted, and lying in a thin soft layer on roofs, horses' backs, shoulders, caps. Iona Potapov, the sledge-driver, is all white like a ghost. He sits on the box without stirring, bent as double as the living body can be bent. If a regular snowdrift fell on him it seems as though even then he would not think it necessary to shake it off. . . His little mare is white and motionless too. Her stillness, the angularity of her lines, and the stick-like straightness of her legs make her look like a halfpenny gingerbread horse. She is probably lost in thought. Anyone who has been torn away from the plough, from the familiar gray landscapes, and cast into this slough, full of monstrous lights, of unceasing uproar and hurrying people, is bound to think.

It is a long time since Iona and his nag have budged. They came out of the yard before dinnertime and not a single fare yet. But now the shades of evening are falling on the town. The pale light of the street lamps changes to a vivid color, and the bustle of the street grows noisier.

"Sledge to Vyborskaya!" Iona hears. "Sledge!"

Iona starts, and through his snow-plastered eyelashes sees an officer in a military overcoat with a hood over his head.

"To Vyborskaya," repeats the officer. "Are you asleep? To Vyborskaya!"

In token of assent Iona gives a tug at the reins which sends cakes of snow flying from the horse's back and shoulders. The officer gets into the sledge. The sledge-driver clicks to the horse, cranes his neck like a swan, rises in his seat, and more from habit than necessity brandishes his whip. The mare cranes her neck, too, crooks her stick-like legs, and hesitatingly sets off

"Where are you shoving, you devil?" Iona immediately hears shouts from the dark mass shifting to and fro before him. "Where the devil are you going? Keep to the r-right!"

"You don't know how to drive! Keep to the right," says the officer angrily.

A coachman driving a carriage swears at him; a pedestrian crossing the road and brushing the horse's nose with his shoulder looks at him angrily and shakes the snow off his sleeve. Iona fidgets on the box as though he were sitting on thorns, jerks his elbows, and turns his eyes about like one possessed as though he did not know where he was or why he was there.

"What rascals they all are!" says the officer jocosely. "They are simply doing their best to run up against you or fall under the horse's feet. They must be doing it on purpose."

Iona looks at his fare and moves his lips. . . . Apparently he means to say something, but nothing comes but a sniff.

"What?" enquires the officer.

Iona gives a wry smile, and straining his throat, brings out huskily: "My son . . . er . . . my son died this week, sir."

"H'm! What did he die of?"

Iona turns his whole body round to his fare, and says:

"Who can tell! It must have been from fever. . . . He lay three days in the hospital and then he died. . . . God's will."

"Turn around, you devil!" comes out of the darkness. "Have you gone cracked, you old dog? Look where you are going!"

"Drive on! drive on! . . ." says the officer. "We shan't get there till tomorrow going on like this. Hurry up!"

The sledge-driver cranes his neck again, rises in his seat, and with heavy grace swings his whip. Several times he looks round at the officer, but the latter keeps his eyes shut and is apparently disinclined to listen. Putting his fare down at Vyborgskaya, Iona stops by a restaurant, and again sits huddled up on the box. . . . Again the wet snow paints him and his horse white. One hour passes, and then another. . . .

Three young men, two tall and thin, one short and hunchbacked, come up, railing at each other and loudly stamping on the pavement with their goloshes.

"Cabby, to the Police Bridge!" the hunchback cries in a cracked voice. "The three of us, . . . twenty kopecks!"

Iona tugs at the reins and clicks to his horse. Twenty kopecks is not a fair price, but he has no thoughts for that. Whether it is a rouble or whether it is five kopecks does not matter to him now so long as he has a fare. . . . The three young men, shoving each other and using bad language, go up to the sledge, and all three try to sit down at once. The question remains to be settled: Which are to sit down and which one is to stand? After a long altercation, ill-temper, and abuse, they come to the conclusion that the hunchback must stand because he is the shortest.

"Well, drive on," says the hunchback in his cracked voice, settling himself and breathing down Iona's neck. "Cut along! What a cap you've got, my friend! You wouldn't find a worse one in all Petersburg. . . ."

"He-he! . . . he-he! . . ." laughs Iona. "It's nothing to boast of!"

"Well, then, nothing to boast of, drive on! Are you going to drive like this all the way? Eh? Shall I give you one in the neck?"

"My head aches," says one of the tall ones. "At the Dukmasovs' yesterday Vaska and I drank four bottles of brandy between us."

"I can't make out why you talk such stuff," says the other tall one angrily.

"You lie like a brute."

"Strike me dead, it's the truth! . . ."

"It's about as true as that a louse coughs."

"He-he!" grins Iona. "Me-er-ry gentlemen!"

"Tfoo! the devil take you!" cries the hunchback indignantly. "Will you get on, you old plague, or won't you? Is that the way to drive? Give her one with the whip. Hang it all, give it her well."

Iona feels behind his back the jolting person and quivering voice of the hunchback. He hears abuse addressed to him, he sees people, and the feeling of loneliness begins little by little to be less heavy on his heart. The hunchback swears at him, till he chokes over some elaborately whimsical string of epithets and is overpowered by his cough. His tall companions begin talking of a certain Nadyezhda Petrovna. Iona looks round at them. Waiting till there is a brief pause, he looks round once more and says:

"This week . . . er. . . my. . . er. . . son died!"

"We shall all die, . . ." says the hunchback with a sigh, wiping his lips after coughing. "Come, drive on! drive on! My friends, I simply cannot stand crawling like this! When will he get us there?"

"Well, you give him a little encouragement . . . one in the neck!"

"Do you hear, you old plague? I'll make you smart. If one stands on ceremony with fellows like you one may as well walk. Do you hear, you old dragon? Or don't you care a hang what we say?"

And Iona hears rather than feels a slap on the back of his neck.

"He-he! . . ." he laughs. "Merry gentlemen . . . God give you health!"

"Cabman, are you married?" asks one of the tall ones.

"I? He he! Me-er-ry gentlemen. The only wife for me now is the damp earth. . . He-ho-ho!. . . The grave that is! . . . Here my son's dead and I am alive. . . It's a strange thing, death has come in at the wrong door. . . Instead of coming for me it went for my son. . ."

And Iona turns round to tell them how his son died, but at that point the hunchback gives a faint sigh and announces that, thank God! they have arrived at last. After taking his twenty kopecks, Iona gazes for a long while after the revellers, who disappear into a dark entry. Again he is alone and again there is silence for him. . . . The misery which has been for a brief space eased comes back again and tears his heart more cruelly than ever. With a look of anxiety and suffering Iona's eyes stray restlessly among the crowds moving to and fro on both sides of the street: can he not find among those thousands someone who will listen to him? But the crowds flit by heedless of him and his misery. . . . His misery is immense, beyond all bounds. If Iona's heart were to burst and his misery to flow out, it would flood the whole world, it seems, but yet it is not seen. It has found a hiding-place in such an insignificant shell that one would not have found it with a candle by daylight. .

Iona sees a house-porter with a parcel and makes up his mind to address him.

"What time will it be, friend?" he asks. .

"Going on for ten. . . . Why have you stopped here? Drive on!"

Iona drives a few paces away, bends himself double, and gives himself up to his misery. He feels it is no good to appeal to people. But before five minutes have passed he draws himself up, shakes his head as though he feels a sharp pain, and tugs at the reins. . . . He can bear it no longer.

"Back to the yard!" he thinks. "To the yard!"

And his little mare, as though she knew his thoughts, falls to trotting. An hour and a half later Iona is sitting by a big dirty stove. On the stove, on the floor, and on the benches are people snoring. The air is full of smells and stuffiness. Iona looks at the sleeping figures, scratches himself, and regrets that he has come home so early. . . .

"I have not earned enough to pay for the oats, even," he thinks. "That's why I am so miserable. A man who knows how to do his work, . . . who has had enough to eat, and whose horse has had enough to eat, is always at ease. . . ."

In one of the corners a young cabman gets up, clears his throat sleepily, and makes for the water-bucket.

"Want a drink?" Iona asks him.

"Seems so."

"May it do you good. . . . But my son is dead, mate. . . . Do you hear? This week in the hospital. . . . It's a queer business. . . ."

Iona looks to see the effect produced by his words, but he sees nothing. The young man has covered his head over and is already asleep. The old man sighs and scratches himself. . . . Just as the young man had been thirsty for water, he thirsts for speech. His son will soon have been dead a week, and he has not really talked to anybody yet He wants to talk of it properly, with deliberation. . . . He wants to tell how his son was taken ill, how he suffered, what he said before he died, how he died. . . . He wants to describe the funeral, and how he went to the hospital to get his son's clothes. He still has his daughter Anisya in the country. . . . And he wants to talk about her too. . . . Yes, he has plenty to talk about now. His listener ought to sigh and exclaim and lament. . . . It would be even better to talk to women. Though they are silly creatures, they blubber at the first word.

"Let's go out and have a look at the mare," Iona thinks. "There is always time for sleep. . . . You'll have sleep enough, no fear. . . ."

He puts on his coat and goes into the stables where his mare is standing. He thinks about oats, about hay, about the weather. . . . He cannot think about his son when he is alone. . . . To talk about him with someone is possible, but to think of him and picture him is insufferable anguish. . . .

"Are you munching?" Iona asks his mare, seeing her shining eyes. "There, munch away, munch away. . . . Since we have not earned enough for oats, we will eat hay. . . . Yes, . . . I have grown too old to drive. . . . My son ought to be driving, not I. . . . He was a real cabman. . . . He ought to have lived. . . ."

Iona is silent for a while, and then he goes on:

"That's how it is, old girl. . . . Kuzma Ionitch is gone. . . . He said good-by to me. . . . He went and died for no reason. . . . Now, suppose you had a little colt, and you were own mother to that little colt. . . . And all at once that same little colt went and died. . . . You'd be sorry, wouldn't you? . . ."

The little mare munches, listens, and breathes on her master's hands. Iona is carried away and tells her all about it.

14.3 DISCUSSION

This is a story of a father's grief over the death of his son. The grief is within him and he desperately wants to speak about it to lighten his burdensome misery. But no one is ready to listen to him. The story describes the old man's urge to share his grief with others, his despair at not being able to find a compassionate audience and his final effort to disgorge his misery by talking to his mare, his one and only companion. (disgorge: pour out)

The old man in grief is a sledge driver. He is the protagonist of the story. The other characters who appear briefly during the course of the story are riders on his sledge who have neither the time nor the inclination to listen to him. They live in a world of their own and cannot sympathetically relate to the old man in grief.

The story 'Misery' has a sub title 'To Whom Shall I Tell My Grief?' While the grief is over the loss of his son, his misery is not finding an outlet to unburden his grief.

After reading the story, note how many times the word 'misery' appears in it. You will discover that it appears towards the latter half of the story five times and on a sixth occasion it is used as an adjective 'miserable'.

Can you see the significance of this word in the context of the title of the story?

In this one word 'misery' the title accurately summarizes the mood the story carries. It tells us about the self-centred, unresponsive and feelingless nature of human beings in this world. The title 'Misery' portrays the overwhelming grief of Iona Potapov, the old sledge-driver over the loss of his son and his futile attempts to share it with fellow travellers in his sledge.

The first part of the story describes the old man's grief and his repeated efforts to catch the attention of the sledge riders and his failure to make them listen to his tale of woe. The resulting emotion goes beyond grief and becomes misery. Hence the title word 'misery' appears in the latter part of the story.

Misery means a great suffering of the mind or body. Here the suffering is not physical but felt within the heart. There can be no cure for emotional distress unless it is let out and shared with others. The old man has to keep his emotions within, as there are no listeners to lend an ear. He has been rendered alone by the death of his son, but his loneliness increases when he finds no one with whom he can share his agony. He is severely alone and therefore is miserable.

'Misery' by Anton Chekhov

Let us see how the story begins.

It is evening. Chekhov describes realistically the shades of darkness all around, heightened by the white snow. We hear a lot of movement of people, but in the darkness no one is visible. Iona Potapov is an old man bent double with age and grief. He sits white like a ghost and his mare stays still and motionless. All around them is the constant motion of people who are not seen but whose voices are heard. The writer is able to focus on the loneliness of Iona, the sledge driver. He is surrounded by people and yet remains all alone in his grief. The darkness around him is a measure of the darkness within him. He is like a ghost in white (as he is covered by the snowflakes) for he experiences a death-in-life existence.

The first passenger is an army officer. He is in a hurry to reach his destination. He is a contrast to Iona in every respect. Iona is old and weary, the officer is young and full of life. Iona is lost in grief, the officer jokes in a light-hearted mood. Iona desperately seeks the officer's attention, the officer sits with his eyes shut and his ears closed "disinclined to listen". Chekhov using the stream-of-consciousness technique presents the continuous flow of grief in Iona without resorting to graphic description.

The second group of passengers on the sledge is a bunch of three revellers, young, rumbustious (making merry in a noisy way) with not a care of the world. They behave as though they are drunk. One of them is a hunchback. Despite his physical deformity, he feels superior to the old man who is weighed down with grief. All of them have no sympathy for the old man who tries to tell them of his son's death. The old man is gentle and kind to his mare; he does not whip his mare to speed up. In contrast the revellers ride roughshod over his feelings. Iona is happy to see them merry, but they have no eyes to discern the old man's sorrow. An officer or a party goer, their attitude to the old father in grief is the same. Neither can empathise with Iona's sadness.

The old man is left alone. Let us see how the writer describes his situation:

Again he is alone and again there is silence for him. . . . The misery which has been for a brief space eased comes back again and tears his heart more cruelly than ever. With a look of anxiety and suffering Iona's eyes stray restlessly among the crowds moving to and fro on both sides of the street: can he not find among those thousands someone who will listen to him? But the crowds flit by heedless of him and his misery. . . . His misery is immense, beyond all bounds. If Iona's heart were to burst and his misery to flow out, it would flood the whole world, it seems, but yet it is not seen. It has found a hiding-place in such an insignificant shell that one would not have found it with a candle by daylight.

His misery is immense. It can swamp the whole world and yet its immensity is not seen. It is within him and no one can even fathom the depths of its intensity. Iona longs for people to whom he can unburden himself. When the revellers are in his sledge, he is comforted with the thought that he has company to share his grief with. To that extent his grief is eased. But when he is back alone in his sledge watching crowds moving to and fro, he realizes that a crowd is no company. "Iona drives a few paces away, bends himself double, and gives himself up to his misery."

One more attempt to speak to a young cabman proves futile. He is alone but he still has his mare. He unburdens his heart to the passive mare. For the first time, he mentions his son's name Kuzma Ionitch. He is gone. He has preceded him to the grave. He asks the mare how she would feel if she had a colt and the colt died. "You'd be sorry. Won't you?" The mare does not answer. It breathes on his hand. But in that unspoken moment the animal's tender and unprotesting looks comfort the old man. He feels that he has touched a sympathetic chord in his mare — the only possession he has still with him. He pours his heart out to her. He has found an outlet for his grief.

Is the mare really listening? Is she compassionate and understanding? Or is the last part of the story just the old man's fancy? The ending is deliberately left inconclusive. But the story drives home the point that humans are basically insensitive to other's pain and lack any involvement and sharing in the grief of fellowmen.

The story you have read is written in a straightforward narrative style. What strikes the reader is its quality of simplicity. Chekhov has an eye for detail and he is a photographic and cinematographic realist. It is as though he has a camera that accurately portrays a piece of life. Chekhov once said that "Art tells the truth" and Tolstoy said "Art tells the truth because it expresses the highest feelings of man." Chekhov's seemingly simple story affirms the truth about human behaviour.

'Misery' is a good example of Chekhov's typical theme and narrative structure. It does not focus on everyday reality, but centres on the psychological aftermath of an event that breaks up everyday routine and leaves the central character helpless. The rhythm of the sledge driver Iona's life is broken by the news of his son's death. He feels the need to communicate his feelings of loss to his fares. The story is not about an event, it is rather about the lack of one. It is the objectification of grief and its incommunicable nature, through the presentation of deliberate details.

Chekhov's prose is lucid, with a simple vocabulary (the translator has attempted to follow this style). He uses metaphorical language to recreate the scene – consider the description of the sledge-driver, "all white like a ghost". This simile is apt for the snow, it also indicates the listlessness of Iona, overpowered by grief.

Reading his story in prose is like reading a poem as the style is compressed, imaginative and almost lyrical displaying strong emotions and feelings. A Russian critic, Andrei Voznesensky writing about Chekhov says that he is "a master of understatement, of concealed meaning, of twilight scenes and of prose as compressed as poetry ...".

Exercise 1

'Misery' by Anton Chekhov

- i) Relate the sub title 'To Whom Shall I Tell My Grief?' to the main title of the story 'Misery'
- ii) Who is more sympathetic — the officer or the revellers or the young cabman? And why?
- iii) Why does Iona pour out his history to the mare?

14.5 LET US SUM UP

The story 'Misery' by Anton Chekhov deals with human insensitivity to other people's grief. It captures the agony of an old man who has been recently bereaved following the death of his son and his need to speak about his grief and unburden himself. The indifferent and unsympathetic world has no time to respond to his misery.

The story gives an authentic portrayal of human nature that remains unaffected by the sorrows of the world so long as they do not impinge on it at a personal level.

Exercise 1

- i. Refer to section 14.4.2
- ii. The officer at least asks him the question as to how his son died. The revellers have nothing to ask him. The only question they put to him is to mock at him as to whether he was married. Refer to 14.4.2 to elaborate
- iii. Refer to the last section in 14.4.2. Give your own interpretation as to whether talking to the mare shows Iona to be fanciful or truthful. Does he find the tenderness and affection seen in the mare's eyes comforting in contrast to the unresponsive indifference of fellow men?

15.2 'THE OTHER WOMAN'

Maganlal was thirty-six years old, a little fat, a little bald, and because of his insomnia he had learnt to fear the dark. Some time after midnight he was in the habit of walking bare-foot from room to room, switching on all the lights till the dark retreated outside the window, a thwarted, grimacing shape, trying to press its way in.

At thirty-nine minutes past twelve on this Wednesday night (or early Thursday morning, for he was punctilious about these things), Maganlal entered his study and switched on his reading lamp. His flat was fully ablaze, except for the bedroom which was like a dim cave with Vimla asleep on his bed in the heart of it. How could she snore so rhythmically when she was the cause, both immediate and remote, of his torment? There had been tears again at bedtime, accusations, and a slamming of the bathroom door. He had tried to reason with her, it had been a most earnest monologue delivered in three parts, from outside the locked door, stationed behind her dressing-table stool (how inviting was the slender nape of her neck!) and hovering anxiously over her lace pillow. His words had revealed a truly edifying elevation of thought, he had been aglow with the power they wielded to dispel all base suspicions from her mind—when she had astonished him by falling asleep in the middle of a sentence. How could someone who looked like a Madonna be so perverse?

Hitching up his silk pyjamas, Maganlal seated himself at his desk, turned the key of the top right-hand drawer, and with fastidious care placed a hand-written manuscript before him. Would he be able to work? He sighed. Three years ago he had been a happy, industrious man. Three years ago, a bachelor full of romantic errors, he had thought of a wife as a fragile hand serving food on a gleaming thali, a voice calling to his children and questions framed with deferential air, as music and fragrance, and a warm ecstatic yielding in the nights. He frowned. He was caught, instead, in a thunderstorm and buffeted without respite: for she was now all blare and rattle, flashes and torrential fury.

Perhaps he should have heeded the malicious whispers at the time of the wedding as the first faint rumblings of a gathering storm. People of ill-will had been pleased to circulate the story that he never would have won his bride but for her prodigal brother who, within a year of his father's death, had impoverished the family. But Maganlal was not a man to listen to gossip: and whether sudden penury was the reason, or Vimla had by her own, deliberate, intelligent choice decided to devote the rest of her life to a brilliant writer, it was not for him to say. The fact remained, however, that when she married him he had six film scripts to his credit which even now, from the vantage point of a new perspective, he could not think was a mean contribution to the Hindi movie industry.

Maganlal slid further into his swivel chair, settling his ample, ghee-fed middle more comfortably within its depths. Truth was his God, so he had been quite outspoken about the fact that all his six scripts were, in one way or another, imitations of Hollywood movies. But in this modern age, who could assert with any authority that the East is East and West is West? One only had to look around, and what did one find? An amalgam of different cultures. A synthesis of contrary trends and values. A Yehudi Menuhin making music with a Ravi Shanker. Mia Farrow at the feet of Mahesh Maharishi. No wonder then that his scripts had reached out to embrace a little bit of everything: Songs with their popular blend of ragas and jazz—even the Beatles had come to India to attempt some such thing. Dances which were a cross between Kuchipudi and the shake. Exciting melodrama. Tickling humour. Long shots of his noble cultural heritage like the Taj Mahal and Khajuraho, close-ups of his chaste suffering Indian womanhood and sexy westernized vamps inclined to top-heavy contours and topless costumes—but were they really so different from the ancient Ajanta beauties? Further, he had skillfully disguised the Hollywood James Bond as the Indian Jit Bharati with sideburns and forelock; and the role of the bouncing, irresistible counterspy had been played in six successive movies by the film find of the decade, Nikhil Fernandes, who had the kind of face men are tempted to punch in the nose, but which wrings sighs and caresses from women.

For a moment Maganlal's face, with its sleepy, Buddha-like passivity, looked wistful. He had long suspected that even Vimla thrilled to Nikhil's athletic charms, though she flared up unaccountably if he so much as hinted at it—and even though he would not have reproached her for it. For who can dictate to the heart? When Vimla had married him he had hoped for—what? That he would grow tall and spare and arrogant like Nikhil, even learn that sensual way of uncovering his teeth? That he would sprout a cowlick on his thinning head? We are all allowed a little fantasy. But it was not boastful to say that Nikhil had been a nonentity till his script had made him the idol of the Indian screen. Yes, his stories had been hot box-office material, even if his wastrel of a brother-in-law sneered at them. As for being a writer, he had overheard Sunil say to Vimla, the man is condemned to impotence. Of his prowess in other areas I am not competent to—. Here Maganlal had cleared his throat. It was his way of reminding people that he was there. The pair had not looked guilty. Vimla had not blushed and Sunil had bestowed on him from afar his amused and superior grin. It was possible, of course, that they had been talking about somebody else.

With determination Maganlal removed the gold top of his fountain pen. It did not matter if his nerves were frayed, if for the last four nights he had not slept at all. He hunched over his manuscript..... and thought of his many good friends who were forever urging him to forget his scribbling and take a greater interest in the family jewellery business. It was, after all, his bread and butter. It accounted for this ownership flat in the nouveau riche neighbourhood, with its highly advertised view (that was a fraud because a new building was going up in front of his nose), the modern décor, the Chor Bazaar antiques, the servants, the two cars and the membership in two clubs. (His father, who still had a razor-sharp business brain, was content to reside in three overflowing rooms with his two younger brothers and their families in the congested part of the city.) The income from the shop also met the whims of his wife who had a lively appreciation of things beautiful, becoming and expensive. But his heart was in his writing, even if it was a profession with little honour and recompense in his country. His first screenplay had minted money for the producer, the distributors, the stars and other celluloid satellites. It had also fetched him the miserable sum of Rs 101, the odd rupee being benevolently thrown in to wish him luck. But he had derived from this maiden venture a satisfaction so keen that one had to possess the authentic temperament of an artist to really appreciate it. And Vimla, alas, had never understood this.

One night, in the Mercedes on their way home from the Silver Jubilee celebrations of the last movie of the series, Jai, Jai, Jit, they had quite an argument. Vimla had a degree in English Literature from Bombay University, and after pronouncing him profoundly ignorant and lamentably uncultured (thank God the chauffeur did not understand such excellent English) she had called Jit some interesting names, among them: a great prize ox, a phallic symbol, a nauseating paragon, an indefatigable imbecile.

Her vehemence shook him, but Maganlal had been very patient. "Even if he is all you have said, whatever it means, consider this Vimla: how to do without Jit Bharati? How to kill the hen that lays the golden eggs? How to slaughter the bull that has sired so numerous a progeny—which if not of flawless pedigree are of a lucrative strain, you are having to admit?"

"What have the scripts you've written over the years earned for you? Why don't you spend more time in your father's jewellery shop?"

This stabbed him, but he attempted a feeble laugh. "Can an artist live by bread alone?"

The remark set her off in a new direction. If he must write, why didn't he avoid the pretentious and the superficial, why didn't he move away from the clichés? Why did he take no interest in the aesthetics of the cinema? He ought to read Cahiers du Cinema, he ought to read Sight and Sound, she was saying as they stopped for a red signal and the blank light of a street lamp fell on her mobile little mouth. He ought to study the work of Eisenstein and Renoir, the cinematographic technique of Ingmar Bergman, she was saying as the signal changed and they moved ahead. And she had talked most knowledgeably of out-of-focus photography, of Satyajit Ray, Mrinal Sen and the New Wave Films, of Tapas Sen's wizardry with lights, reverse printing, jump-cutting and whatnot before the car drew to a stop in front of their slim white perpendicular building, somnolent in the moonlight. And as they climbed the six synthetic marble steps to the archway before the row of elevators, she was urging him to ponder over Samuel Beckett's only venture in films, which had no dialogue in it, and the only sound one heard was "Sssh!"

He stared at her, aghast. "Are you meaning to say," he had sputtered, "that I should submit a script with only "Ssshes" written all over it? What are you talking?" His blood pressure was dangerously up as he banged shut the elevator doors. With difficulty he contained himself during their ascent up the first fifteen floors, then burst out, "It is your brother who has set you up to mock at my work!"

She had not deigned to answer him immediately. He abhorred violence, but he wrenched open the doors as the elevator stopped on the seventeenth floor and crashed them shut behind him. It was after the servant had ushered them in, in response to his imperious finger on the doorbell that she had said, misty-eyed, "I haven't seen Sunil in months, and you know it!" And she had sailed past with an injured air and made straight for the bedroom.

If his brother-in-law had been just a ne'er-do-well, Maganlal would not have found it difficult to bear on his patient brow a certain amount of reflected odium. After all, every family has someone who does not make good. But it seemed that Sunil had a streak of brilliance in him which had been discovered by his early teachers, who had loudly bruted their faith in his ultimate success in life. Unfortunately, Sunil had dropped out of college in the second year because he maintained that the serious pursuit of an academic degree was somewhat foolish in the context of contemporary realities, and not conducive to the growth of one's originality and talents. He also recognized that he was suffering from hypersensibility, and ordered himself a year or two of rest. It was during this period of elected idleness that his father died, and after devouring his patrimony and plunging the family into debt, Sunil had disappeared. At the time of Vimla's wedding, he surfaced again, virtually in rags. But his attitude to Maganlal, even when he came to borrow money, was cocksure and faintly derisive. He had about him an unpleasant aura of self-confidence, a kind of relaxed insolence. His patronage, entwined with subtle amusement, had so confused Maganlal that he had parted with a considerable amount of cash: which had only confirmed Sunil in his opinion that his sister was about to marry a bourgeois simpleton. But as someone had to do something about salvaging the family fortunes, he could not very well object to the match.

Maganlal could have forgiven his brother-in-law his snobbery, were it not for Vimla's inexplicable attitude towards him. He was still the outcast prince, the tragic hero, the oracle in exile. From time to time she sold remnants of her girlhood jewellery and begged Sunil to accept the money as her poor contribution towards his support. And each time Sunil, who loved himself with tenderness, wondered what all the fuss was about, and accepted her sacrifice with the best grace in the world. He did not believe in money. He believed in enriching his sensibilities, refining his critical faculties, in "finding himself". Who could tell, perhaps he would end up as a revolutionary, a professional lover of mankind. As an unemployed youth he could join the Naxalites. Or end his life in an ashram at Rishikesh. In the meanwhile he lived by his wits, a profession which afforded him a very slight margin of security.

But if Sunil's future was thus still undecided, Maganlal had no doubts at all about his own. Following Vimla with firm step into the bedroom, and seated beside her on the bed where she had collapsed in a moist, untidy heap without so much as removing her evening's finery, he had told her at length and in no uncertain terms that he meant to continue his literary endeavours. He was committed to Jit, he insisted in a voice tremulous with emotion as he ripped off his jacket and tie and shoes—he was never really comfortable in Western clothes—and he wore the pants in the family, he shouted at her, before he proceeded to remove them.

But the mischief was done. The seed of discontent was sown that very night, and a sudden and profound trouble entered Maganlal's heart. He could not sleep. In the days that followed he found to his despair that he could not write, either, and the bluff, weary tolerance with which he had endured the bumptious Jit for so many years, now seemed to him a mask of corruption.

After a prolonged period of sleeplessness and self-doubt, Maganlal tore up all his old notes and drafts, and began to work on a new screenplay, but what he wrote about now was his secret. He had never been happier. He was gloriously involved in his work, and spurred on in his efforts by the thought of the pride that would glow in Vimla's eyes when the scenario was completed. It would be his gift to her, a love-offering. How right she had been not to accept the mediocre in him! He wrote late into the night at the desk allotted to him at the film studio, but while he had once endlessly discussed Jit's high-jinks and escapades with a bored and stony-eyed Vimla, he could not now bear to speak about his work to anyone. He hugged the secret to himself, with a warm and increasingly beautiful sense of possession. It was a kind of wall, a fortress behind which he could retreat at will. His other tasks he performed perfunctorily and detachedly, all the while nursing this wonderful secret. On his friends he bestowed a passing look, a merely tolerant eye. And when he came to bed at preposterously late hours, he did not try to woo his wife with timid whispers or tentative touches in the dark, but fell asleep in strange solitary contentment, bearing the burden of an elaborate mystery.

At first Vimla did not appear to notice the change in him. Later on when she did, he thought her immediate feeling was one of relief that she need not endure his gaucheries in bed. For really he had no gift for the job (hadn't he been an amateur at everything, up to this point?) and she had been no help at all, she gave him no cues, so that lying beside her in bed he had suffered dreadfully from attacks of stage-fright. Even after three years nothing was taken for granted between them, all was precarious and agonized. His docility offended her as much as his fumbling importunities. He knew he tried too hard to please, and when at last she responded he was rather frightened by the miracle of it all. But suddenly he was liberated, and none of it was important any more.

He was totally unprepared, therefore, when the whole situation exploded with dramatic force one night, and his shocked denials, his explanations, his pleas availed him nothing: she suspected another woman. A tramp. A witch. A bitch. An actress, no doubt. He was bemused, seduced, enslaved by her, he spent riotous hours in her arms. In desperation he confessed his secret, and even brought home his precious manuscript from the studio, as evidence of his fidelity, but she pushed it away angrily. His abstracted looks told her he was miles away in unlawful memories of the woman who had usurped her place. His inertia in bed told her he was engaged in a disreputable liaison, and she was beside herself at such duplicity.

Night after night she demanded the name of her rival, and because she could not get it out of him, she was haunted by the thought that she was making poor use of her youth and beauty. And she who had been indifferent to his desire, was now bent on rousing it, and her behaviour was not such as he would have commonly associated with demureness.

She turned to the gods in her extremity. When it was clear to her that her husband was absolutely consumed by the flame of his passion, she abstained from food every Tuesday and Saturday, to coerce her chosen deities to act in her favour. She also distributed alms freely to the beggars outside the Babulnath Temple on Mondays. When all this did not have the desired result, she grew bitter and vindictive, and with a wealth of details told him what she would do to the other woman if she ever got her hands on her: sewing her up in a sack and casting her into the sea (the fate of ancient queens and concubines suspected of infidelity) was one of her more humane methods of elimination....

The strain of the feud began to tell on him, he could neither sleep nor work, but still she would not desist. She was voluble with reproaches for his faithlessness, and silent only with hostility. If he held his tongue she felt the subterfuge in his silences. If he argued with her, she heard the guilt in his long-winded peroration before it lulled her to sleep. His wakefulness, she felt, was well-merited, and if she slept deeply sometimes it was only because she had nothing on her conscience to make her toss.

Maganlal looked up from his manuscript, bleary-eyed. Not a line had been written but, mercifully, the dawn was creeping in. No true light was yet discernible at the window, it was the barest suggestion of morning, murky as a shallow pond, with no hint of sunrise. But it was enough.

He put down his pen and with fastidious care replaced the manuscript in the top right-hand drawer and turned the key. His chair creaked as he rose and switched off the reading lamp.

He walked from room to room, turning off all the lights. Then he went into his bedroom and switched off the dim night-light shaped like a tulip growing on the wall. Vimla was not awake yet. He laid himself down cautiously on his side of the bed.

He must have dozed off a little, for when he opened his eyes again there was more light in the room, and Vimla was no longer sleeping beside him. He lay there, wondering what time it was. From the front room he heard a murmur of voices. Who was Vimla talking to, so early in the morning?

Hitching up his pyjamas, Maganlal stood at the door of his living-room. Facing him, astride one of the leggy dining suite chairs turned back-to-front, and riding it as if it were a horse, sat Sunil, his unshaven chin supported on fists resting on the delicate rosewood frame. Maganlal cleared his throat and Sunil looked up. "Ah, there he is!" His expression grew extremely sardonic, and he winked at himself in the gilt-edged mirror on the opposite wall. "Talk of the devil!"

At the exclamation Vimla, who was sitting on a pouffe at his side rose stiffly to her feet and made to leave the room.

"Where do you think you are going, didi?".. called out Sunil.

"Back to my room," said Vimla haughtily, though there were signs of recent tears on her face. "I have no wish to speak to him." And she slipped past Maganlal, careful not to touch him, as if to avoid contagion.

"Well well," said Sunil to Maganlal, "sit down," he waved one hand, "anywhere you like," as if he owned the place.

For a moment Maganlal hesitated, then sat down on the divan covered with new peacock-blue tapestry, and crossed his legs. "You have something to say to me," he said. He looked very dignified, like a bronze idol on a silk pedestal.

Across the room Sunil scratched at his stubble with a dirty nail and stared at him as if he were an oddity of considerable scientific interest. "I simply would not have believed it," he said at last. "I never would have thought you had it in you."

Maganlal folded his hands over his rounded stomach. "I do not know what you are talking about."

Sunil got up abruptly from the chair and began to pace the room. It was obvious that he was prepared to enjoy himself. "You have made my sister very unhappy," he began.

"She has no cause to be unhappy," said Maganlal.

"You have not only deceived her," Sunil went on, "but you have also deceived me."

"I'm not aware of how—"

"Don't interrupt," snapped Sunil and took a deliberate turn round the room. "I had thought of you as a dullish chap, Maganlal. A nullity. As the useful appendage of a vibrant, intelligent woman." Here he paused dramatically before Maganlal. "I had looked upon your life with my sister as the tame chronicle of an estimable marriage. And all the while you were carrying on with another woman!" A peculiar note had crept into his voice, half ironic, half enthusiastic. It told Maganlal that by the mere fact of betraying his wife he had stolen a march over her; that by engaging in sinfulness he had adequately bested her. "Is she the first?" Sunil was demanding. "Is she the last? Who would have thought you capable of such uproarious seductions!"

"There is no other woman!" shouted Maganlal, outraged.

Sunil folded his arms across his chest. "No doubt you already see your passion in Technicolour."

"You are quite mistaken—"

"Your conduct has always been so exemplary, irreproachable, that this is an unheard-of audacity. Can't you see that you are miscast in this role?"

"Will you please believe me—"

Sunil held up his hand for silence. "What should happen to you, Maganlal," he said in measured tones, "is that you should be tied to a stake with fire under your feet. And over fire, copper, tulsi and Ganga water you should be made to take an oath. What oath?" He stared at Maganlal with patrician distaste.

“That you will never again, on the pain of death, raise your eyes above the feet of any woman other than your wife.”

For a wild moment Maganlal’s world turned red as something was ignited within him. He leapt up, and with a ringing back-handed slap—which took him by surprise as much as Sunil — he wiped off the insolence on the thin clever face poised above his. And before his brother-in-law could summon his breath or his wits, Maganlal found himself insisting in a crazy, stentorian voice (which he had difficulty in recognizing as his own) that come what may, he would never give up this woman who was dearer to him than his life.

“Do your worst!” he shouted with a swashbuckling valour worthy of Jit himself. “I will not be parted from her! She is my soul! The fire of my loins! Many floods cannot quench it!” He was word perfect. “And I will bring all this crashing down on my head—” he gestured violently, and with a flourish that almost bowled him over, succeeded in sending the heavy bronze figure of Nataraja flying across the room— “before I allow anyone to take her away from me—”

With a piteous cry and a swish of her batik raw-silk housecoat Vimla came running out of the bedroom and flung herself at his feet. “No,” she cried, “no no, I cannot bear this, I cannot, you will not cast me aside for this woman, I’m your wife...your wife!” And she clung to his feet, weeping with abandon and unconsciously impersonating the heroine of his fifth script.

Above her Maganlal, not a little flustered that his life had changed gears and was swerving at an alarming angle from its predicted course, almost bent over to help her up when he met Sunil’s gaze across the room.

‘Out!’ said Maganlal to his hapless relative, pointing to the door with totalitarian ire. After the purge he cleared his throat nervously, and fixed his eye on the woman at his feet.

15.3 DISCUSSION

'The Other Woman' was published in the collection of short stories named after it, The Other Woman, and Other Stories (1981). It is both a humorous and a highly ironical account of the domestic strife between the protagonist, Maganlal and his wife. The story is a comment on shallow sophistication and a superficial understanding of the "aesthetic" that is completely divorced from the actual and the mundane reality of our lives.

Maganlal is a married man of thirty-six, who suffers from insomnia or the inability to sleep and is afraid of the dark. It is night and he has switched on all the lights in the house except for the room where his wife, Vimla is fast asleep. He sits at his reading desk to work on his manuscript but his thoughts are on his wife who accused him of something serious and then fell asleep in the middle of his explanations. This strain of humour is interspersed with the most serious moments throughout the story.

We are told that he had married three years ago and marriage to Vimla had shattered his fanciful image of a docile wife. Also, at the time of the marriage, people had suggested that he had won the hand of Vimla only due to his wealth as Vimla's brother had squandered away his dead father's money leaving the family destitute. Maganlal, however, had not paid attention to these stories at that time because he was proud of his success as a scriptwriter for six super-hit Hindi movies and considered himself a brilliant writer.

Maganlal admits that his scripts are copies of Hollywood movies to which he has added the right mix of all the popular ingredients like comedy, fusion music and dance, romance, and action but this does not, to his mind, take away anything from his brilliance. He is proud of his creation, the character of Jit Bharati played by the actor Nikhil Fernandes, who has become a superstar because of his scripts. In fact, he is conscious of a secret wish to possess Nikhil's good looks which, he suspects, are appreciated by Vimla too despite her strong denials. Vimla's brother, however, makes fun of him and his writing.

We are brought back to the fact that Maganlal is thinking about all this sitting at his desk with his manuscript. He tries once again to concentrate on his work but his mind drifts away into other thoughts. The story is continued by relating Maganlal's thoughts as he sits there.

Maganlal's friends often urge him to give more time to his family jewellery business than to his writing and it is here that we come to know that the source of Maganlal's riches is the jewellery business and not his successful scripts. However, Maganlal finds satisfaction and pleasure in his writing and the success of the movies even though all the profits are minted by others.

It is on this subject that he and Vimla have a heated argument. Vimla, with her degree in English literature, expresses her opinion that her husband's stories lack aesthetic depth. Notice that Vimla does not ask Maganlal to write something original or different but to follow people like Satyajit Ray, Mrinal Sen and Samuel Beckett who are admired for their artistic endeavours in film-making. This points to the fact that Vimla's conditioning, part of which derives from her education and part from her brother, has led her to respect and admire a particular kind of art and disdain another. Maganlal does not understand much of Vimla's critique of his work but is very upset that his own wife should look down upon the writing he is so proud of. He gives vent to his frustration by asserting that he is the master of the house ("wore the pants in the family") and would do as he pleased. However, he is no longer able to write about Jit because Vimla's criticism brings his own dissatisfaction with the "bumptious" or conceited character to the surface. This is how he first loses his sleep.

After many days of restlessness following this incident, Maganlal decides to write a new kind of story, one which Vimla would be proud of. He begins devoting all his time to this script and works late at night on it. Moreover, unlike his previous work which he discussed with Vimla, he keeps this script secret from everyone.

The story now takes a most humorous and ironical twist when we are informed that Vimla mistakenly attributes Maganlal's changed behaviour to the assumption that he is having an affair with another woman. To add to the irony, Maganlal's confusion at this sudden charge convinces Vimla of his guilt and all his explanations fall on deaf ears. The subsequent days are spent with Vimla trying to make Maganlal 'confess' the name of this imagined other woman and her methods for doing so involve everything from seduction to prayers. It is at this point that we realise that the night where this story opens has followed just one such day of bickering between the husband and the wife.

The story now brings us back to the present with Maganlal still sitting at his desk without having written anything. But dawn is approaching and a tired Maganlal returns to his bedroom to sleep for a few hours. He is woken up by the sound of voices from the living room. It is Sunil, Vimla's arrogant good-for-nothing brother, who claims to disdain money in favour of 'higher' things in life but often borrows it from his brother-in-law. Vimla leaves the two men alone to talk. After making a rude joke of the fact that he had not thought a dull man like Maganlal capable of having an affair with any woman, Sunil pompously demands that Maganlal take an oath of never cheating on his wife again.

Incapable of swallowing such offensive behaviour, Maganlal slaps Sunil and shouts that he would never leave the other woman come what may. Of course, the other woman does not exist, but Maganlal wants to make it clear that he would not be dictated to by a wastrel like Sunil. Hearing this, Vimla comes running from the bedroom and pleads with Maganlal, crying at his feet. Taken aback, Maganlal is about to help up his wife when he realizes that he must not give any opportunity of retaliation to Sunil. He orders Sunil to leave the house, and then turns his attention to Vimla.

15.4 CHARACTERS

In the present story, the characters do not simply stand for individuals but also represent 'types.' This means that the author has used her characters to represent people of a certain social background and they reflect the peculiarities of our contemporary society.

15.4.1 Maganlal

Maganlal is a rich man who has inherited the family jewellery business. However, his heart lies in writing scripts for Hindi movies and he derives immense satisfaction from the success of the movies made from his scripts. So against the advice of his friends, who keep asking him to stop writing and concentrate more on the jewellery business as that is the source of his income and affluence, Maganlal continues to devote most of his time to writing. It is easy to understand for the reader why this is so. The feeling of achievement that writing provides to Maganlal cannot come from making money alone. However, the scripts that he writes are copies of the plots of Hollywood movies although he does not see anything wrong in this. He believes that he is bringing the East and the West closer by doing so and that his works are worthy pieces of art.

Maganlal has been married for three years but the husband and wife have differences on several issues. Maganlal is a mild man who has a fanciful image of what a wife should be like until he gets married to Vimla. He had thought that a wife would be a docile partner who would minister to his needs and bring up his children but Vimla is an educated, intelligent woman who expresses her opinions and demands her due. Maganlal is somewhat in awe of his beautiful wife and wishes to please her. So when Vimla expresses her utter disdain for the character Jit Bharati, the stereotypical hero he has created for the screen, he decides to write something of which his wife would be proud.

Maganlal's physical description is also quite important in sketching his character. He has given Jit Bharati all those physical charms that he lacks himself. Fat and balding, he is aware that he does not fit the standards of a good looking man set by our society. He wishes to compensate for this lack of good looks through the brilliance of his writing.

We can see that Maganlal's ideas have been influenced more by watching commercial Hindi cinema than by reading books. This explains his image of a wife and the kind of stories that he writes. But he is essentially a simple straightforward man who is much closer to understanding his social reality than Vimla. He recognizes the significance of money as well as of art and cannot think of art as something that is completely divorced from all monetary considerations even though it is not he who mints the profits of his writing but the producers, directors and actors. His decision to write something different after the argument with Vimla shows that he wishes to be respected by his wife and also that he genuinely wants to improve as an artist, however limited his understanding of the subject might be.

The climax of the story is reached when, in a state of extreme anger, Maganlal falsely “confesses” that he has a relationship with another woman and then refuses to be parted from her at any cost. Why does Maganlal say such a thing? He wishes to assert that he will not be ordered about by the insolent Sunil and that he will do as he pleases. He realizes that “...by the mere fact of betraying his wife he had stolen a march over her...” in Sunil’s eyes. He uses this fact to get rid of Sunil by making a false confession.

In short, Maganlal represents those people of the rich urban business class who wish to make a contribution to art and culture in order to join the group of the educated elite. He is a mild straightforward man who loves his wife and wishes to be loved in turn by her. He is not satisfied by making money alone through the jewellery business and chooses to write in order to feel that he has achieved something in life. His idea of art is one that is successful and popular. By the end of the story he realizes that despite all her high-fangled ideas and a modern literary education, his wife is not very different from the kind of women he writes about.

15.4.2 Vimla

Vimla is a young, beautiful and intelligent woman who has a degree in English Literature from Bombay University. While people suggest that she has married Maganlal simply because he is a rich man, it is quite clear in the story that Vimla has a warm regard for her husband, yet also enjoys the glamour and the comfort of the life that her husband provides. However, her notions of art and aesthetics have been nurtured by a western literary education and her brother Sunil from whom she has high hopes of achieving something great. She is unable to reflect on her own ground reality and is unable to realize that all Sunil’s claims of talent are self-centered and false. While she is right in pointing out that Maganlal’s stories revolve around hackneyed clichés, her own understanding of art is completely detached from reality. We must remember however, that she does not criticize Maganlal to win a point over him but because she wishes the best for him.

When her husband starts spending his time secretly in writing a new kind of script, her insecurity comes to the surface. She cannot think of any other explanation except the most hackneyed one – that her husband must be cheating on her. This suspicion consumes her day by day and all Maganlal’s explanations only add to her conviction that there is some other woman. Her vanity suffers a blow; she feels that “...she is making poor use of her youth and beauty.” Her suspicions reach a climax when Maganlal shouts out in anger at Sunil that he will not be parted from the (imaginary) other woman. She, who has spent the preceding days demanding the name of her rival and threatening her husband with wild descriptions of what she would do to this other woman, now breaks down into tears at the feet of Maganlal pleading with him not to desert her for someone else. In doing so, she behaves exactly like those clichéd heroines Maganlal writes about. The author expertly demonstrates that Vimla's reality is much closer to Maganlal's popular fictional world than to the elite literary fictional world which she so admires.

'The Other Woman'
by Dina Mehta

Vimla represents those people of the privileged educated middle-class who take pride in their high aesthetic tastes and modern outlook but in doing so, refuse to accept their real fears and needs in everyday life.

15.4.3 Sunil

Sunil is an irresponsible, self-centered man who is in love with himself. He squanders away all his family's money within a year of his father's death and then conveniently disappears till he hears of his sister's impending marriage to Maganlal. However, what makes Sunil unbearable is his arrogance. He is completely convinced about his own brilliance and looks down upon others. He is neither grateful for Maganlal's generosity nor for his sister's little sacrifices of her girlhood jewellery to support him financially. He drops out of college on the pretext that a college degree is "...not conducive to the growth of one's originality and talents" and declares that he does not "believe in money." Sunil's role in the story is that of a catalyst in making Maganlal lose his temper, which in turn paves the way for a resolution of the ongoing conflict between Maganlal and Vimla.

Sunil typifies hypocritical people who proclaim their own greatness to the world but live the life of parasites, subsisting on the mercy of others.

5) derisive	imitating
6) abstracted	hard-working
7) impersonating	taken over
8) usurped	vague or absentminded
9) imitations	precise

15.5 BACKGROUND

The present story is set in a rich flat in contemporary urban Mumbai. This physical atmosphere sets the mood appropriate for the theme of the story and we are able to smile at the physical description of Maganlal even when he is worried and unable to sleep: “Maganlal slid further into his swivel chair, settling his ample, ghee-fed middle more comfortably within its depths.” The only other physical setting in the story is of the car in which the husband and wife have their argument over Maganlal’s writing. It is a chauffeur-driven Mercedes, and this again underlines affluence.

Within the flat, the action of the story takes place in the bedroom where Vimla falls asleep in the middle of Maganlal’s explanations, in Maganlal’s study where he sits thinking about the past, and in the living room where the climax of the story is played out. Notice the few phrases interspersed in the action like:

- (a) “dressing-table stool,” “lace pillow” and “night-light shaped like a tulip growing on the wall” to describe the bedroom,
- (b) “swivel chair” and “gold top of his fountain-pen” in the study, and
- (c) “gilt-edged mirror,” “leggy dining suite chairs,” “divan covered with new peacock-blue tapestry” and “heavy bronze figure of Nataraja” in the living room.

All these phrases help to build a clear picture of the flat in our minds and bring attention to the expensive furnishing and the opulence.

15.6 PROSE STYLE

Dina Mehta’s prose style in ‘The Other Woman’ is marked by its humour and irony. Irony refers to a situation which is the exact opposite of what it is supposed to be. One example to understand the notion of irony is the case of a blind man leading a person with normal eyesight during a power-cut at night. We usually expect people with normal eyesight to help the blind in finding their way but in the above case, there is no light to see by because of a power-cut and it is the blind man, accustomed to walking in the dark, who leads the way. Irony is a powerful device and may be used in many ways – it may be used to give a serious message (like the above example may be used to give the message that we should give due respect and equal rights to the blind) or it may be used for producing humour or commenting on our little follies.

The first ironical incident is the falling asleep of Vimla when Maganlal is offering his explanation, which according to him displays a “...truly edifying elevation of thought.” Next is the fact that Maganlal does not find anything wrong in imitating Hollywood movies but thinks of his stories as simply a “synthesis of contrary trends and values.” Then, Maganlal starts spending his time secretly in order to write a manuscript to please Vimla and instead this leads to Vimla’s suspicions of a liaison with another woman. Again, it is ironical that it is the imagined infidelity which makes Sunil think that Maganlal has scored a point over his sister. Finally, the most ironical of all is the effect of Maganlal’s false confession on both Sunil and Vimla. In fact, the very title of the story, ‘The Other Woman’ is quite ironical because usually a story is titled after the main character or situation but here, the other woman does not even exist.

Another important feature of the prose style is the use of parentheses or round brackets to give little pieces of facts and thoughts in between descriptions of another place or incident. For example,

...(how inviting was the slender nape of her neck!)

(His father, who still had a razor-sharp business brain, was content to reside in three overflowing rooms with his two younger brothers and their families in a congested part of the city.)

...(thank God the chauffeur did not understand such excellent English)...

Also notice that the story is not told in a linear fashion. We come to know of the cause of the tension between the couple through Maganlal's reminiscences while he is sitting at his desk. There is an ample use of adjectives that allows for powerful descriptions. You can see this in phrases like "earnest monologue," "fastidious care," "fragile hand," "prodigal brother," "Exciting melodrama," "Tickling humour," "nouveau riche neighbourhood," "highly advertised view," "indefatigable imbecile," "disreputable liaison," "swashbuckling valour," "totalitarian ire," and so on.

There is playful use of language to produce humour. For example:

"He was committed to Jit, he insisted in a voice tremulous with emotion as he ripped off his jacket and tie and shoes—he was never really comfortable in Western clothes—and he wore the pants in the family, he shouted at her, before he proceeded to remove them."

Here, we see the use of the device called "juxtaposition" which means that two contrasting things are placed together. Maganlal is here countering Vimla's criticism of Jit, but this is described in the same sentence as his taking off the formal clothes that he had worn to the Silver Jubilee celebrations. Further, the phrase "wearing the pants in the family" means that he is the master in the house but he then takes off the literal pants that he is wearing. Thus, the juxtaposition of the proverbial and the literal creates the effect of humour and displays Dina Mehta's expert use of language.

- ii) Write in about 100 words, about Dina Mehta's prose style as reflected in 'The Other Woman.'

15.7 LET US SUM UP

At the surface level, this is a funny story which revolves around the misplaced suspicions of a wife about her husband's infidelity. However, at a deeper level it comments on the notions of art and money and the way in which the relationship between the two is perceived in our contemporary society.

After reading this unit carefully, you should be able to:

- delineate the plot;
- describe the background;
- draw character sketches;
- describe the main features of Virginia Woolf's style and technique.

16.1 INTRODUCTION

One of the most talented and innovative novelists in English literature, Virginia Woolf (1882-1941) was born Virginia Stephen in London. Her father was the eminent critic Leslie Stephen, and though Woolf received little in the way of formal education, her mind was shaped by her avid reading from her father's extensive book collection and from conversations with his friends, many of whom were prominent writers of the era. After her father's death in 1904, Woolf moved with her sister, the painter Vanessa Bell, to a house in the Bloomsbury district of London and became a member of the "Bloomsbury Group," which had many of England's finest young artists and intellectuals – the economist John Maynard Keynes, the biographer Lytton Strachey, the art critics and painters Roger Fry and Clive Bell, the novelist E.M. Forster, among others. She married fellow Bloomsburian, Leonard Woolf, socialist, thinker and writer in 1912. Leonard and Virginia Woolf set up the Hogarth Press in 1917.

Woolf's first novel The Voyage Out (1915) explored the tensions experienced by women who want marriage and a career. Woolf's major works such as Mrs. Dalloway (1925), To the Lighthouse (1927), and The Waves (1931) rejected the boundaries of traditional narrative form. She sought to develop a "stream of consciousness" narrative, that could capture the essence of the sensibility, the experience itself in terms of time, memory, and consciousness. She is considered one of the founders of the Modernist movement.

Besides making her mark as a novelist of great renown, Woolf's spirit of creative adventure led her to explore and experiment with the short story genre, in stories like 'A Haunted House,' 'Monday or Tuesday,' 'Kew Gardens,' 'The Mark on the Wall,' 'The New Dress,' 'The Lady in the Looking-Glass,' 'The Legacy,' etc. Woolf used her short fiction as a 'testing ground' for her novels; the stories reveal the evolution of Woolf's experimental methods and the origin of some of the major themes in her novels.

Woolf has also written a large number of essays and book reviews collected in books like Modern Fiction (1919), The Common Reader (1925), The Common Reader second series (1932) and The Death of the Moth and Other Essays (1942). The majority of Woolf's essays are devoted to literary matters. Her social and political concerns revolved chiefly around the rights of women and women writers. In A Room of One's Own (1929) Woolf argues that "a woman must have money and a room of her own" if she is to write fiction of any merit.

Despite the material comforts enjoyed by her family, Woolf's childhood was a traumatic one. She suffered sexual abuse by her half brothers after the death of her mother in 1895. She had to contend with frequent bouts of depression throughout her life. Sensing the onset of another breakdown, on 28 March, 1941 Woolf drowned herself. Before committing suicide she had left the following poignant note behind for her husband Leonard Woolf:

Dearest, I feel certain I am going mad again. I feel we can't go through another of those terrible times. And I shan't recover this time.

In October 1940, Virginia Woolf wrote the story called 'The Legacy' about a widower (a right-wing politician) who discovers from reading his wife's diaries that she had fallen in love with a radical working man and committed suicide.

16.2.1 Text

'For Sissy Miller.' Gilbert Clandon, taking up the pearl brooch that lay among a litter of rings and brooches on a little table in his wife's drawing-room, read the inscription: 'For Sissy Miller, with my love.'

It was like Angela to have remembered even Sissy Miller, her secretary. Yet how strange it was, Gilbert Clandon thought once more, that she had left everything in such order—a little gift of some sort for every one of her friends. It was as if she had foreseen her death. Yet she had been in perfect health when she left the house that morning, six weeks ago; when she stepped off the kerb in Piccadilly and the car had killed her.

He was waiting for Sissy Miller. He had asked her to come; he owed her, he felt, after all the years she had been with them, this token of consideration. Yes, he went on, as he sat there waiting, it was strange that Angela had left everything in such order. Every friend had been left some little token of her affection. Every ring, every necklace, every little Chinese box—she had a passion for little boxes—had a name on it. And each had some memory for him. This he had given her; this—the enamel dolphin with the ruby eyes—she had pounced upon one day in a back street in Venice. He could remember her little cry of delight. To him, of course, she had left nothing in particular, unless it were her diary. Fifteen little volumes, bound in green leather, stood behind him on her writing table. Ever since they were married, she had kept a diary. Some of their very few—he could not call them quarrels, say tiffs—had been about that diary. When he came in and found her writing, she always shut it or put her hand over it. "No, no, no," he could hear her say, "After I'm dead—perhaps." So she had left it him, as her legacy. It was the only thing they had not shared when she was alive. But he had always taken it for granted that she would outlive him. If only she had stopped one moment, and had thought what she was doing, she would be alive now. But she had stepped straight off the kerb; the driver of the car had said at the inquest. She had given him no chance to pull up....Here the sound of voices in the hall interrupted him.

"Miss Miller, Sir," said the maid.

She came in. He had never seen her alone in his life, nor, of course, in tears. She was terribly distressed, and no wonder. Angela had been much more to her than an employer. She had been a friend. To himself, he thought, as he pushed a chair for her and asked her to sit down, she was scarcely distinguishable from any other woman of her kind. There were thousands of Sissy Millers—drab little women in black, carrying attache cases. But Angela, with her genius for sympathy, had discovered all sorts of qualities in Sissy Miller. She was the soul of discretion; so silent; so trustworthy, one could tell her anything, and so on.

Miss Miller could not speak at first. She sat there dabbing her eyes with her pocket handkerchief. Then she made an effort.

"Pardon me, Mr. Clandon," she said.

He murmured. Of course he understood. It was only natural. He could guess what his wife had meant to her.

"I've been so happy here," she said, looking round. Her eyes rested on the writing table behind him. It was here they had worked—she and Angela. For Angela had her share of the duties that fall to the lot of the wife of a prominent politician. She had been the greatest help to him in his career. He had often seen her and Sissy sitting at that table—Sissy at the typewriter, taking down letters from her dictation. No doubt Miss Miller was thinking of that, too. Now all he had to do was to give her the brooch his wife had left her. A rather incongruous gift it seemed. It might have been better to have left her a sum of money, or even the typewriter. But there it was—"For Sissy Miller, with my love." And, taking the brooch, he gave it her with the little speech that he had prepared. He knew, he said, that she would value it. His wife had often worn it....And she replied, as she took it almost as if she too had prepared a speech, that it would always be a treasured possession....She had, he supposed, other clothes upon which a pearl brooch would not look quite so incongruous. She was wearing the little black coat and skirt that seemed the uniform of her profession. Then he remembered—she was in mourning, of course. She, too, had had her tragedy—a brother, to whom she was devoted, had died only a week or two before Angela. In some accident was it? He could not remember—only Angela telling him. Angela, with her genius for sympathy, had been terribly upset. Meanwhile Sissy Miller had risen. She was putting on her gloves. Evidently she felt that she ought not to intrude. But he could not let her go without saying something about her future. What were her plans? Was there any way in which he could help her?

She was gazing at the table, where she had sat at her typewriter, where the diary lay. And, lost in her memories of Angela, she did not at once answer his suggestion that he should help her. She seemed for a moment not to understand. So he repeated:

"What are your plans, Miss Miller?"

"My plans? Oh, that's all right, Mr. Clandon," she exclaimed. "Please don't bother yourself about me."

He took her to mean that she was in no need of financial assistance. It would be better, he realized, to make any suggestion of that kind in a letter. All he could do now was to say as he pressed her hand, "Remember, Miss Miller, if there's any way in which I can help you, it will be a pleasure...." Then he opened the door. For a moment, on the threshold, as if a sudden thought had struck her, she stopped.

"Mr. Clandon," she said, looking straight at him for the first time, and for the first time he was struck by the expression, sympathetic yet searching, in her eyes. "If at any time," she continued, "there's anything I can do to help you, remember, I shall feel it, for your wife's sake, a pleasure . . ."

With that she was gone. Her words and the look that went with them were unexpected. It was almost as if she believed, or hoped, that he would have need of her. A curious, perhaps a fantastic idea occurred to him as he returned to his chair. Could it be, that during all those years when he had scarcely noticed her, she, as the novelists say, had entertained a passion for him? He caught his own reflection in the glass as he passed. He was over fifty; but he could not help admitting that he was still, as the looking-glass showed him, a very distinguished-looking man.

"Poor Sissy Miller!" he said, half laughing. How he would have liked to share that joke with his wife! He turned instinctively to her diary. "Gilbert," he read, opening it at random, "looked so wonderful. . . ." It was as if she had answered his question. Of course, she seemed to say, you're very attractive to women. Of course Sissy Miller felt that too. He read on. "How proud I am to be his wife!" And he had always been very proud to be her husband. How often, when they dined out somewhere, he had looked at her across the table and said to himself, She is the loveliest woman here! He read on. That first year he had been standing for Parliament. They had toured his constituency. "When Gilbert sat down the applause was terrific. The whole audience rose and sang: "For he's a jolly good fellow." I was quite overcome." He remembered that, too. She had been sitting on the platform beside him. He could still see the glance she cast at him, and how she had tears in her eyes. And then? He turned the pages. They had gone to Venice. He recalled that happy holiday after the election. "We had ices at Florians." He smiled—she was still such a child; she loved ices. "Gilbert gave me a most interesting account of the history of Venice. He told me that the Doges. . ." she had written it all out in her schoolgirl hand. One of the delights of travelling with Angela had been that she was so eager to learn. She was so terribly ignorant, she used to say, as if that were not one of her charms. And then—he opened the next volume—they had come back to London. "I was so anxious to make a good impression. I wore my wedding dress." He could see her now sitting next to old Sir Edward; and making a conquest of that formidable old man, his chief. He read on rapidly, filling in scene after scene from her scrappy fragments. "Dined at the House of Commons....To an evening party at the Lovegroves. Did I realize my responsibility, Lady L. asked me, as Gilbert's wife?" Then, as the years passed—he took another volume from the writing table—he had become more and more absorbed in his work. And she, of course, was more often alone....It had been a great grief to her, apparently, that they had had no children. "How I wish," one entry read, "that Gilbert had a son!" Oddly enough he had never much regretted that himself. Life had been so full, so rich as it was. That year he had been given a minor post in the government. A minor post only, but her comment was: "I am quite certain now that he will be Prime Minister!" Well, if things had gone differently, it might have been so. He paused here to speculate upon what might have been. Politics was a gamble, he reflected; but the game wasn't over yet. Not at fifty. He cast his eyes rapidly over more pages, full of the little trifles, the insignificant, happy, daily trifles that had made up her life.

He took up another volume and opened it at random. "What a coward I am! I let the chance slip again. But it seemed selfish to bother him with my own affairs, when he has so much to think about. And we so seldom have an evening alone." What was the meaning of that? Oh, here was the explanation—it referred to her work in the East End. "I plucked up courage and talked to Gilbert at last. He was so kind, so good. He made no objection." He remembered that conversation. She had told him that she felt so idle, so useless. She wished to have some work of her own. She wanted to do something—she had blushed so prettily, he remembered, as she said it, sitting in that very chair—to help others. He had bantered her a little. Hadn't she enough to do looking after him, after her home? Still, if it amused her, of course he had no objection. What was it? Some district? Some committee? Only she must promise not to make herself ill. So it seemed that every Wednesday she went to Whitechapel. He remembered how he hated the clothes she wore on those occasions. But she had taken it very seriously, it seemed. The diary was full of references like this: "Saw Mrs. Jones. . . . She has ten children. . . . Husband lost his arm in an accident. . . . Did my best to find a job for Lily." He skipped on. His own name occurred less frequently. His interest slackened. Some of the entries conveyed nothing to him. For example: "Had a heated argument about socialism with B. M." Who was B. M.? He could not fill in the initials; some woman, he supposed, that she had met on one of her committees. "B. M. made a violent attack upon the upper classes....I walked back after the meeting with B. M. and tried to convince him. But he is so narrow-minded." So B. M. was a man—no doubt one of those "intellectuals," as they call themselves, who are so violent, as Angela said, and so narrowminded. She had invited him to come and see her apparently. "B. M. came to dinner. He shook hands with Minnie!" That note of exclamation gave another twist to his mental picture. B. M., it seemed, wasn't used to parlourmaids; he had shaken hands with Minnie. Presumably he was one of those tame working men who air their views in ladies' drawing-rooms. Gilbert knew the type, and had no liking for this particular specimen, whoever B. M. might be. Here he was again. "Went with B. M. to the Tower of London. . . . He said revolution is bound to come. . . . He said we live in a Fool's Paradise." That was just the kind of thing B. M. would say—Gilbert could hear him. He could also see him quite distinctly—a stubby little man, with a rough beard, red tie, dressed as they always did in tweeds, who had never done an honest day's work in his life. Surely Angela had the sense to see through him? He read on. "B. M. said some very disagreeable things about —" The name was carefully scratched out. "I told him I would not listen to any more abuse of—" Again the name was obliterated. Could it have been his own name? Was that why Angela covered the page so quickly when he came in? The thought added to his growing dislike of B. M. He had had the impertinence to discuss him in this very room. Why had Angela never told him? It was very unlike her to conceal anything; she had been the soul of candour. He turned the pages, picking out every reference to B. M. "B. M. told me the story of his childhood. His mother went out charring . . . When I think of it, I can hardly bear to go on living in such luxury. . . . Three guineas for one hat!" If only she had discussed the matter with him, instead of puzzling her poor little head about questions that were much too difficult for her to understand! He had lent her books. Karl Marx. The Coming Revolution. The initials B.M., B. M., B. M., recurred repeatedly. But why never the full name? There was an informality, an intimacy in the use of initials that was very unlike Angela. Had she called him B. M. to his face? He read on. "B. M. came unexpectedly after dinner. Luckily, I was alone." That was only a year ago. "Luckily"—why luckily?—"I was alone." Where had he been that night? He checked the date in his engagement book. It had been the night of the Mansion House dinner. And B. M. and Angela had spent the evening alone! He tried to recall that evening. Was she waiting up for him when he came back? Had the room looked just as usual? Were there glasses on the table? Were the chairs drawn close together? He could remember nothing—nothing whatever, nothing except his own speech at the Mansion House dinner. It became more and more inexplicable to him—the whole situation; his wife receiving an unknown man alone. Perhaps the next volume would explain. Hastily he reached for the last of the diaries—the one she had left unfinished when she died. There, on the very first page, was that cursed fellow again. “Dined alone with B. M. . . . He became very agitated. He said it was time we understood each other. . . . I tried to make him listen. But he would not. He threatened that if I did not . . .” the rest of the page was scored over. She had written “Egypt. Egypt. Egypt,” over the whole page. He could not make out a single word; but there could be only one interpretation: the scoundrel had asked her to become his mistress. Alone in his room! The blood rushed to Gilbert Clandon’s face. He turned the pages rapidly. What had been her answer? Initials had ceased. It was simply “he” now. “He came again. I told him I could not come to any decision. . . . I implored him to leave me.” He had forced himself upon her in this very house. But why hadn’t she told him? How could she have hesitated for an instant? Then: “I wrote him a letter.” Then pages were left blank. Then there was this: “No answer to my letter.” Then more blank pages; and then this: “He has done what he threatened.” After that—what came after that? He turned page after page. All were blank. But there, on the very day before her death, was this entry: “Have I the courage to do it too?” That was the end.

Gilbert Clandon let the book slide to the floor. He could see her in front of him. She was standing on the kerb in Piccadilly. Her eyes stared; her fists were clenched. Here came the car. . . .

He could not bear it. He must know the truth. He strode to the telephone.

“Miss Miller!” There was silence. Then he heard someone moving in the room.

“Sissy Miller speaking”—her voice at last answered him.

“Who,” he thundered, “is B. M.?”

He could hear the cheap clock ticking on her mantelpiece; then a long drawn sigh. Then at last she said:

“He was my brother.”

He was her brother; her brother who had killed himself. “Is there,” he heard Sissy Miller asking, ‘anything that I can explain?’

“Nothing!” he cried. “Nothing!”

He had received his legacy. She had told him the truth. She had stepped off the kerb to rejoin her lover. She had stepped off the kerb to escape from him.

16.2.2 Glossary

legacy:	something left to someone in a will.

'The Legacy' by Virginia Woolf

'The Coming Revolution': The Coming Revolution in England (1884) is a 32-page document by Henry Mayers Hyndman (1842-1921), a famous Socialist of his day.

Mansion House: the Mansion House is the official residence of the Lord Mayor of London.

inexplicable: which cannot be explained.

scored over: deleted words by drawing a line through it; cut out.

'Egypt. Egypt. Egypt,': possibly an allusion to the bondage of the Israelites in Egypt, as described in "Exodus" 1-14 of the old Testament of the Bible. Angela feels trapped between her fidelity to her husband and her love for Sissy Miller's brother. "Egypt" could also be a reference to Anthony's dying words in Shakespeare's play Anthony and Cleopatra (Act 4), "I am dying, Egypt, dying". Cleopatra responds, "Hast thou no care of me? Shall I abide / In this dull world, which in thy absence is/ No better than a sty?" Cleopatra commits suicide, not wanting to live in a world bereft of Mark Anthony; Angela too commits suicide following the death of "B.M." implored: requested earnestly.

The story begins with Gilbert Clandon taking up the pearl brooch left behind by his recently dead wife, Angela Clandon, for her secretary with the inscription: "For Sissy Miller, with my love." Angela had left for every one of her friends a little token of her affection. For her husband, Gilbert, Angela had "left nothing in particular, unless it were her diary." He could see fifteen little volumes, neatly bound in green leather, lying in wait on her writing table as her legacy to him. He had often seen her busy with the diary but whenever he came into the room she would shut it or put her hand over it. Gilbert reflects that "it was the only thing they had not shared when she was alive." Gilbert Clandon initially misreads his wife's death as an accident for, his wife left the house in perfect health six weeks ago and was killed by a car off the kerb in Piccadilly.

When Sissy Miller arrives at Gilbert's behest, he finds her terribly distressed. For Sissy Miller, Angela had been much more to her than an employer. She was in a kind of double mourning for she had also lost a brother who had died only a week or two before Angela. After giving Sissy Miller the pearl brooch, Gilbert tells her: "Remember, Miss Miller, if there's any way in which I can help you, it will be a pleasure....” Before leaving, Sissy Miller also assures him: “Mr. Clandon,” “If at any time there’s anything I can do to help you, remember, I shall feel it, for your wife’s sake, a pleasure . . .”

After Sissy Miller departs, Gilbert wonders whether Sissy may have had some feelings for him. He looks at himself in the mirror and pauses to admire, seeing himself as “a very distinguished-looking man.” He decides to read the diary, wishing he could tell his wife that he thought that Sissy Miller had a “passion” for him. In the first few entries, she describes how handsome Gilbert is, and how proud she is to be his wife. He thinks of how proud he was to be her husband, but only because he thought he was with the prettiest woman there. Perhaps he just wanted to show her off. Initially Gilbert leafs through the pages of Angela’s diary looking almost entirely for reflections of himself. But gradually he is intrigued to find frequent references to someone called “B.M.” As he learns from fragments in the diary of an apparent affair between her and this mysterious “B.M.,” he begins to discover that he actually did not know his wife not at all.

In the story, Gilbert comes to find out more about his wife within the pages of her diary than he ever did during the years he was married to her. Blinded by his own self-interests he is never able to find out how Angela’s desire to work outside of the home turns into a forbidden relationship with a man who is not her husband. Since Gilbert is all too absorbed in his own affairs, Angela begins to feel ignored by him and speaks less of him in her diary. Instead, the initials “B.M.” continually show-up. At first he thinks B.M. is a woman, and then realizes he is a man. Later he learns that she is having serious conversations with this person B.M., and a little further down on the page is a name that’s scratched out, B.M. said some very disagreeable things about xxxx and then the name is scratched out, and she says “I would not listen to any more abuse about XXXX.” And the name is scratched out. Gilbert thinks, “Hmmm, maybe they’re talking about me.” So whatever it was, she scratched it out, so he can’t know for sure. Later it says “B.M. came unexpectedly to dinner, luckily I was alone,” so now jealousy starts to occur as Gilbert is wondering why she was with this man.

Gilbert is trying to remember what things were like, if he had seen anything that was inappropriate. Later B.M. tells her “it was time we understood each other.” Angela writes, “I tried to make him listen but he would not. He threatened that if I did not...” and the rest of the page is scored over. She writes “he came again. I told him not to come. I implored him to leave me, I wrote him a letter, no answer and then he has done as he threatened, have I the courage to do it too?” And so what we understand is that whoever this B.M. was – he had killed himself. Gilbert telephones Sissy Miller, and he finds out B.M. was her brother who had killed himself. And at last he understands that his wife didn’t die in an accident, that the person that she loved or obviously wanted to be with had killed himself and she said, “Have I the courage to do it too.”

The realization finally dawns on him that Angela’s death is not an accident but that she had committed suicide in response to the death of her lover, B.M., leaving her husband to discover the truth from her diary: “He had received his legacy. She had told him the truth. She had stepped off the kerb to rejoin her lover. She had stepped off the kerb to escape from him.”

The story demonstrates how Gilbert and Angela Clandon represent the epitome of disguise by existing within a relationship under the illusion of love and also that love is often not enough to sustain a relationship between two people. You may have seen from your reading of the story and the brief biographical sketch how the story reflects Virginia Woolf's own concerns regarding the institution of marriage and her own sense of a hidden life, of important moments just beneath the surface of what can be seen and heard. The diaries of Angela Clandon provide a glimpse into her inner life and reveal the complexities of her own concerns as a woman trapped in a marriage wherein she is expected to simply enact the role her rather indifferent husband expects her to perform. Angela's predicament is indicative of Woolf's own sense of entrapment in a rigid social structure that made it difficult for women to break free of their ties.

Successful character portrayal, like effective plot organization, is an important element in a short story. It is partly the result of creative instinct and partly the result of a skilful application of principles derived from the works of many authors. The writer must begin with a clear idea of the character and the role of that character in the intended effect of narration. Characters in a story are individualized by their motives as well as their external or internal characteristics.

In terms of character delineation, Woolf succeeds in combining the descriptions of external physical appearance of major characters in the story with their inner traits like moods, feelings or ideas so that the reader can identify the characters as individuals. As you may have noticed, each one of the characters who appears in 'The Legacy' is unique in some way. In the following subsection we shall discuss the character of Gilbert Clandon. Based on our discussion, you should write character sketches of Sissy Miller and B.M.

16.4.1 Gilbert Clandon

Gilbert Clandon's journey from illusion to reality is one of the interesting features of the story. His posthumous enlightenment from the reading of his wife's diaries brings him face to face with the realities of a relationship that he had taken for granted. Angela had died six weeks before when the story starts, and he notices that she had left a little gift of some sort for everyone of her friends. It appears to him "as if she had foreseen her death" in an accident. He is surprised that "To him, of course, she had left nothing in particular unless it were her diaries, fifteen little volumes." He remembers that she never let him read them while she was alive, and she would tell him that perhaps after she died he would perhaps be able to read them. Sissy Miller comes by, and he wants to give her the present that Angela had left her, and he wants to find out if she needs any help. Presuming that she may need financial help because she's now unemployed, he asks her, "Is there anything I can do for you?" He is surprised when she offers him help instead by stating: "If there is anything I can do for YOU, remember I shall feel it for your wife's sake a pleasure."

He interprets her offer of help as an expression of her passion for him. And so we start getting the idea of Gilbert's character that he thinks only of himself, assumes that she would say these things because she loved him. Sissy Miller, to him is "scarcely distinguishable from any other woman of her kind. There were thousands of Sissy Millers—drab little women in black carrying attache cases." And he wonders at his wife's genius for sympathy, that made her see all sorts of qualities in Sissy Miller. Gilbert is all admiration for his own self: "He was over fifty; but he could not help admitting that he was still, as the looking-glass showed him, a very distinguished-looking man."

We get a better insight into Gilbert's character when he begins revealing his impressions of Angela as he leafs through the pages of the diaries. He just feels that she was very beautiful and that she was just fine the way she was and he never realizes how she wanted to do more with her life. Reflecting on the years of their married life, he remembers how, as the years went by, he was more absorbed with his work, and she was left more alone. He realizes while reading these diaries that she had wanted children, and he really didn't regret not having children, but it's almost as if he never really knew her. When she asked him if she can have some work of her own where she could help others, his response was: "Hadn't she enough to do looking after him, after her home? Still, if it amused her, of course he had no objection. What was it? Some district? Some committee? Only she must promise not to make herself ill." He doesn't seem to have much respect for her mind or for her as a person. He just wants her to take care of him and the house and be his wife, and he doesn't have any other hopes, dreams or ambitions for her. She has many hopes, dreams and ambitions for him, but he does not reciprocate. Engrossed in his own career and eventful life, he fails to see how lonely her life has been without a child. All he could visualize were the "little trifles, the insignificant, happy, daily trifles that had made up her life."

He considered his wife to be a simple woman with out much intelligence. He obviously thought his wife too unintelligent for conversation; he read in her diary about her discussions with "B.M." and thought to himself, "If only she had discussed the matter with him, instead of puzzling her poor little head about questions that were much too difficult for her to understand!" Initially, he is intrigued by the appearance of B.M. in the diary entries: "Who was B. M.? He could not fill in the initials; some woman, he supposed, that she had met on one of her committees." He was a self-centred man, unable to focus his attention on anyone but himself. As his name appeared less and less in the diary, he became less interested. Thus, he immediately thinks of how something affects him when something bad happens. Gilbert becomes upset when he realizes that Angela has committed suicide. He is upset not because he realizes that he should have spent more time with his wife, but because his wife had an affair with her lover B.M. His illusions are finally shattered as reality dawns upon him: "She had told him the truth. She had stepped off the kerb to rejoin her lover. She had stepped off the kerb to escape from him."

1. Discuss what Angela's legacy reveals about her character and her emotional needs. What motivated her to do as she did?

2. In one of the entries in the last of her diaries Angela had written 'Egypt. Egypt. Egypt,' over the whole page. Explain the possible allusion to 'Egypt'.
3. Discuss how Gilbert Clandon's reflections foreshadow the real circumstances surrounding Angela's death. Does he fully understand the implications of her diary?

16.5 STYLE AND TECHNIQUE

"Examine for a moment," wrote Virginia Woolf in The Common Reader, "an ordinary mind on an ordinary day. The mind receives myriad impressions – trivial, fantastic, evanescent, or engraved with the sharpness of steel... Life is not a series of gig lamps symmetrically arranged; life is a luminous halo, a semi-transparent envelope surrounding us from the beginning of consciousness to the end." Woolf's method, as observed by Eudora Welty, "was to take moments and split them into a myriad of sensations, finding, or searching for all their several and separate components just as a scientist might split and examine an atom." Woolf does not believe in chronological narrative — beginning at the beginning and proceeding on the basis of historical time. She presents all events, from different times, which enter the character's consciousness.

'The Legacy' is a story about a widower who discovers from reading his wife's diaries that she had fallen in love with a radical working man and committed suicide. But you may have noticed that it is also a story that illustrates one of Woolf's underlying beliefs about fiction--that it should not present reality as absolute and neatly packageable, but rather as it is subjectively experienced by individuals.

The strength of the story lies in Woolf's narrative ability to create interest from the very beginning and sustain it till the last line. There is the element of foreshadowing resulting out of Gilbert's imagination which evokes in the reader the curiosity to know what happens next. Look at the two passages given below:

Yet how strange it was, Gilbert Clandon thought once more, that she had left everything in such order—a little gift of some sort for every one of her friends. It was as if she had foreseen her death. Yet she had been in perfect health when she left the house that morning, six weeks ago; when she stepped off the kerb in Piccadilly and the car had killed her.

But he had always taken it for granted that she would outlive him. If only she had stopped one moment, and had thought what she was doing, she would be alive now. But she had stepped straight off the kerb, the driver of the car had said at the inquest. She had given him no chance to pull up...

Gilbert wonders how his wife Angela had the premonition of her approaching death for he believes that her death was a result of an accident. Not until he reads the entries in the last diary does he realize how she had meticulously planned her end. When he meets Sissy Miller he wonders: "Could it be, that during all those years when he had scarcely noticed her, she, as the novelists say, had entertained a passion for him?" Again, when the name of B.M.

appears in the diary, he finds it convenient to presume what is suitable for him: "Had a heated argument about socialism with B. M. Who was B. M.? He could not fill in the initials; some woman, he supposed, that she had met on one of her committees." Mixing light and shade like a skilful painter, Woolf makes Gilbert alternate between imagination and reality to comprehend the truth.

After Gilbert's brief meeting with Sissy Miller the action revolves around the diary entries and we get to see a probing revelation of the life of Angela, both through the perception of Gilbert and through her own sensitive observations about her own inner life, and her relationships with her husband and her lover B.M. The triangular relationship is fully examined, directly and indirectly, and the story ends ironically with Gilbert's awareness of a reality that he had hitherto missed. You will find it interesting to note how, at the end of the story, Woolf captures Gilbert's final moment of agony as the truth dawns on him: "He could hear the cheap clock ticking on her mantelpiece; then a long drawn sigh...He had received his legacy. She had told him the truth. She had stepped off the kerb to rejoin her lover. She had stepped off the kerb to escape from him."

Woolf was a proponent of the "stream of consciousness technique." She succeeds in revealing the inner lives of her characters through Gilbert Clandon's state of mind when he reads the diary.

16.6 LET US SUM UP

This short story deals with the life and aspiration of Angela Clandon who yearns for a life of happy togetherness with her beloved B.M.. Trapped within the fetters of a conventional marriage, Angela realizes how societal norms of propriety forbid her from deserting her husband Gilbert for her lover. Virginia Woolf wrote this story in 1940 but it significantly anticipates the primary concerns of the real women's movement by presenting women as intelligent, rational creatures who had the ability and desire to make their own way in the world.

2. The allusion may be to the great star-crossed lovers from Egypt, Anthony and Cleopatra. Anthony dies and Cleopatra can't live without him and so also ends up dying. She kills herself to be with him otherwise she would have been dragged back to Rome, and subjected to insult. Angela here would be left with a life with Gilbert, with a man who didn't understand her and didn't even know who she was. B.M. really gave her an entirely different outlook, treated her as if she were a thinking, strong individual who could make her own decisions. So she decides to join him after death. 17.0 OBJECTIVES

The aim of this unit is to introduce you to the genre of the novel and trace its aspects. We also aim to familiarize you with the rise of the Indian novel in English. After studying this unit carefully and completing the exercises, you will be able to :

- outline the development of the novel and its types
- recognize its different aspects
- know the history of the Indian novel in English, and
- trace its development.

17.1 INTRODUCTION

In this Block, we intend to introduce you to the genre of the novel, with special reference to Shashi Deshpande's The Binding Vine, prescribed in your course.

This is an introductory Unit of the Block and we must lead you step by step. We shall tell you briefly about the novel, its forms and aspects and provide you the background of the Indian novel in English. The next four units of this Block will prepare you to analyse Shashi Deshpande's The Binding Vine after a thorough discussion of the topics related to it.

Studying a novel is different from reading a novel. When we read we are interested in the story; we are curious to know "what happens next" and some times we even jump to the end. Once we finish, our interest in the work ends and we pick up another book. So we can say that the novel has entertainment value. Not so when we "study" the novel. Of course, we still like to know "what happens next", but we also think about what the author is saying and why; how are the men and women in the novel behaving; are they life-like; what does the author want to convey; and how is he/she doing that? These questions lead us to read carefully and think deeply. Very soon we are able to combine entertainment with literary analysis and the joy of reading a good work becomes a source of knowledge also.

As we proceed with this unit, we give you suggestions, ask questions to check your progress and provide answers wherever required. In this way, the block opens up before you a new vista of a literary text. We suggest that as you read you make notes, mark important paragraphs and select important stages in the story. These will come handy at the time of revision.

So, here we go! Let us start with the first thing first and ask, "What is a novel"?

17.2 WHAT IS A NOVEL?

The novel is a "story", a long, long story but, then it is not a sequence of stories; it dramatizes life but it is not drama; it is written in prose form but it is not prose. So how do we define a novel?

A novel can be defined in broad terms as a piece of prose fiction, which dramatizes life with the help of characters and situations. It presents some aspect of human experiences and creates real-life atmosphere that is often gripping. The test of a great novel lies in its universal appeal.

Let us now examine this definition:

1. A novel is written in prose form, but novelists often handle the prose so delicately that the language acquires lyrical beauty. That is the reason why many novels are called "poetic".

Though the bulk of this literature is written traditionally in prose, this is not binding and there can be exceptions. Let us remember, Vikram Seth's The Golden Gate is written in verse.

2. A novel is prose "fiction", that means it is an imaginary story. Even though it is imaginary or fictitious, it is life-like.

3. A novel "dramatizes" life. This means the details, the situations and the characters are like real-life people. They act, react, struggle, suffer and triumph as we do in life. A novel is great or successful when it engrosses the reader and inspires him to identify with it. The author achieves this by giving a coherent and sincere picture of life, human relationships and human strengths and weaknesses.
4. We may say that a novel is a "long" story but it is difficult to determine its length. The accepted length is usually more than 50,000 words. Anything shorter than that is called a "novella". Again, a novel may run into a thousand or so pages and some may be in several volumes. But, these are exceptions.

Before we proceed further, we must also know that the novel is an extended narrative and distinct from the short story. The short story is more concentrated and does not have much scope to develop characters and situations, but a novel has this scope because of its length. A "novelle" or a "novella" is a narrative between the short story and the novel in length.

In most European literature the word "roman" is used for the novel. "Roman" means "romance." The earlier narratives were associated with the romantic adventures of the heroes and the heroines. The novel now has achieved a wider scope and is no longer a "romance", though the term "roman" stays on. The English name "novel" is derived from the Italian "novella" meaning "a little new thing".

Let us now ask ourselves two questions: Why do we read novels? Does the novel have any relevance to our lived reality? Does it perform any function in our life?

Primarily we read novels for entertainment and also to learn about life. Novels provide us insight into the different aspects of human existence, human psyche, social and familial relationships and the philosophy of life. We share the author's experiences and learn from them.

To answer the second question, we turn to the fact that a novel is an artistic creation of life. Art cannot be didactic, that is, it does not purport to teach directly. It is for us to learn from it, to derive our lesson. The novel will lose its charm if it becomes a sermon. It helps us indirectly by extending our consciousness and making us aware of the immense possibilities of life.

So, let us conclude this part with a few quotations:

The novel at its most interesting is a process of inhale-exhale, a life-giving inspiration, a prose poem which releases the body and soul, even a new visionary glimpse of the miracle of life itself.

— Mulk Raj Anand

The novel is a perfect medium for revealing to us the changing rainbow of our living relationship

— D.H. Lawrence

A novel in an impression, not an argument.

— Thomas Hardy

What is a novel but a peculiar and as yet unheard of event?

— Goethe

Fiction—if it at all aspires to be art—appeals to temperament. And, it must be, like paintings, like music, like all art, the appeal of one temperament to all the other innumerable temperaments.

— Joseph Conrad

17.3 ASPECTS OF THE NOVEL

Now that we have defined the novel, let us consider its aspects. We know that the novel is a story about some event or person set in a particular place and time, advanced by the narrative mode. That means the novel must be having some important elements to keep the interest of the readers alive and, to make the story appealing and real. What are they? How can we find them? What is their significance?

Let us, first of all make it clear that an author writes his novel/story intuitively. For him or her, aspects as such are not important. As readers and scholars, we find the aspects important to analyse a work. Secondly, aspects are ingrained in a work and we can discuss them but we cannot divide a novel according to them; that will be like cutting it into pieces. We must look at a work as a whole to enjoy it.

If we have to enjoy a work as a whole, then why should we separate its various components? This we do for the purpose of analysis. If we like a novel, we appreciate it either for its theme or characters or maybe its' narrative technique. That's why, it is necessary for us to familiarize ourselves with: theme, plot, characterization, point of view, place and time, narrative technique, style and structure.

17.3.1 Theme

The theme is the central idea of a novel. Every novel is based on a theme or themes. The theme is an argument or an issue on which the story revolves. It is not plot, nor is it the story. A novelist does not, however, say, "this is my theme and I am going to write a story." Instead, an idea comes to the mind, it germinates like a seed, and a story with plot and characters is woven around it.

17.3.2 Plot

Plot is the framework of the story. It has a beginning, a middle and an end. It advances with the help of characters, events and actions. A novel may have a plot and sub-plot. But these two do not run separately. At some point, they are inter-linked with the main theme. Let us take an example from drama. In Shakespeare's King Lear the main plot is about King Lear and his three daughters' behaviour and the sub-plot is about the Earl of Gloucester and his two sons' attitude towards their father. At the thematic level, they are joined because in both, the theme of filial love and filial ingratitude is at work. Now, let us take an example from the novel The Binding Vine. The main plot is about Urmi's grief at the death of her little daughter but the sub-plots are about Mira and Kalpana and these are linked by the themes of human relationships and death.

Thus, we see that the plot in a narrative work is the structure of its actions, as these are ordered towards achieving an artistic effect. Since actions are performed by a character or characters, plot and character are interdependent. Let us remember, plot is not the summary of a work. When we summarize a work, we give the story in a sequence but in a plot, the story is arranged and re-arranged according to the mode of the narrative.

17.3.3 Characterization

Let us first understand that characters are the persons in a novel or a story who are given some moral or dispositional qualities by the writer, which they reveal through their actions. How these persons act, react, learn from their life-situations and how they change, constitutes the art of characterization. If a character moves us and remains in our memory, we say that the characterization is powerful. Oliver Twist in Charles Dicken's novel Oliver Twist, or Hardy's Tess in Tess of the D'urbervilles are memorable characters. A character grows slowly with the story and as we read on we start understanding him or her. We even become one with them and participate at an emotional level with the ups and downs of their fortunes. Herein lies the success of the art of characterization.

In Aspects of the Novel E.M. Forster gives us the new terms flat and round characters. A flat character is built round a "single idea or quality" and is not much individualized, whereas a round character is complex in temperament and grows like a real-life person. In characterization, a novelist may use the method of "telling", or "showing". In "telling" the author describes the character and evaluates his/her action. This is called authorial intrusion. In "showing", the author only presents the character and lets him/her reveal his/her motives by actions, reactions, and dialogue.

17.3.4 Point Of View

This means the way a story is told. It is the perspective through which the author presents his/her characters, controls their action and the events. There are many different ways of narrating the story. A character may tell his tale in the first person. This is called first person narration. We must keep in mind here that he/she is the fictional persona through whom the story is told. It is not the author who is speaking; he/she is believed to be speaking. The first person narrator recounts his experiences placing himself as "I". He is the main witness to the events of his life. On the other hand, the third person narrator provides an omniscient point of view. He knows everything that is to take place in the story and he is the agent who describes and controls actions, motives and thoughts.

The third person point of view can be omniscient or limited. In omniscient point of view, the narrator knows everything; in limited point of view, the author tells the story in the third person but limits himself to what is experienced or felt by a single character.

17.3.5 Place And Time

A story cannot be written in a vacuum. It originates and moves within a cultural context. The characters, events, motivations, in fact, the entire action of the plot are controlled by the socio-cultural matrix of the place and time. The author cannot go out of the environment he/she has created. Let us take, for example, Anita Desai's Bye-Bye, Blackbird. The characters are Indian but the place they live in is England. The atmosphere is of the English society, but the reactions of the Indian characters are typically Indian. The author here cannot detach herself from place and time, otherwise the story will lack soul. Use of place determines the setting and use of time determines the way the events are structured.

Let us first think of the place. A novelist need not specifically mention the name of the place but the setting, the background and such other details provide ample clues to a generalized idea of place. In Shashi Deshpande's novel The Binding Vine, the city or town is not described but it is mentioned twice. R.K. Narayan's Malgudi has likeness to Mysore, in many ways. In some novels, the author uses place to give cultural base to the story; in some novels it acquires far-reaching significance; in some others it creates atmosphere, and in still others place has its own character. In Khushwant Singh's Delhi, the city is the protagonist, in R.K. Narayan's Malgudi novels, the tradition and culture is influenced through place. In the Gothic novels, place is used to create the atmosphere of horror.

Time means two things: clock-time and psychological time. Clock-time is a measure to determine time in terms of duration—hours, days, weeks and years. Psychological time has no relation to clock-time; it is experienced by the individual and is subjective. In the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, the novelists preferred to set the story within a chronologically determined time. For example, the novel started with the childhood or the girlhood/boyhood of a character and ended at some particular stage in her/his life. The time-sense was simple. But, with the emergence of the stream-of-consciousness novel, the novelists started using psychological time. Psychological time shifts constantly from the past to the present and to the future. In Arundhati Roy's The God of Small Things, time shifts so rapidly that it is difficult to determine the sequence of events. In The Binding Vine also the time cannot be fixed. Novelists who make use of the psychological time to narrate their story take the help of techniques such as flashback, dreams and fantasies.

17.3.6 Narration or Dramatization

To narrate the story means to tell the story in the traditional manner of story telling. To dramatize means to let the story unfold with actions, and dialogues, as in a drama. In simple words, it means, “telling” and “showing”. The “telling” mode usually has long narrative passages and a moralizing or didactic tone. Readers do not appreciate this much because their interest lies in knowing “what is happening next”. “Showing”, thus, is more popular than telling. As such, most novelists are now adopting a blend of both—showing and telling.

17.3.7 Style

A popular saying is “style is the man”. It means, each writer has his/her own style. What do we mean by style and how do we analyse the style of a particular author? Style means the manner in which the author tells his/her story in terms of language and expression. Thus, style is determined by diction, or choice of words, sentence structure, syntax and the use of figurative language. The characters, situations and events are revealed through the use of language. An author has to be careful in his/her choice of language because it must suit the character. For example, in Nectar in a Sieve, Kamala Markandaya sometimes gives high sounding philosophical language to Rukmani, the simple, semi-literate farmer woman, which critics find unrealistic. The problem of style is more acute for the Indian writer in English. While depicting the rural people, the workers and the farmers, they have to use Indian expressions to give the characters a realistic touch. This sometimes changes the English expression to particularly “native” expression. Mulk Raj Anand used it freely and he called it “pigeon” English.

17.4 TYPES OF NOVELS

We now know what is a novel and also its various aspects. Let us understand that the novel has many forms or types. The novel in England from which we trace the beginning of the Indian novel has many types. We shall get to these in brief because we might require this knowledge at some stage in our discussion

17.4.1 Picaresque Novel

The word “Picaresque” is derived from the Spanish word picaro, which means “a rogue”. The Picaresque novel presents the story of the adventures of some man or woman who keeps on moving from place to place. Since the novel records the different episodes in his or her journey, the plot remains loose and episodic. Some good examples of the early Picaresque novel are: Don Quixote by a Spanish writer Cervantes, Robinson Crusoe and Moll Flanders by Daniel Defoe, and Tom Jones by Henry Fielding.

17.4.2 Gothic Novel

The term Gothic came from the word Goths used for a Germanic tribe. The Gothic novel is a type of fiction, which has supernatural elements like ghosts, haunted houses etc. It evokes fear, suspense and uncertainty. The setting is medieval. This novel became popular with Horace Walpole’s The Castle of Otranto, a Gothic Story (1765), and Mrs. Ann Radcliff’s The Mysteries of Udolpho (1794). Elements of the Gothic novel can be found in modern fiction and horror films.

17.4.3 Epistolary Novel

“Epistle” means a letter. In the Epistolary novel the story advances through the exchange of letters between the main character and other people. This type became particularly popular in the 18th century with Samuel Richardson's Pamela (1740) and Clarissa (1747), and Fanny Burney's Evelina (1778).

17.4.4 Psychological Novel

The Psychological novel, as the name suggests, has an interest in the innermost motives and desires of a character. In it, the individual is important and the events in his or her life are seen through his/her feelings, reactions and experiences. The stream-of-consciousness technique is best suited to this type. Virginia Woolf's Mrs. Dalloway (1925) and James Joyce's Ulysses (1922), and many of the twentieth century novels are psychological novels. In Indian writing in English, Anita Desai, Arun Joshi, and Shashi Deshpande probe into the psyche of the characters

17.4.5 Historical Novel

The Historical novel takes its setting and some of its characters and events from history. Sir Walter Scott brought this type into prominence with his Ivanhoe (1819). In Indian English fiction Manohar Malgonkar's The Devil's Wind (1972), and Bhagwan S. Gidwani's The Sword of Tipu Sultan (1976) are good examples of fiction based on Indian history. But, the historical novel need not be set wholly in a particular period. A historical event of great magnitude can be taken up to show its aftermath as in Midnight's Children by Salman Rushdie.

17.4.6 Regional Novel

The Regional novel is set in a particular geographical region and deals with the life and society of that particular area. A regional novelist usually sets his novel in a specific area like Thomas Hardy's 'Wessex' (a fictional name given by him to the south-west area of England) or R.K. Narayan's Malgudi (an imaginary town in South India).

17.4.7 Other Forms

We have discussed some of the common types of novels. There are many more types and subtypes that have emerged with time like the diasporic novel, feminist novel, existential or metaphysical novel. Besides, we have various literary movements and theories that have given rise to different forms like Post-modernism, Post-colonialism, naturalism, realism and so on. Let us be clear, however, that a work of fiction has many influences working within or without. A writer does not write keeping in mind any theory or "ism". We, the readers, critics and scholars, group the works according to some particular trend or setting, such as the literature written by the authors belonging to India but being written in English is Indian English Literature. Moreover, we cannot put a novel in any one frame and brand it as a psychological novel or Meta-fiction or a feminist novel. A work of art transcends all limits and can be interpreted from various angles. Shashi Deshpande's novel The Binding Vine has been studied by scholars as a feminist novel, as a sociological novel, as a psychological novel and so on. Such interpretations give us a broad base and show the strength of the writer's art.

17.5 THE RISE OF THE INDIAN NOVEL IN ENGLISH

By Indian English Writing, we mean that body of literature which is written by Indians in English. It could be in the form of poetry, prose, fiction or drama. English is not our mother tongue and we are not native speakers of English, yet when in the early decades of the nineteenth century, English was introduced as the medium of instruction in our educational system, Indians were able to read Western literature that was available in English. They found the language and the literature versatile and some intellectuals took to conveying their social and religious thoughts in this language. The writings of people like Raja Ram Mohun Roy, Swami Vivekananda, Mahatma Gandhi and others started pouring in and gave rise to a body of prose literature having great socio-cultural relevance. Soon poets like Romesh Chandra Dutt, Toru Dutt and many others took to writing poetry in English. But this literature was highly influenced by the style and content of English literature. When Sarojini Naidu wrote poetry while in England and showed it to Sir Edmund Gosse, he advised her to write about her own culture/country so that the outsiders would also come to know of India.

When Indians started using the English language creatively there were critics who felt that since English was not our native tongue, this writing did "not belong to the soil." But, scholars like K.R. Srinivasa Iyengar and C.D. Narasimhaiah spotted great potential in it. Iyengar's books Indo-Anglian Literature, (1943) and The Indian Contribution to English Literature, (1945) gave credibility to Indian writing in English. His Indian Writing in English (1962) was the first comprehensive history of this literature. C.D. Narasimhaiah categorically stated in his The Swan and the Eagle (1969), “Indian writing in English is to me primarily part of the literature of India.” According to him so long as the “operative sensibility” is Indian, the writing is Indian writing.

Another important question was to give some name to this writing. In the early decades it was called “Anglo-Indian” writing, to cover all writing in English about India, whether by Indians or Europeans. This umbrella term did not fit well to the Indian setting. K.R. Srinivasa Iyengar’s book Indo-Anglian Literature gave it a distinct name and the literature written in English by Indians came to be known as Indo-Anglian Literature. Later, it was called Indian Writing in English and now the popular term is Indian English Literature. The Sahitya Akademi, which has published histories of Hindi Literature, Malayalam Literature etc., has a History of Indian English Literature (1980) written by M.K. Naik.

17.5.1 The Beginning

India has a long tradition of story telling. The Panchatantra, Hitopadesha, Jatakas, Vetala Panchavinshati and Katha-Sarit-Sagara are perennial sources of stories. The style and technique of narration is also unique in that these stories are linked together by the frame-narrator, with one story leading on to the other and holding the interest of the reader/listener. But, though these stories in oral form reigned long and supreme, they cannot fall in the category of the ‘novel’.

Similarly, dramas, epics, lyrics and poetry have existed here since centuries. We know of Kalidasa and Bhavabhuti; we are aware of the Ramayana and the Mahabharata; and we have enjoyed the lilting Sanskrit lyrics, and the regional language poetry. All this forms the rich corpus of our literature. However, the novel in India came in at a much later stage. In fact, it emerged only after the introduction of English in the Indian educational pattern. Inspired by the English novel, Indians too, experimented with this genre in the regional languages. Some of these Indian novels were translated into English but later some authors took to writing originally in English.

The novel came into existence in India in the second half of the nineteenth century. Indians started writing fiction in the Indian regional languages as well as in English. Members of the Dutt family (who published their poetry in The Dutt Family Album, 1870) are credited with writing the earliest Indian English fiction: Kylas Chunder Dutt’s “A Journal of Forty-Eight Hours of the Year 1945” was published in the Calcutta Literary Gazette in 1835, while Shoshee Chunder Dutt’s “The Republic of Orissa: A Page from the Annals of the 20th Century” was published in 1845. Bankim Chandra Chatterjee’s first novel, Rajmohan’s Wife (1864), is the first full length Indian novel in English. He then took up writing in his mother tongue, and all his other novels are written in Bangla. Other early novels written in English include Lal Behari Day’s Govinda Samanta; or, The History of a Bengal Raiyat (1874) and Shoshee Chunder Dutt’s The Young Zemindar (1883). Toru Dutt, better known as a poet, can be considered the first woman novelist – her unfinished novel, Bianca, or the Young Spanish Maiden was published after her death as a serial in Bengal Magazine in 1879. Other early women novelists include Krupabai Satthianadhan (1862-94), who authored two novels, Kamala (1894) and Saguna (1895), and Shevantibai M. Nikambe (Ratanbai: A Sketch of a Bombay High Caste Hindu Young Wife, 1895). A. Madhaviah was a bilingual writer, credited with pioneering the novel in Tamil; Thillai Govindan (1903), the first of the four novels he wrote in English, has an autobiographical touch. Mirza Moorad Ali Beg's Lalun, the Beragan, or, The Battle of Panipat (1884), Joginder Singh's Nur Jehan (1909) and Madhaviah's Clarinda (1915) are historical novels, while S. M. Mitra's Hindupore: A Peep Behind the Indian Unrest (1909) and S.K. Ghosh's The Prince of Destiny (1909), focus on the theme of east-west encounter.

17.5.2 The Novel in the 20th Century

In the early decades of the twentieth century, the number of those writing in English increased rapidly. The children's writer Dhan Gopal Mukerji's only novel for adults, My Brother's Face (1924), is the first expression in fiction of the quest for identity, a theme that has concerned many later Indian novelists. K.S. Venkataramani's Murugan the Tiller and Kandan the Patriot were published in 1927 and 1932 respectively. Slowly, the Indian English novel started taking root. However, it was only after the emergence of the Big Three that the Indian novel drew the attention of critics and scholars. The big three were –Mulk Raj Anand, Raja Rao and R.K. Narayan.

Mulk Raj Anand's Untouchable published in 1935 and Coolie, published in 1936 were acclaimed for portraying the searing reality of the life of the downtrodden and the deprived sections of society. Anand came to be known as a committed writer. Raja Rao's inclination was towards Indian metaphysics and the philosophical strain became the hallmark of his novels. R.K. Narayan created the now famous Malgudi as a setting for his novels, which he gave us consistently from Swami and Friends (1935) to The World of Nagaraj (1990). He was loved for his ironic vision of life. It is, indeed, not possible to think of the Indian English novel without these three novelists who can be called the principal "trail blazing Indian novelists in English".

The development of the Indian novel in English was initially weak and hesitant. It was not technically strong, nor innovative. According to Meenakshi Mukherjee "Traces of both, the prescribed novels and the Victorian pulp can be found in a curious amalgam in the early novels in the Indian languages." H.M. Williams, another critic felt that the history of the Indian English novel was a "development from poetry to prose and from romantic idealization to various kinds of realism and symbolism." In the 1920's up till the 1940's India was witness to a turbulent period in her history. The novelists found different themes for their stories like the freedom struggle, Gandhian ideology and its impact on society, need for social reforms, eradication of social evils, India's modern destiny, the Partition, the emergence of the new urban India, the problems of rural India and so on. When we look at the novel from this angle, we find rich material having socio-cultural relevance.

By the late 1950's and early 1960's the second-generation writers came up. Writers like Nayantara Sahgal, Manohar Malgonkar, Khushwant Singh and Bhabani Bhattacharya gave new direction to fiction. They started dealing with new subjects. Nayantara Sahgal took up the political theme, while Malgonkar gave a historical perspective. Arun Joshi and Anita Desai ushered in the era of psychological fiction. By the 1980's the novel had matured sufficiently in themes, use of language, style and technique. Now we have writers like Salman Rushdie, Rohinton Mistry, Amitav Ghosh, Shashi Tharoor, Arundhati Roy, Vikram Seth, Shashi Deshpande and many others who have earned name and fame.

17.5.3 Women's Writing

Before we study Shashi Deshpande, let us give some thought to women's writing in English. We shall concentrate only on the novelists. Though, as we said earlier, many women wrote fiction in the late 19th century, it was with Kamala Markandaya that women's writing came into the limelight. Critics hailed her first novel Nectar in a Sieve published in 1954, as an "Epic of the Indian Village." Markandaya was a social-realist and she depicted the realities of life in south India. Nayantara Sahgal gave political themes and Ruth Jhabvala looked at India from the angle of a Westerner. Then came Anita Desai whose works probed the psychological problems of women characters. Rama Mehta, Shobha De, Gita Mehta, Bharati Mukherjee, Shashi Deshpande, Arundhati Roy, Jhumpa Lahiri and many others have written powerful fiction. Rama Mehta wrote only one book Inside the Haveli. Gita Mehta, Bharati Mukherjee and Jhumpa Lahiri live in the USA and are diasporic writers. Arundhati Roy is called a "One-book wonder" because she has not written any novel after The God of Small Things which won the Booker Prize in 1997. Shobha De's bestselling but superficial novels depict the richer section of the modern Indian metropolis. Shashi Deshpande writes about the educated urban middle-class woman in search of her identity.

Let us make it clear here that women writers usually object to being slotted under "women's writing". They feel that they should be considered mainstream writers. Another point that needs clarification, is that all women are not feminist writers. They write about women's issues because being women they understand the problems of women which they project in their works. Shashi Deshpande also says in her interviews that she does not see herself as a "feminist". Writing is spontaneous and should not be segregated on a male-female basis.

17.6 SHASHI DESHPANDE

Shashi Deshpande was born in 1938, and grew-up in Dharwar (Karnataka). For some years she was in Mumbai (Bombay) and now lives in Bangalore with her doctor husband and sons. Her father Adya Rangachar, better known as Sriranga was a famous Kannada writer and Sanskrit scholar. From him Shashi Deshpande acquired her love for reading and writing. She got her degrees in Economics, Law and English literature, and a diploma in Journalism. A Ph.D in English (from the University of Mysore) followed. Her writing career began quite late. According to her, she did not consider writing as a career since she was busy looking after her family. In her interview with Vanamala Vishwanath she recounts how her career as a full-fledged writer was launched. It started in England where her husband was a Commonwealth scholar for one year. "I thought it would be a pity if I forgot all our experiences there. So I started writing them down and gave them to my father. My father gave them to Deccan Herald, and they published it." Later when she was working for the Onlooker, she wrote a short story, which was published and was highly appreciated by the readers. Encouraged by this success, Shashi Deshpande took to writing stories. She says, "and then I wrote on and on as though I was crazed." She put together her stories and at the behest of her father got them published. Her first collection of stories entitled The Legacy came out in 1978. After this, many collections were published. Her first novel was actually Roots and Shadows, which she completed in 1978 but it was published in 1983. Prior to that The Dark Holds No Terrors was published in 1980 and so it is often called her first novel. In 1982 If I Die Today came out. It is a crime novella. It was followed by three collections of short stories, It was the Nightingale, It was Dark and The Miracle, all published in 1986. Shashi Deshpande shot to fame with That Long Silence (1988) for which she was awarded the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1993. Come up and Be Dead is a crime novel set in a girls' school and is like Agatha Christie's detective fiction. The Binding Vine appeared in 1993, A Matter of Time in 1996, Small Remedies in 2000 and her latest Moving On in 2003. Deshpande has frankly discussed her views on the art and craft of fiction in her essays, interviews and lectures. She is a prolific writer and highly respected by readers.

The Novel: The Binding Vine

Shashi Deshpande

17.6.1 Shashi Deshpande as a Novelist

Shashi Deshpande started writing when she was almost in her forties. Her short novels If I Die Today and Come up and Be Dead are crime novels and can be called fiction for teenagers. But, these two are not her representative works. She is a serious writer. She selects her themes carefully, weaves her plot around them and creates convincing characters. All her novels have women protagonists. The male characters stand on the periphery though they are significant for the story. Generally, she creates a family atmosphere to show her characters' conflicts, anger and frustrations. A time comes when they seem to be too unhappy to cope with life. And then somehow, they understand the deeper meaning of existence, they learn from life's experiences, and finally they reconcile. This reconciliation gives optimism to her novels. Her characters do not break away from the family, they maintain family ties and feel secure. As readers we also realize how important it is to live in a relationship. One cannot just break these ties that bind us to life. Shashi Deshpande portrays people from the educated, middle class of modern urban areas. The novels are set in big towns. Sometimes the town is mentioned; sometimes it is left to our imagination. Her works probe the innermost workings of the human psyche; they also provide commentary on the changing social norms and show the meaning of life.

Deshpande writes about the region and the regional culture she knows the best. Her characters belong to Maharashtrian middle-class Brahmin culture and some belong to the Kannada culture as in A Matter of Time. Without commenting on the strength and weakness of any particular value-system, Deshpande lays it thread-bare before us. It is for us, as readers, to see how the individual man or woman suffers, falls and stands again, despite the problems.

17.7 GLOSSARY

- diasporic Novel: it gets its name from the Greek word “diaspora” meaning to scatter. Diasporic novel is the fiction written by Immigrant Indians i.e. those settled abroad. Salman Rushdie, Bharati Mukherjee, Gita Mehta are diasporic novelists.
- feminism: started as a socio-economic movement. It demanded legal and political rights for women. Later, many demands came to be attached to it and it became a general term to denote the movement for women’s equality, legal rights, right to body and such questions that were important for women.
- feminist Novel: a work of fiction, which concentrates on women’s issues and works within the theoretical framework of feminist literary theory. All novels written by women cannot be called feminist.
- Malgudi: an imaginary town, somewhere in South India. R.K. Narayan’s novels are set in Malgudi. Critics say, in many ways it resembles the city of Mysore.
- didactic: instructive, designed to impart information, advice, or some doctrine of morality. Most literary works of the Middle Ages have a strong didactic element, but in later writings this was discarded. Novelists in particular do not approve of didacticism in fictional works.
- third-person narrative: a mode of story-telling in which the narrator is not the “I” of the story, but a third person, standing ‘outside’ the events. Third-person narrators are often omniscient or all knowing about the events of the story. This is the most common form of story telling.
- first-person narrative: a mode of story telling in which the narrator appears as the “I” recollecting his or her own part in the events related, either as a witness or as an important participant in the events.

18.0 OBJECTIVES

In this unit we shall introduce you to Shashi Deshpande's novel The Binding Vine. After you have read the unit carefully you will be able to:

- understand the story and sequence of the novel and
- outline the plot of the novel.

18.1 INTRODUCTION

In the previous unit we discussed the genre of the novel, the rise of the novel in India and the various aspects of the novel. This was to acquaint you with the genre in its totality. We have seen that the novel has some important elements that we require to know if we wish to analyze it. One of these elements is plot. In this unit our aim is to concentrate on Shashi Deshpande's The Binding Vine and to get to know the novel in its minute details.

Let us remember that this novel is generally grouped under women's fiction. We shall see later how Deshpande reacts to being so slotted.

Let us now take up our discussion.

18.2 OBSERVATIONS ABOUT THE NOVEL

The Binding Vine was published in 1993. It is Shashi Deshpande's sixth novel if we take into consideration the two short novels—If I Die Today and Come up and Be Dead—that are generally categorized as crime/detective fiction. The Binding Vine has a broad base in that it merges three stories into one to achieve an integrated pattern; but the setting is restricted to the limited space of women's experience. The author seems to ask a significant question, “Should women break their silence?” If yes, then “how?” “Who will take the lead?” Some courageous person must come forward to articulate. This responsibility is given to the writer. The writer transcends the personal to achieve the general. In the process of writing, the individual brings forth a “new creation” separate from the creator. The creator and the created are two distinct entities. That is what the epigraph to the novel says, “What was the use of my creation, if I were entirely contained here?” This line from Emily Bronte’s Wuthering Heights signifies that creativity is beyond time and place. The writing process involves exclusion of certain experiences and elevation of others according to the author’s subjectivity. The writer’s word has the power to suppress some experiences, communicate others and reveal the hidden selves.

This novel is a multi-dimensional narrative about family bonds, human relationships, women’s right to their body and the need to speak out to set right the wrong. Despite its grim environ of pain and loss you will find in the story an undercurrent of love, understanding and hope.

Shall we now give some thought to the beginning and ending of the novel? The first sentence is, “We all of us grow up with an idea of ourselves, an image rather, and spend the rest of our lives trying to live up to it.” This sentence has psychological relevance. Psychologists say that when we try to live as our image, not as our real self, we face an identity crisis and alienation. Who, in this novel, is living as an image? The narrator, Urmi. In the next line she asserts that she is trying to get over that image and be herself. The middle shows how she passes through turbulence. By the end of the novel, she gets over her grief. “Is this it, ‘the spring of life’ Mira was looking for?” When we read the paragraph preceding this, we realize that Urmi is talking about the small acts of love, understanding and human relationships that make survival possible. We all look for some sustaining force to keep us going because life may have its futility and living may be absurd, yet we all want to cling to life.

This brings us to the title of the novel—The Binding Vine. The vine of love, affection and fellow feelings binds us all to each other. A vine is delicate but it has the tendency to spread its tendril and hold fast to its support. Likewise, the nameless delicate moments of intimacy and understanding bind us fast. Despite pain and anguish that make existence a struggle, there is the “spring of life” emerging at intervals to help us overcome our sense of loss. We can look on life anew, with hope.

The full impact of the title will be clear to you when we discuss the theme in our next unit. Before that, let us read the story.

18.3 THE STORY IN BRIEF

The Binding Vine, as we remarked in the previous unit, is a stream-of-consciousness novel with the action moving back and forth. It does not follow a sequence of events. The story takes shape slowly and sometimes the reader fails to link who's who. The novel is difficult to understand in one reading precisely because our mind takes time to assimilate the various facts, events and their relation to characters. This brief summary given below will help you to understand the story.

18.3.1 The Story

The protagonist of The Binding Vine is Urmila, called Urmī in the novel. She is grieving over the death of her one-year-old daughter Anu and it is from here that the story picks up momentum. Urmī's husband Kishore is in the Merchant Navy. He remains on the ship for many months and is, therefore, absent from the novel. Urmī is a lecturer and she lives with her little son Kartik and her mother, in Bombay. When the novel opens, Urmī is in conversation with Vanaa. Vanaa is her childhood friend and also her sister-in-law (Kishore's sister). Urmī is in a bad mood. She feels irritated when Vanaa talks of a small incident of their girlhood days when Urmī was learning cycling in Ranidurg. One day she had fallen off the bicycle and hurt her knees. At this Urmī asks her angrily, "what are you trying to say Vanaa? Why don't you say it straight off"? (p. 8). Actually, Vanaa is trying to shift her mind from her grief but Urmī is in no mood to be soothed by such remarks. Urmī refuses to let go of her pain. She tells Vanaa that when she fell off the cycle, it was a small hurt compared to the agony of losing her daughter. She has lost her child and she cannot forget it. "This pain is all that's left to me of Anu. Without it, there will be nothing left to me of her; I will lose her entirely" (p. 9).

At the mention of her girlhood days in Ranidurg, Urmī is reminded of her grandmother Baiajji. Urmī was fond of her grandmother. Her childhood with Baiajji and Aju (grandfather) was a happy one but she was always puzzled as to why her parents had sent her away while Amrut her brother stayed with them. She bore a kind of grudge against her mother, Inni. It is only towards the end of the novel that Inni recounts the incident. Long back, when Urmī was a child, Inni had gone out leaving her in the care of Divakar, a trusted servant. Urmī's father had come home early that day and seeing that the girl was left with a male servant, had got angry. After that he decided to send Urmī to his mother. He made his decision without even consulting his wife—Inni, Urmī's mother. At this point Urmī understands the sinister power of male dominance that rendered her mother a helpless victim. Urmī now realizes how her mother must have suffered the pain of separation and how bravely she bore it over the years without complaining. She feels sorry for her mother. But this realization comes only towards the end and before that we have to go through many more incidents and get to know many characters.

We are now introduced to Akka, Urmi's mother-in-law. One day Akka brings out an old trunk. It contains some yellowing papers, diaries and notes. Akka tells her that these papers belong to Mira and Urmi gets interested in reading them to see what they contain. Actually, Mira is Kishore's real mother, i.e., Urmi's mother-in-law. She had died when Kishore was just one day old and Kishore's father was married to Akka so that the infant Kishore could get a mother. Thus, Akka is Urmi's step-mother-in-law. Urmi realizes that Akka was brought as a bride only to be a mother to Kishore. Urmi can now re-cast Akka's loveless married life, and feels sorry for her.

From the letters and diaries, Urmi understands the pain of yet one more woman—Mira. Urmi reads the papers assiduously and re-creates Mira's life, her aspirations, failures, fears and desires. Mira's problem is the obsessive love of her husband. He loves her for himself, not for her sake. For him gratification of his desire is of prime significance. He never pauses to think of her wish or will. Mira frankly records her intimate feelings in her diaries. Her poems are also confessional. She wants love, not lust. Love means understanding the other and caring for his or her needs; lust is selfish and it looks for personal satisfaction. Mira is afraid of her husband's lustful love. Looking at the situation from a social angle, Mira's fear and anger has no relevance, as her husband's demand is perfectly legitimate within the canons of marriage. Despite her despair, Mira feels happy when she is with child. As an expectant mother, she starts loving life. Unfortunately, she dies in childbirth.

Urmi joins duty after her leave expires and gets busy in her daily routine. One day, she learns of a rape-case when she goes to the hospital to meet Vanaa who is a medical social worker. The rape victim is Kalpana. Here Deshpande gives us one more story. Kalpana is a young vivacious girl from a lower class background. She is Shakutai's daughter. Shakutai has one more daughter Sandhya and a son. Her husband does not stay with them so it is Shakutai who is the breadwinner. She has a sister, Sulochana (Sulu). Sulu is childless and is afraid that her husband, Prabhakar, may marry another woman and shunt her out of his house. Her husband is enamoured of Kalpana and is keen to marry her. Both Shakutai and Sulu approve of this proposal. Sulu likes it because if Kalpana comes as the co-wife, Sulu will not be driven out. After all, Sulu is Kalpana's aunt (Mavshi). Shakutai likes the idea because she thinks Prabhakar is a good man and since he loves Kalpana, he will keep her happy. Kalpana, however, has her own aspirations. She likes a young man whom she wants to marry, and rejects Prabhakar's offer.

While Kalpana lies in the hospital, the outside world moves around her. Shakutai does not want the case to be reported to the police. She is afraid that it will spoil their name and nobody would marry Sandhya her second daughter; the police officer wants to project it as an accident case because rape cases are complicated. From the various discussions it is clear that nobody wants to accept it as a rape case. Priti, Inni, Vanaa all offer only lip-sympathy. They tell Urmi to keep away from this mess. Shakutai blames her for crossing the limits of a woman's life and attracting attention by her modern ways of dressing up.

Despite all odds, Urmi gives out Kalpana's story to a journalist friend, and it is published. Shakutai gets social attention. Questions are raised in the Assembly and the hospital authorities are instructed to let Kalpana remain in the hospital. Thus, Urmi breaks the silence and manages to get justice for the suffering family. The police has to investigate the case, and when Sulu realizes that her husband Prabhakar is the culprit, she comments suicide. In the course of the events she understands how the tender vine of human understanding, empathy and sympathy binds us all. Life goes on despite its ups and downs. The novel ends on a note of optimism as Urmi broods over 'the spring of life' we all look for.

18.3.2 Let Us Revise

After reading the summary given above, we now know that:

- The Binding Vine* is the story of Urmi and her grief over the death of her infant daughter
- The story has two other linked stories: of Mira and her fears, and Kalpana and her rape.
- Within this canvas there are small inset stories of human pain, fears failures and agony. These are of Inni, Akka, Shakutai and Sulu.
- The ending shows Urmi's coming to terms with life, her vindication that the urge to survive is the basic urge in all beings and that life is to be lived as it comes.

18.4 DETAILED SUMMARY

Now that we know the brief outline of the story, let us understand the chapter-wise movement of the novel so that we are able to discuss the plot in our next section.

The Binding Vine is divided into four parts of almost equal length. The past and the present so overlap in each part that it is not possible to ascertain whose story is told in a particular section. Roughly, part one focuses on Urmi's grief, part two is partly about Kalpana and partly about Mira, part three reverts again to Urmi, and part four offers some sort of respite as slowly the knots are unraveled. In each part, paragraph spacing indicates the change of time and characters.

18.4.1 Part One

Part One of The Binding Vine starts with a four-line verse from Mira's poetry and focuses primarily on Urmi's grief and her discovery of Mira's writings. Urmi has lost her one-year-old daughter Anusha and is inconsolable. Nothing can cheer her or divert her attention from her daughter. She is flippant, angry, irritated and even hysterical. This state of mind is revealed not only through Urmi's assessment of her situation but also through her words, actions and reactions.

The novel opens with Vanaa trying to soothe Urmi's ruffled nerves. She reminds Urmi of the time when she (Urmi) was learning cycling in Ranidurg and fell off her bike and got hurt. To this Urmi's rejoinder is "Once? I must have fallen at least a dozen times." Vanaa feels hurt at Urmi's deliberate attempts to belittle her but she continues the conversation. Urmi is sharp enough to know that Vanaa is trying to evoke Urmi's childhood memory of her heroic attempts to get over pain and suffering and to tell her indirectly that after all, she has been a brave girl and now she should live up to that "image". As Urmi tells us in the first few lines, she wants to break this "image" of being a heroic woman, she would rather be an ordinary woman and be able to express her feelings, than a superhuman figure forced to repress her grief.

Vanaa's remarks not only irritate Urmi, they make her petulant. She digs up old things, blames Vanaa for what she must have said during their girlhood days and indulges in self-pity. This is, indeed, unlike Urmi who has always been self-willed, strong and different from other girls. At this point we learn that during her childhood Urmi had deliberately rejected the expensive and beautiful dresses her mother got for her and preferred to wear the ill-fitted ones stitched for her by her Baiajji. (We wonder at Urmi's obstinacy and wish to know why she was staying with her grandparents and why not with her parents).

Reference to Baiajji takes Urmi back in time. She remembers her days at Ranidurg in the palatial house of her grandparents; the happy days of girlhood abandon when life was smooth and Baiajji and Aju's love gave meaning to living. There were small pleasures like occasionally cleaning and airing the big house, sharing the joke about the "darbar hall", the everyday excitement when the train passed by, eating raw tamarind despite Baiajji's warning and rushing to Vanaa's house in the neighborhood to play. All these pleasures vanished slowly with time. Baiajji died and then Aju and Urmi's world changed.

But, the most painful is the change brought in by Anu's death. Death leaves emptiness and a silence that is impenetrable. Urmi is so much under nervous tension that she bangs her head against the wall and gets hurt. Amrut (her brother) and Inni (her mother) are worried over her state of mind but when they show concern, Urmi reacts sharply, making it clear that she does not like to be fussed over. Harish (Vanaa's husband) examines her and finds her asthmatic. He offers to intimate Kishore but Urmi stops him. She assures them that she would recover in a couple of days and when Amrut comes to ask her if he could now leave for Delhi, Urmi tells him categorically, "I'm trying to get back to normal... I know I have to go on living" (p. 22). With this resolution coming from Urmi, Amrut feels a little confident about his sister. The brother and the sister slide back in time and remember Baiajji, her decoctions as a "miracle" cure for all childhood ailments and the taste of those decoctions. Amrut asks her why she was arguing with Inni in the morning and from their exchanges it is clear, once again, that Urmi is often impatient with their mother. Their conversation veers back to Papa's death and how Inni was shattered. They tell each other that time is a great healer and Urmi will get over the pain.

The monsoons set in and Bombay has torrential rains. Vanaa, her two daughters (Mandira and Pallavi), Urmi and Kartik and Inni watch a movie when Priti, their relative and friend comes. They all discuss the movie, remember how Urmi's Papa was often impatient with the children when they watched the "rubbish", as he used to call films. Vanaa reveals how, as a child, she was fascinated by the Urmi-Amrut duo (sister and brother), and their sophisticated parents.

In a flashback, Urmi recollects how Akka had once brought Mira's trunk containing her diaries, poems, papers and old photographs. They all had got inquisitive about this far-off figure—Mira. Mira was Kishore's mother. As Akka sings one of Mira's poems, the atmosphere is charged with enthusiasm. That night after the children go to bed, Akka narrates Mira's story and in the course of her narration reveals her wounds as an unloved wife who was brought only to "give" a mother to infant Kishore. Urmi gets involved in reading Mira's verses and her diaries and she re-creates her long-dead mother-in-law as a plain looking girl with aspirations to do something in life. Mira had not been happy in her marriage because her husband's love was a "trap", it did not give her individual freedom but suffocated her by over-riding passion. Part One ends with Urmi reminiscing about an incident of their childhood and commenting on the nature of truth.

18.4.2 Part Two

This part takes up the story of Kalpana and opens with a hospital scene where the girl is lying in an unconscious state. The epigraph to this Part, from Mira's poem, focuses on women's innate fear of man—the male—and we surmise that despite all the talks of equality and emancipation, a woman is vulnerable. Kalpana's mother is hysterical as she pleads with the doctors not to report the matter as a rape-case. Urmi's heart goes out to the wailing mother and sensing that the woman is alone, she offers to escort her home in a taxi. This is how Urmi comes to know more about Shakutai, a peon in a girls' school. She lives in a chawl along with her children—Kalpana, Sandhya and Prakash (son); her husband has deserted her for another woman and Shakutai has no male support except Prabhakar, her younger sister's husband.

Despite her mother's displeasure and Vanaa's sane advice, Urmi gets involved in Kalpana's case. She often visits Shakutai, talks to Dr. Bhaskar Jain about Kalpana and elicits important facts from the police officer. She realizes how each one reacts to the question of rape—Shakutai is afraid of social stigma and wants to believe that it was not rape; the police officer is unwilling to register it as a rape case because such cases become complicated and harrowing for them; Dr. Bhaskar admits on the basis of medical examination that the girl was raped.

Urmi gets to know many things about Kalpana from Shakutai. Kalpana was a good-looking child, and Sulu her aunt (Shakutai's sister) was attached to her. When Kalpana was growing up, Sulu offered to take her to her house to look after her and educate her. The offer was good from Shakutai's angle also. She wanted her children to get an education and settle in life. But after a while, Kalpana had come back and had refused to go to Sulu Mavshi. Shakutai had cursed the obstinate girl, without even looking into the cause of her refusal. Here we get an idea that there could have been something wrong at Sulu's place.

Kalpana was smart and fond of dressing up well. She worked in a shop and often decked herself with nail polish and lipstick. Shakutai felt that she invited male glances and called for trouble. According to her, a girl must know fear, must stay within the social limits and must not aspire to fly high, and according to her Kalpana was punished because she broke all these rules. Urmi refuses to agree with these views.

18.4.3 Part Three

Part Three moves between Mira and Kalpana and has inset stories of Papa, Amrut, Shakutai and Dr. Bhaskar. The epigraph is about the perennial aspect of Nature. The weather changes but the pattern of rain and flowing waters and billowing clouds remains unchanged year after year. Mira had seen changes. She was now an expectant mother. We learn about Mira's relations with her mother, whose self-effacing character Mira does not like. She does not want to be like her, and does not approve of her mother's advice to her to "submit" and follow the rules. Instead Mira rebels in her own ways, within her own limits—she says 'no' to her husband, she rejects her new name Nirmala after marriage, and she often reveals her discontent. For women of her time, Mira's demands have no meaning. According to them, she is "mad". The only thing that gave her joy was her approaching motherhood. Unfortunately, Mira died in childbirth, leaving her son Kishore and her writings.

The writer shows us how women harbour dreams and how the realities of life make them wither away. One day Shakutai comes to Urmi's house and as Urmi gets busy in making tea, Shakutai tells her the story of her marriage, her journey from the village to Bombay and her life with her husband, who was a good-for-nothing fellow and never gave Shakutai a home. They shared a room with his cousin where she gave birth to her children, cooked, worked at a shop and in fact did everything to run the household. She was over-worked and it was only when Sulu came to stay that she got some help. As a young bride, Shakutai had two dreams—to have a gas connection for cooking and to get a mangalsutra in gold. The dreams were never realized—since her husband left her for another woman, she discarded the idea of having a gold mangalsutra, and she could never afford to get a cooking gas connection on her salary.

In this part, we are told more about Baiajji, Papa and Amrut. Amrut stays in Delhi and loves a Tamilian girl named Radha. We learn from their conversation that his mother (Inni) is likely to object to the marriage, as she wants a Maharashtrian daughter-in-law (pp130-131). Urmi remembers how she fell in love with Vanaa's brother Kishore when he quietly helped her at Aju's demise by suicide. Part Three ends with Urmi remembering Mira's verse about her approaching motherhood.

18.4.4 Part Four

Part Four has a verse with an optimistic tinge. Whatever the troubles of life and assaults of existence, we are all attached to life. Mira had reconciled with life but life was snatched away by death. Kalpana loved life, but she is struggling between life and death. Despite all this, life must go on. The novel ends with this optimistic view.

Urmi gives the facts about the rape case to Malcolm, a journalist and it is published. The publicity given to the case comes both as a curse and a blessing. Blessing, because it generates public opinion; and curse, because Sulu commits suicide when she realizes that her husband Prabhakar has committed the crime. Urmi feels deeply sorry for Shakutai; she can empathise with her but cannot do anything further.

While Urmi is passing through these problems, she talks freely to Dr. Bhaskar, seeking in him a good listener. Somehow, Dr. Bhaskar imagines that Urmi is unhappy in her marriage and he indirectly proposes to her. Urmi is shocked at his boldness. Kishore is remote and reticent by nature but he is a loving husband and a doting father. Urmi realizes that she loves Kishore, despite her disillusionment with him and his long absences.

Another burden is lifted off Urmi's heart when Inni tells her that it was not Inni but her father who sent Urmi to Ranidurg. Urmi understands the pain of her mother and empathizes with her. Urmi realizes the paradoxes of life—Baiajji was tender and loving but could wield power and be cruel; Inni was sophisticated but submissive; Papa loved Inni but was harsh in his decisions; Urmi liked Dr. Bhaskar's warm companionship, but she loved Kishore. Life with all its vagaries and troubles has its tender moments that make it worth living, worth clinging to. It is the "spring of life" we all search for, always.

The plot of The Binding Vine is intricate. It has three strands running parallel. These are the stories of three women, different in age and time: Kalpana, who is unconscious; Mira, who is dead and Urmi, who discovers life's meaning through the stories of Kalpana and Mira. Shashi Deshpande has herself observed that "the biggest problem was weaving them [the stories] together, bringing out what is common to all the three" (R.S Pathak, p. 250).

When an author plans a plot, he/she plans the characters' journey. In the present novel, the journey starts with Urmi and along her journey many people join her, the two most important of them being Mira and Kalpana.

The main plot revolves round Urmi and her grief at Anu's death. The stories of Mira and Kalpana are the two sub-plots that join the main plot. The total effect is of a unified story—the story of women's lives, their fears, problems and aspirations.

A reader asks several questions at different stages in the story. These are—should a woman have aspirations? What happens if she has? Should women remain silent or should they speak out? What happens if they speak out? Shashi Deshpande does not provide us ready-made answers to the questions. She wants us to discover these. Her work as an author is to lead us into the intricate, labyrinthine lives of the three main characters, and through their interaction with other characters, she helps us to seek answers.

Both Mira and Kalpana have demands, dreams and aspirations. Society, however, does not honour these. Mira has secret dreams to be a poet like Venu; she aspires to write and she does write, but she cannot make them public. The irony is that while Venu becomes a renowned poet, Mira's poems are hidden in a trunk. By implication we can say, that Mira's aspirations are not important and her protest is of no avail. Her voice is muted by the social norms. Her demand to assert her individuality is not recognized. Now let us have a look at Kalpana's case. Kalpana aspires to her individual freedom—to dress well, to earn, and to marry a person of her choice. This freedom is crushed before it takes shape. If anyone aspires to cross the laid down boundaries, she is supposed to be mad (like Mira) or bad (like Kalpana). These two subplots have strong feminist ideas. Shashi Deshpande shows the patriarchal hold but she also shows the changes in society. Mira tries to speak through her poetry, Kalpana openly rebels. They have choices they could not exercise. That is, however, not the end. Urmi, Vanaa and others have many choices open to them. Here the plot shows social progress.

As we have already noted in Unit 17, the plot in a narrative work is the structure of its actions, as these are rendered toward achieving some particular emotional and artistic effects. M.A. Abrams points out in his A Glossary of Literary Terms, that the above definition "is deceptively simple, because the actions (including verbal as well as physical actions) are performed by particular characters in a work, and are the means by which they exhibit their moral and dispositional qualities" (p. 127).

Let us now discuss the actions performed by Urmi and others. By her verbal attacks on Vanaa and Inni, Urmi reveals her state of mind. She is angry and irritated. The reason is her inability to bear her grief. During this period she engages herself in reading Mira's writings. She finds them interesting because they reveal the innermost secrets of a woman's life. Urmi finds clues to re-create her mother-in-law as a woman aspiring for self-identity and in the process, Urmi comes across a co-traveller—Kalpana -- the young rape victim. She discovers similarity in the two cases: Kalpana was raped by her relative, Mira by her husband. During the period of her visits to the hospital and to Shakutai's home, Urmi meets other sufferers whose pain and grief is as real as her own. Shakutai is a grieving mother like Urmi. She is the most unfortunate woman in the novel. She has troubles piling over her—Kalpana's uncertain condition, Sulu's suicide, social stigma, and anxiety about her other children, Sandhya and Prakash.

Slowly, as actions, reactions and incidents get attached to the main plot of Urmi's grief, the picture assumes many dimensions. Shashi Deshpande provides us with a broad canvas to study the lives of various women. In the course of our reading, we realize that the lives of the characters, both men and women, have acquired meaning. Mira rises up from the dead. She is not a far-off figure but a human being who resented being possessed. She wanted her freedom to grow as an individual. Kalpana is no longer the girl with dubious behaviour; she is a young girl who has dreams. Urmi is not the grief-stricken mother, or an angry woman; she is a sympathetic and helpful person.

The plot of The Binding Vine does not follow the traditional pattern of unity of time and action. Since it is a stream of consciousness novel the action moves back and forth with the past and the present overlapping. That does not mean, however, that the novel is a hotch-potch in time. It is set in the India of the 1980's. Urmi, Vanaa, Harish, Kishore, Inni, Dr. Bhaskar are all denizens of the Indian urban middleclass, while Shakutai and her family are from the lower class. Mira, Baiajji and others belong to the time past. In order to bring them close to us the author uses memory. The time-shift is managed through the interweaving of the subplots. The two subplots—one of Mira and the other of Kalpana—are intricately woven with the main plot of Urmi. Urmi and Mira are related but they are separated by death. Urmi and Kalpana are strangers but they are united by human concerns. In the Mira-Urmi case, Mira's writings provide the bridge; in the Kalpana-Urmi relations, Shakutai becomes the link. Although the plot does not have a traditional beginning, middle and an end, the overall effect is of a unified whole. The opening is grim, the to-and-fro movement of the middle is sometimes happy, sometimes sad, but the end is optimistic.

In the end, the protagonist (Urmi) learns the secret of life. She gets over her grief and takes charge of her life. Life has small, happy moments of affection, sympathy and understanding. These moments make it worth living. The denouement, thus, leads to the recognition that there is the "spring of life" we are constantly looking for. The meaning of the two lines from Mira's verse becomes clear to Urmi, and as she develops as an individual, the novel achieves its goal. It becomes a vindication novel, teaching us about life.

The plot of The Binding Vine has progression; it is not a static plot. With memory, flashbacks, pre-conscious and subconscious reflexes, it advances convincingly and reaches its climax. The overall impact is of a satisfactory journey of the main character. It lends satisfaction to the reader also. Here, we note two points—first, despite her grim verses, Mira opts for life's "spring"; second, the author leaves Kalpana's subplot open to possibilities. Urmi's acceptance of life and her reconciliation give strength to her as well as to the plot.

epigraph: this term comes from the Greek word epigraphe, meaning to write on or upon. (epi = upon, graphein = to write). In literature an epigraph is a brief paragraph or a verse at the beginning of a book or a chapter. In a way, it becomes the motto of the work, and is an indication of the theme.

- denouement: this is a French word meaning 'to untie' or 'unknot'. In a work of literature, it is the unravelling of the plot when towards the end many issues or events become clear; it is usually a final scene or chapter in which mysteries, confusions, and doubts are clarified.
- climax: the point when the plot reaches its peak. The expectations of the readers increase, suspense mounts and the story stops at the highest point; from here starts the downward motion, or anti-climax.
- subplot: a second story, complete and interesting in its own right, introduced into the main story. It is so skillfully managed that it becomes an integral part of the plot; it broadens our perspective on the main plot; it also enhances the overall effect.
- protagonist: the main character in a novel or drama. He/she is the hero/heroine on whom our interest is centred. Originally, in ancient Greek theatre, the protagonist was the principal actor in a drama.

18.7 WHAT THE CRITICS SAY?

- (1) Despite imaginative flashes and the role played by memory in her novels, Deshpande is, at her heart, a realist. She presents a plausible story of authentic characters and not shadowy abstractions... Hers is the India of the eighties.... For her portrayal of the predicament of middle-class educated Indian women, their inner conflict and quest for identity, the author has been called a 'feminist'.
R.S. Pathak, p. 18
- (2) Shashi Deshpande ... defines freedom for the Indian woman within the Indian socio-cultural value system and institutions. She has steadfastly resisted the temptation of creating strong glorified female heroes, and has presented the Indian woman as facing the very real dilemma of having to choose between modernity and convention.
Mukta Atrey, and Viney Kirpa . p.14
- (3) Words never come to her to express a radical break and declaration of self and independence. Rather she uses her art to express the subterranean life of silence lying under the skin, a life that is equally eloquent and vibrant like the life lived on the surface.
-Kalidas Misra in Chanchala Naik ed.
Writing Difference, p. 73.
- (4) The actual task of physical living takes place in the present, but our actions and dreams are shaped by the human ability to work sequentially, to have memories of the past and to dream about the future..... Deshpande's novels begin at midpoint, the protagonists or narrators are adults... They also mark a still point in time where individuals are trying to take stock of their lives and are involved in some measures in an observer-status....
Jasbir Jain (pp. 123-124)

18.8 LET US SUM UP

This unit has given you:

- An introduction to The Binding Vine, Deshpande's sixth novel. Its epigraph focuses on the creator and creativity.
- We also gave some thought to the beginning and the ending of the novel to prepare you to see their significance for the plot.
- After a brief and chronologically ordered summary, we gave you the detailed story so that you would know the sequence, which is otherwise not clear.
- The part-wise summary tells the story as the novelist tells it, but the sequence has been rearranged for clarity.
- In the section dealing with the plot we have discussed the plot and subplots, the time-sequence, the setting, actions of the characters and the final optimistic ending.

Check Your Progress 1

1. The Binding Vine focuses on human relationships and their strength to bind us together. The title points out how in the novel, and by implication in life, we are bound by the bonds of love, affection, understanding and empathy. 'Vine' is a creeper, it is delicate but it has two qualities: it spreads fast, and second, its tendrils bind themselves together and then attach to the main support, may be another tree or stick. In life, we are bound by blood relations (like mother-child, father-child), family relations (husband-wife, mother-in-law—daughter-in-law etc.), and human relations (as in the case of Urmi-Shakutai). All these are ties and we cannot shrug them off.
2. Three stories are merged in the plot of The Binding Vine. These are: Urmi's story of her grief, memory and the act of living; Mira's story revealed through her verses; and Kalpana's story.
3. An epigraph is a short verse or some quotation given in the beginning of a novel (or any literary work). It sets the tone of the work and acts like its motto. The epigraph to this novel is taken from Emily Bronte's Wuthering Heights.
4. Fill in the blanks:

The Binding Vine was published in 1993. It is the sixth novel of Shashi Deshpande.

- 1 (a) four parts; (b) psychological; (c) Urmi and Kishore's son; (d) Yamini; (e) Bombay, Ranidurg.
2. Urmi was unhappy because she was sent to Ranidurg while her brother stayed with the parents. She imagined that her mother did not care for her, that was why she sent her away. She bore a secret grudge against her mother and always showed scant respect for her. She was often flippant with Inni and even discourteous. She understood her mother's helplessness after Inni told her why Urmi was sent away.
3. Kalpana was fond of dressing up stylishly, using lips-stick and painting her nails. This was not done in their society. Shakutai thought that because of her style she was unduly attracting attention. She warned Kalpana but the girl did not pay any heed. After the rape, Shakutai blames it on Kalpana's waywardness. We do not agree with Shakutai. In fact, Prabhakar raped her to punish her for her rejection of his offer. Shakutai failed to see Prabhakar's real character. Moreover, we agree with Urmi that Kalpana had every right to be an individual, and live life as she wanted to.
4. Amrut and Urmi are brother-sister. Urmi is his elder sister. Amrut is tender and understanding and stands by Urmi during her grief. Urmi is often impatient with him but Amrut, waves it off by his sense of humour. Amrut and Urmi have tender feelings for each other. They share pleasant childhood memories and exchange some interesting incidents. These exchanges are important for the plot because they reveal the past and provide us valuable insights into it.

3. The ending is optimistic. Urmi gets over her grief. She appears much more normal now as she takes charge of her daily life. She understands how the small incidents in our day-to-day life keep us bound to it. These are the affections, love, sympathy and understanding that are the 'spring of life'. She exonerates Inni as she understands Inni's helplessness; she values Vanaa's concern for her; she becomes aware of Kartik's needs; she thinks positively of Kishore and his quiet strength and Shakutai's affectionate touch. Life acquires a meaning as Urmi accepts it on its own terms.

If you read this unit carefully, you would be able to:

- discuss the various themes present in the novel
- analyze how the thematic structure gives many dimensions to the story

19.1 INTRODUCTION

In the previous unit we read the story of The Binding Vine in chronological order and studied the plot construction. We have understood by now that no work can be written in a vacuum. Every novelist lives in a society; is conditioned by the social norms of that society; sees its strengths and weaknesses; and out of the observations, the novelist builds up the theme. The personal becomes impersonal as the thematic structure starts building up and in its final shape the novel achieves many dimensions as various themes combine into a unified work. Virginia Woolf once observed, “If there is one gift more essential to a novelist than another it is the power of combination—the single vision.”

In this unit we have to see how the various themes are woven together by Shashi Deshpande. But prior to that we shall look back for a while to repeat what we observed in Unit 17.5.1, i.e. “Theme”. Theme is the central idea of a novel; it is an argument or an issue around which the story revolves. A theme may have different strands but ultimately all these strands join like the tributaries joining the river and the river joining the ocean.

19.2 THEMES

The Binding Vine has several themes that can be broadly separated for discussion: the themes of human relationships, women’s bonding, death and fear. The theme of death and agony runs as a current all through the novel; the theme of marriage gives rise to women’s issues and pushes the novel towards a feminist discussion; the theme of human relationships works on the social as well as metaphysical levels and makes the reader brood over man-woman relationships; and finally the theme of women's bonding gives a psychological purview to the novel.

19.2.1 Feminism

Before we find out the feminist theme in The Binding Vine, let us give some thought to feminism in general.

What is feminism? Feminism can be simply defined as a socio-economic political movement started in the West in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. It demanded right to property, right to vote and legal rights. Later, women demanded equality and raised many more issues concerning women's status in the family and society. Of late, many feminists are voicing their concern for women's marginalization, and abuse of the female body.

When we study The Binding Vine in the light of these issues we discover that Shashi Deshpande very subtly shows women's submission, their lack of voice, the society's attitude to their suffering and the abuse of women's body, through the various women characters. But, she also shows the changes in social perception. For example, Urmi certainly has more choices than her predecessors like Mira, Akka or Inni. Here we pause for a while and ask, "Is Shashi Deshpande a Feminist Writer?"

Shashi Deshpande does not call herself a feminist writer. But she feels strongly for women and exposes the social norms that are detrimental to women's development. In this sense, she is a feminist. In an interview she says, "I am a feminist in the sense that, I think, we need to have a world, which we should recognize as a place for all of us human beings. There is no superior and inferior, we are two halves of one species" (R.S. Pathak, ed. The Fiction of Shashi Deshpande, p. 254). She recognizes the "inherent potential" within all human beings and gets irritated to see how society discriminates against women, advocates Sati, considers it a loss when a girl is born and a gain when a boy is born. All these points pertain to the women question and some of these are taken up in this novel.

Patriarchal Power

In The Binding Vine men are absent except Dr. Bhaskar and Kalpana's father. Kalpana's father comes and goes like a shadow and Dr. Bhaskar has a minor role to play. Despite these facts, men are powerfully depicted. The three main women characters, around whom this novel revolves, suffer indirectly because of their men. Other women like Akka, Inni, Shakutai and Sulu suffer directly. Thus, Shashi Deshpande creates a world in which men exert their influence and women have no voice. If they break their silence, they suffer like Kalpana. However, Urmi's brother Amrut is presented in a favourable light.

Should Women Speak?

We can answer this question with the help of Kalpana's rape case. Kalpana has a dream—she wants to marry the boy of her choice. She rejects Prabhakar, her Sulu Mavshi's husband. She is, however, raped and silenced for ever. Only a person like Urmi can speak out for her. Her speaking out may not help Kalpana directly but it generates public opinion and creates awareness. When Kalpana's rape case appears in the media, there are demonstrations, questions in the Assembly and publicity is given to the suffering family. This proves to be both good and bad—good because the hospital authorities are instructed not to shift Kalpana to any other hospital, and also because chances are that Kalpana may get justice indirectly if the culprit is punished; it is bad because this exposure brings the family into the lime-light. When the case is reopened, Sulu realizes the truth about her husband Prabhakar and commits suicide.

Urmi is the representative of the new woman and becomes the mouthpiece for the suffering women. She gives them their voice. She takes up a hard stand for Kalpana with her own family when they advise her to keep away, she argues with Dr. Bhaskar and the police officer, and most of all she convinces Shakutai to let the case come on record. Obviously, Shakutai understands her society better than Urmi does and is apprehensive that the community may castigate them. She is right in one sense. The stigma will harm Sandhya's future. Deshpande very subtly shows how the social values work. In a case like this the blame always falls on the woman. Nobody mentions Prabhakar. We do not even know his whereabouts. The focus is on Kalpana. Shakutai blames her for dressing up too gaudily and attracting male attention, Sulu thinks she should have agreed to marry Prabhakar. The police officer and all the others consider her frivolous and some even hint that she could be a "professional". Only Urmi stands by her.

In Urmi's psyche, the cases of Mira and Kalpana overlap and become one. In both, the question of woman's right to her body is of prime significance. Mira's diary and poems show her emotions. She does not have a voice but she manages to record her intimate feelings in her verses. Thus, her need to express her emotions is satisfied. Her poems have strong feminist ideas and Urmi wants to get these verses published. Her point is that women like Mira had a voice but they never got a chance to express themselves. "They never had a chance. It's not fair, it's not fair at all. And we can't go on pushing it—what happened to them—under the carpet forever because we're afraid of disgrace" (p.174). Urmi may be right theoretically but practically, she cannot get past the social question. She has to consider many aspects if she is to think of giving publicity to Mira's poems: Vanaa is against it because it concerns her father, Kishore would be hurt because it pertains to his father and mother.

Through Mira and Kalpana, the author takes up another significant issue, i.e. woman's right to her own body. In patriarchy, man the male, considers himself the owner of a woman's body. Mira's husband exerts his full right on her, stifling her right to say "no". She has to submit to him against her wishes. Even the older women like her mother and other relatives advise her to quietly follow her man:

Don't tread paths barred to you
Obey, never utter a 'no';
Submit and your life will be a paradise, she said and blessed me (p. 83).

This advice is not acceptable to Mira. She resists it and when her demand is not recognized, she suffers. She is miserable despite all comforts. Mira and Kalpana are not fortunate enough to get the right to their body but Urmi manages to get it to some extent.

Urmi shows the courage to walk out of her bedroom on her nuptial night to show Kishore, her husband, that their life together will not be a trap. It will give them both the freedom required to be individuals. Shashi Deshpande shows social changes very subtly through Urmi’s urges. Kishore is reserved by temperament; he does not express himself much and is a distant figure both physically and socially. Urmi has some happy moments with him, she loves him also but she craves for a kind of togetherness, which she finds in Dr. Bhaskar’s company. When Dr. Bhaskar obliquely hints at his love for Urmi, Urmi undergoes strange conflicting feelings—she cannot be unfaithful to Kishore; but somewhere deep within her, she enjoys Dr. Bhaskar’s attention.

Feminists want a woman to have the right to her body. It signifies that man should not own her. She must have a voice to decide her own course of life—and she should decide whether to have children or not. Theoretically, this may sound good but again socially, this is not permissible. Deshpande agrees that women must demand respect for their body but there are many social and psychological issues. For example, Mira resents her husband, but she feels elated at her approaching motherhood. For a woman, motherhood is fulfilling. When Mira conceives and feels the “stirring of life” within her, she forgets all her bitterness. Similarly, Urmi as a mother is possessive about Kartik and she grieves endlessly for Anu. The bestial assault on Kalpana and the insensitivity of Mira’s husband lead us to see another thematic pattern—love and marriage—running all through the novel. Our next section deals with it.

19.2.2 The Theme of Love and Marriage

Marriage is the oldest institution of human society. On it have hinged social discipline and a sense of security. But of late, this institution has come under scrutiny. Particularly in literature, the writers are questioning it. Shashi Deshpande does not repudiate it. She upholds it and at the same time she shows us its weak spots. There are several married couples whose lives come under her examination. Urmi-Kishore, Vanaa-Harish, Mira-Akka and their husband, Inni and Urmi’s Papa, Shakutai and her husband and Sulu-Prabhakar. These marriages are not described in the novel but there are many probing questions and revelatory remarks to show how satisfying or dissatisfying they are or were.

Let us take Mira, first. Mira was married to a young man who loved her immensely. She was eighteen then, when the proposal came from the “boy’s” side, and the family was jubilant because it was immensely elevating for the family honour; and nobody could think of rejecting it. It was not even thought necessary to take Mira's opinion. From the social angle, Mira was fortunate to go into a good middle-class family and have a loving husband. For Mira, however, her husband's obsessive love was a torture. She could never accept him. She in fact, feared his advances. What could be called love, was obsession and when love becomes too demanding, it loses its value. Shashi Deshpande subscribes to the view that love should be a source of happiness and strength in our life. Love has the power to offset the distress we encounter during our struggle for existence. When love becomes oppressive and too demanding, it turns sadistic. Here, sadistic does not mean perverted, it means with the tendency to find conscious or unconscious gratification in enslaving a partner. Mira's husband was not a bad man; he was compulsive. His love was a trap. It did not give her sufficient space of her own, a will of her own, and the freedom to say 'no'. This was what Mira resented. She remained an unhappy wife, despite all comforts.

Akka was his second wife. She was educated and was a teacher. She was twenty-two when the proposal to marry the widower (Mira's husband) came and the family accepted it without a second thought because from the social standard of her time Akka was past marriageable age. Akka soon realized that she was brought into the family not as a "bride" but as a "mother". As a wife Akka remained unfulfilled. She gave birth to Vanna but she never received love from her husband. Vanna too felt that her father did not love her. In her conversation with Urmi, she discloses her feelings.

What these two women were looking for was love. Unfortunately, neither got it. Mira received an obsessive love, bordering on lust. She was scared of it; Akka got a husband who was distant from her. She got a daughter from him but love eluded her. Mira shows her scars through her writings; Akka shows her wounds when she bursts out weeping in front of Urmi and Vanaa. The grief of being a rejected wife kept on rankling in her heart for decades. Though Akka was stoic and she had borne life's assaults with courage, the hurt of being an unloved wife always remained with her.

Urmi and Kishore seemed to make a good couple. Kishore gave her enough individual freedom, never questioned her and when he was around, he was tender to her. Their love relation was not a trap; it was egalitarian. Kishore was so quiet by disposition that he sometimes appeared remote. As Urmi says, "Kishore will never remove his armour, there is something in him I will never reach" (p. 141)). Urmi knows it is Kishore's basic nature and she accepts it. She too loves him, though she is not submissive. Their marriage is normal but there is an undercurrent which could not be explained. Urmi resents his coldness and feels attracted towards the warmth and closeness, which Dr. Bhaskar exudes. That does not, however, mean that she is unfaithful to Kishore.

The marriages of Inni and Papa (Urmi's father) and Vanaa and Harish are based on the traditional concept of submissive wives and dominating husbands. Vanna is a caring wife and Harish is a loving husband but there is no sense of equality between them. Urmi does not like Vanaa's attitude and wants her to assert herself. Even Inni, Urmi's mother, never asserted herself. Papa was dominating. It was always his will that prevailed. It was Papa's decision to send Urmi to Baiajji and Aju at Ranidurg. It hurt Inni though she could never raise her voice to stop him from sending Urmi away. Despite this, both of them had an innate tenderness. Urmi realizes this when she sees the last look in Papa's eyes before he dies and Inni's distraught state after his death.

These descriptions pertain to middle-class families. In the lower strata of society love and marriage have yet another connotation. Shakutai and Sulu do not know what is a husband's love because it is his lust they encounter. Shakutai's husband leaves her with three children to stay with another woman. Sulu's husband Prabhakar has evil intentions and in his proposal to marry Kalpana, it is his lust not love. Marriage as such is meaningless for women like Shakutai, Sulu and Kalpana but a man's presence is important as security. Urmi is right in her assessment when she tells Dr. Bhaskar that for women like Shakutai marriage has only one meaning "you are safe from other men" (p. 88).

Shashi Deshpande raises several questions regarding marriages—whether arranged or love. After reading Mira's diary, Urmi ponders, "What is it like with a man you don't know?" (p. 63). Even her marriage, which is a love marriage, leads her to admit that she does not know Kishore sufficiently "I have lived with the hope that some day I will (reach him). Each relationship, always imperfect, survives on hope" (p. 141).

This leads us to explore another theme—the theme of human relationship.

19.2.3 The Theme of Human Relationships

Shashi Deshpande's novels generally centre on family relationships. In one of her interviews she has said:

Human relationship is what a writer is involved with. Person to person and person to society relationships—these are the two primary concerns of a creative writer and, to me the former is of immense importance. My preoccupation is with interpersonal relationships and human condition. (R.S. Pathak, p. 17).

In The Binding Vine human relationships are explored with all possible pros and cons—husband-wife, mother-daughter, male-female, mother-child, woman-woman bonding and human bonding. Thus, the central theme of the novel is the "binding vine" of relationships that ties us together. We cannot shrug it off because it is love that is the binding vine. As Mira says in one of her poems:

Desire, says the Buddha, is the cause of grief;
but how escape this cord
this binding vine of love? (p. 137)

Urmi broods, "I feel I have found the word which will help me to solve the rest of the crossword". A few sentences later she tell Amrut that women do not want to be dominated. No human being likes to be dominated. We all want love. "The most important need is to love. From the moment of our births, we struggle to find something with which we can anchor ourselves to this strange world we find ourselves in. Only when we love do we find this anchor" (p. 137).

Relationships, according to Deshpande should not be a trap. They must give sufficient freedom to the other to grow as an individual.

Urmi realizes how all relationships bind us at the human level. Urmi has no relation, so to say, with Shakutai and her family, but on the human level she feels one with them all. Their concern becomes her concern; their grief becomes hers. She helps them as much as she can. Shakutai also reposes full faith in Urmi. When Urmi is around, Shakutai feels secure. She even seeks Urmi's advice and trusts her opinion. The unfortunate woman has no support system in her hour of need. Her husband comes, sheds tears and goes away; Sulu offers no consolation; and Prabhakar on whom Shakutai depends, has turned out to be a villain. It is Urmi who stands as her anchor; she becomes a bridge between Shakutai and the doctors, Shakutai and Vanaa, Shakutai and the media.

Human relationships mean building bridges between situations and across people. The man-woman relationship is based on the bridge of understanding and common well being. There is an undercurrent of love and affection that gives meaning to it. When love becomes selfishly blind, the bond loosens and misery follows. The author explores the relationship between Mira and her husband. Mira was looking for love; all she got was its compulsive version. Akka and her husband also could not build up a sound and healthy relationship because her husband could not move beyond his deceased wife's memory. The children are sufferers in both these cases—Kishore is undemonstrative and remote and Vanna is insecure. But fortunately, they do not fail to establish healthy relationships in life—Vanaa and Harish are happy, Urmi and Kishore are also happy.

The mother-daughter relationship is also very fragile in this novel. Urmi and Inni are always arguing. Urmi is sharp-tongued and flippant with her mother. When her mother shows concern for her health, Urmi often gets irritated. Their conversation is never normal, it is always sharp. Urmi harbours a secret grudge against her mother for sending her away to Ranidurg. Urmi's perception clears when her mother tells her how her father took the decision single-handedly without ever asking Inni. Urmi now feels sorry for her mother. She realizes how dominating her father was.

The mother-daughter relationship is seen in all its tender aspects in the Urmi-Anu relationship. Urmi is like a tree and her infant daughter is like a creeper around her. Her daughter is her world. Her passing away leaves Urmi empty. Shashi Deshpande explores the mother-daughter relations at yet another level when she describes the Shakutai-Kalpana relationship. The daughter is not very respectful towards her mother. She rejects her mother's advice and follows her own whims in dressing up, going out and in her decision to marry the boy of her choice. Her mother regrets all this after the rape incident. She also regrets not having understood Prabhakar's motives. There is, however, no chance now to set right the wrong. The mother-daughter relationship flounders on the rock of misunderstanding. Similarly, Mira does not abide by her mother's rules set for a daughter. She fails to identify with her self-effacing and weak mother.

A very strong sense of woman-woman bonding is shown in the novel. Urmi feels a kind of bond between herself, Mira and Kalpana. Mira is dead and gone. But in her diaries and poems Urmi reads a message for all women. Urmi also empathises with Kalpana and Shakutai. She is tender and understanding towards them. Her heart goes out to Shakutai and she becomes one with her to fight against injustice.

The ending of the novel sums up Urmi’s understanding of the strong bonds of relationship that tie us at a human level: the act of living may be futile but we all struggle to survive because we live in a web of relationships.

19.3 GLOSSARY

- chronological order: literally, the sequence or order of time. In a fictional work, it means arranging the events as per order of time, like telling first things first.
- theme: the central idea or the central point of a novel. It is an argument or an issue around which the story revolves.
- feminism: feminism started as a socio-economic-political movement in the 18th and 19th century in the West. It took up women’s issues, fought for their rights, and demanded the right to vote and right to property. In literature it manifested itself in many forms. One of them is exposing women’s lives, their subordinate status, their suffering and their efforts to speak out. These days many feminists are searching for a women’s tradition in literature.
- strand: literally, a thread or a wire. In this novel it means the threads of three different stories running parallel.

1. The definition is provided in the Glossary.
2. Shashi Deshpande raises some important issues concerning women, their suffering, their subordinate status and their inability to speak out. She does not blame men, nor does she claim that women are good and men are bad. Indeed she shows the reality of women's life. Urmi's father was tender to Inni but the major family decisions were his. Inni was tongue-tied and could never voice her feelings. Both Akka and Mira had no say in the matter of their desire. Akka could never get her husband's love, and Mira got a surfeit of it, which she did not want. Kalpana was raped because she had the courage to say 'no' to a man's proposal. Shakutai suffers because her husband is a worthless fellow; her daughter is nearly dead, she has to bear social stigma and her sister commits suicide. Looking at these women against the backdrop of Urmi's ideas, the author takes up the question of choice, freedom to have a right to their bodies and the necessity to make themselves heard.

Check Your Progress 2

1. Mira was unhappy because she was married against her wish. Her husband had an obsessive love for her. His love could be called lust because he was interested only in her body. Mira had revulsion for the sexual act and she dreaded her husband's nightly attacks. He did not pay heed to her when she said 'no'. Mira felt trapped and she was unhappy.
2. This has been elaborately discussed in the relevant portion.
3. Shakutai and Urmi meet by chance. Urmi's sister-in-law Vanaa is a social worker in the hospital, and she requests Urmi to take Shakutai home after the unconscious Kalpana is admitted in hospital. Urmi's heart goes out to the suffering mother of Kalpana. Urmi can understand Shakutai's pain as a mother because Urmi has experienced that agony recently. Urmi helps Shakutai and Shakutai reposes her faith in Urmi. She feels secure when Urmi is near her. They are not related, nor were they acquainted with each other before the meeting, but they develop a bond of affection, understanding and sympathy at a human level.

20.0 OBJECTIVES

This unit introduces you to characterization and when you read it carefully, you will be able to

- know Shashi Deshpande's art of characterization
- write character sketches on your own.

20.1 INTRODUCTION

In the previous unit we discussed the themes of the novel from various angles. In doing so we saw the peculiarities of some characters such as Vanaa's submissiveness, Urmi's self-assertion, Shakutai's helplessness and Kalpana's self-directed behaviour. We ask, "Are these the main traits of their character?" "How does their behavior affect them?" "Why do we rate a particular character from a particular angle?" These and many such questions can be answered when we study the characters closely. In this unit we shall give you some guidelines about how the characters come alive and what makes us understand them as human beings. The art of a novelist lies in creating living characters out of a fictional situation. If we can identify with the character or feel happy with or sorry for him or her, the novelist can be called successful in portraying characters.

20.2 SHASHI DESHPANDE'S ART OF CHARACTERIZATION

Shashi Deshpande portrays characters from the urban middle class of modern India. Her focus is on women and the men come alive through her female characters. The overall effect is like real human beings interacting with us.

Before we study her art let us give some thought to the significance of characterization in a novel.

No work of fiction is written in a vacuum. It is set in a particular social environment and takes shape with the help of characters and situations. We understand the mind of the characters through their words and actions. The motives and the inward turns of the mind tell us more about the character than actions themselves. A successful novelist intimately acquaints us with his or her characters' movement, speech, thought and actions so that they become real humans. Virginia Woolf states that all novels deal with characters and that the aim of the novel is to express a character, not to preach any doctrine through it. Characters reveal themselves through words. The portrayal also depends on the period of time and country they are set in. The "temperament" of the writer also influences the depiction.

Shashi Deshpande creates life-like characters. We cannot claim that she creates unforgettable, superhuman female heroes. No. Her characters are ordinary women who face life's vagaries, get irritated, depressed and yet at a point of time they reconcile with life. The final reconciliation achieved after understanding life, gives them strength. As R.S. Pathak observes, "Deshpande's women characters have a strength of their own, and in spite of challenges and hostilities, remain uncrushed" (Pathak, p. 16). We can see Urmi's strength when she says, "I am not going to break" (The Binding Vine, p. 19) and towards the end Urmi appears strong; she is not the wailing, grieving Urmi whom we meet in the beginning of the novel. Deshpande does not idealize her protagonist. She presents women from everyday life. In an interview given to Stanley Carratho, published in The Sunday Observer, Shashi Deshpande remarked, "My characters are all human beings one sees in the world around. No supermen" (11 Feb. 1990). In another interview she said, "My characters take their own ways. I have heard people saying we should have strong women characters. But my writing has to do with women as they are" (Literature Alive, December 1987).

Shashi Deshpande's art lies in her method of "showing" the characters. Since she adopts the techniques of flashback and the stream of consciousness, we see the characters through the consciousness of the protagonist. She leaves her readers free to make their own assessment and to judge the main characters as per their actions, words and interactions with others. For example, Urmi is flippant, sharp-tongued and aggressive. How can we say this? First, the opening conversation with Vanaa provides us the clue. She is so impatient and abrupt that Vanaa is intimidated. But, won't you agree that Urmi is sympathetic? Yes, we do! How do we discover this? By her attitude towards Shakutai. Dr. Bhaskar's remark show us that Urmi is a "dark, sharp-tongued, married woman" (p. 161). Thus, we are able to sum up Urmi's appearance, her relationships, her psychology, social status and her optimism through Deshpande's art of "showing". Other characters also come alive through Urmi, Shakutai and Vanaa.

The narrator is Urmi and she tells the story using the first person narration "I". She is the protagonist and Shashi Deshpande gives her the freedom to speak out her mind and to grow. The grief-stricken and distraught Urmi whom we meet in the opening pages of the novel, gains strength towards the end and achieves an optimistic vision of life. This is her mental growth. The other characters suffer and have no chance to grow, though they are not wooden. They advance the thematic structure of the novel.

The Binding Vine has a large number of characters who come, make their presence felt and go away. Since the novel is told through Urmi's consciousness, we shall see who they are in relation to her.

KALPANA'S FAMILY

Men are absent in Shashi Deshpande's novels. Where they are present, they have a negligible role to play. But, the men are not ineffective. They influence the thematic structure through the patriarchal system. They come alive when the women in their lives brood over their power. For example, in The Binding Vine, Kishore's father becomes a palpable presence through Mira's diaries and poems as well as through Vanaa's occasional remarks. We do not know his name but we know that he had a compulsive personality, he loved his first wife, Mira, obsessively; neglected his second wife, Akka; he was reserved towards his daughter Vanaa; but lived for his son Kishore. Another male character, Kishore is in the Merchant Navy, and on board a ship. He appears remote, though loving and understanding. Deshpande's deft touches create the men characters as real human beings, but she admits her inability to bring forth "rounded" male characters.

20.3 CHARACTERS IN THE NOVEL

We shall now discuss the main characters in the novel. As we have already seen, there are more than a dozen characters who contribute to the plot. They all are important in one way or the other, but only a few are the real motivating factors. So, we shall discuss these: Urmi, Kishore, Mira, Akka, Shakutai and Kalpana.

20.3.1 Urmi

Urmi holds a pivotal position in the novel. The plot takes shape and comes alive through her consciousness and the reader has no choice but to judge others as Urmi wants them to be judged. From her interaction with others and from her thoughts we get a fairly accurate picture.

Urmi is an urban, educated middle class woman of modern India. She is a lecturer. She appears to be active and smart. In physical appearance, she is dark, as Dr. Bhaskar points out. She is plain looking, wears glasses and blouses that don’t match with her sarees, which shows that she is not very particular about her appearance. As a mother, Urmi is tender and has an all-engulfing love for her children. She looks after Kartik well and the boy seems to have no complaints as Vanaa’s daughter Mandira has. Urmi is completely shattered by her daughter’s death. When the novel opens we meet an angry, brooding and impatient Urmi. She is sensitive and keeps on thinking of her daughter. In fact, she does not want to forget the pain. “This pain is all that’s left to me of Anu, without it, there will be nothing left to me of her; I will lose her entirely” (p. 9). Urmi knows that with time her grief and the associated pain will go, it will be a thing of the past. At present, her wound is too raw to be forgotten and her daughter’s memory haunts her all the time. The memory that “haunts me most often is that of her angry face when I tried to wean her” (p. 21). Urmi is so shaken by her daughter’s death that even simple, everyday questions irritate her. For example, when Shakutai asks “how many children do you have?” or when Dr. Bhaskar makes a normal query, she feels suffocated.

Urmi is sensitive from another angle also. Though she is grief-stricken, she does not want sympathy. It hurts her when Vanaa tries to make light conversation to take her out of her grief. Urmi understands Vanaa’s motives but instead of appreciating them she blurts out, “Well, what are you trying to say? ... Why don’t you say it straight off, Vanaa? I know what you’re trying to tell me” (p. 25). This is because Urmi is independent by nature. She is strong-willed and she does not like people’s sympathy. She would rather face her grief alone, stoically, than to present the “poor Urmi” image.

This does not mean that Urmi is insensitive and unsympathetic. She empathises with Shakutai. She is the only one to stand by Shakutai and her family when others keep away from them. She spends a lot of time with Shakutai, listens to her problems, helps her and visits her so often that her mother objects to her getting involved in this case. Urmi does not care for public opinion. As long as she is fighting for a just cause, it does not matter what people say. Contrary to her outward hardness, Urmi is tender and emotional. She has sympathy for the suffering women—Mira, Kalpana, Shakutai and Sulu. She even identifies with them. Shakutai’s wailing reminds her of Mira’s cry of despair: “How clear it comes to me across the years, her cry of rage and anguish, ‘why does this have to happen to me?’ Shakutai asked me. Why? My own question comes back to me—why?” (p. 67). This shows her vulnerability. Urmi’s nervous tension becomes clear to us when she recounts her nightmares:

I am running along the sea. There’s someone else with me.... I can hear the footsteps, I can hear the heavy breathing, but I cannot see whoever it is I have to keep running Now it is becoming difficult; the sand, soft and squishy under my feet, keeps dragging me down .. I can’t go on ... I can’t go on ... (p16).

There are four more nightmares that express her trauma and reveal her shattered state of mind. But Urmi keeps these nightmares to herself and does not share them with others. She would rather show her image as a strong woman than show her scars to others to get their sympathy.

Urmi is free, frank and without inhibitions. She has firm ideas about giving independence to others and she wants her own independence preserved. On the night of their marriage, when Kishore sings the line from a popular Hindi movie, which translates into, “we are trapped,” she walks out of their bedroom. She means to tell him that their love would never be a trap. Urmi values love, not lust; she likes equality, not women’s submissiveness and men’s domination. It pains her to find that such claims are not honoured by society. At a personal level, however, she does what she wants. She is friendly with Dr. Bhaskar Jain. Vanaa, Inni and others object to her growing interest in him but she considers him just a friend, an equal and asserts that there could be nothing objectionable in their friendship. Bhaskar enables her to talk about her innermost feelings about the loss of Anu, about her Baiajji and her girlhood in Ranidurg. She looks at him as an ideal “companion”. Society, however, is evaluative. Urmi knows this, her mother’s “uneasiness is palpable”, she says, “She doesn’t like my going out with Bhaskar, nor does Vanaa. ‘Do you expect me to live like a cloistered nun just because I’m married?’ I asked Vanaa irritably” (p. 115). This shows Urmi’s self-confidence and speaks of her deep love for Kishore, which remains unshaken despite her momentary disillusionment.

Urmi has clear ideas about women’s rights. She does not flaunt her feminism but she asserts that Kalpana’s case should be made public; she gives the details to the press; and she also wants to publish Mira’s poems so that women get heard. Though theoretically she is right, socially such a resolution is not viable.

She believes that women suffer because they do not express themselves. Expressing one’s resentment can be oral, through the media, or through writing. Urmi is determined to publish Mira’s poems but the author does not reveal whether Urmi is successful in her attempt or not. When one lives in a society and a family, one has to be considerate and Urmi cannot be inconsiderate to Kishore and Vanaa. This shows her social and familial relationships.

With her brother, Amrut, she has a tender relationship. They exchange pleasantries, argue, reminiscence over their past and enjoy each other’s company. Of the two, Urmi is dominating, being the elder sister and Amrut good-naturedly accepts her attitude. Urmi’s relations with her mother Inni are strained and she is often disrespectful to her. There is no malice, only anger in Urmi’s heart, that her mother had deliberately sent her to Ranidurg so as to be free from the responsibility of a girl-child. This misunderstanding clears towards the end when Urmi learns the actual facts. She feels sorry for Inni who could never utter a word against Papa’s decision. Urmi’s relations with Vanaa are tender and the two understand each other despite Urmi’s high-handedness in dealing with Vanaa. Urmi and Akka (daughter-in-law and mother-in-law) have no problems; rather, Urmi is tender towards her. Thus Urmi, though sharp-tongued, is successful in maintaining relationships.

By the end of the novel, Urmi emerges as a strong character. She has come out of her grief, she can face life, and looking at the brighter side of life she resolves to get on with the daily business of living because despite the threat of death, life has to be lived.

20.3.2 Kishore

Kishore is Urmi’s husband. He is Mira’s son and Vanaa’s half-brother. He is a remote figure, very reticent, taciturn and not given to expressing much. But he is sentimental at the core of his heart. Urmi sees him shedding tears silently at night after Anu’s death. As a husband he is supportive. Somehow, his presence is strength-giving and Urmi feels secure when he is around. But being in the Merchant Navy, Kishore is absent from the novel, and cannot provide much companionship to his wife who often craves for him.

From Urmi's account of him, we learn that Kishore is open-minded. He is earning a lot but he does not mind his wife working. Urmi does not need money but she is fiercely independent and spends only what she earns, and not what Kishore sends her. Kishore is aware of this trait but he does not interfere in her way of life, nor does he try to influence any of her decisions. This is the reason why Urmi considers herself "fortunate" – having choices and the freedom to exercise those choices.

Kishore is of a quiet nature. He had been Urmi's neighbour at Ranidurg. Even as a young man, his approach to Urmi was respectful and considerate. The two families were close, i.e. Kishore's family comprising Vanaa (his sister), Akka (her mother) and their father; and Urmi's grandparents (Baiajji and Aju). Urmi being Vanaa's friend was often in their home but Kishore never became unduly friendly to her. Urmi remembers two incidents from their childhood: one, when Kishore was in Ranidurg during his vacation and he drove Vanaa and Urmi in Aju's car; and second, during Aju's demise. Kishore's presence of mind and helpfulness impressed Urmi so much that she fell in love with him, inspite of his taciturn nature. Kishore proves to be an ideal husband and Urmi is happy with him except that sometimes she resents his unapproachable attitude. She regrets, "Kishore will never remove his armour, there is something in him I will never reach" (p. 141). She craves for "companionship", which Kishore cannot give her. But Kishore is a loving and understanding husband and a doting father. Thus, despite his absence throughout the novel, Kishore emerges with a life-like presence.

20.3.3 Mira

Mira is Kishore's mother and Urmi's mother-in-law, who died in childbirth leaving her one-day old child. Her character comes out wholly through her diaries, poems and other writings and Urmi's comments on them. Mira comes alive through this technique as an educated young woman who was much advanced for her times. From her photographs Urmi imagines her to be "dreamy-eyed", plain but attractive.

We cannot ascertain the exact time when Mira was growing up but from the various clues provided at random we can make out that it must have been when women's education was accepted but not their freedom of expression. And according to Shashi Deshpande's casual remark in an interview, Mira seems to have been married in the 1950s. She was an attractive and vivacious young girl, married to a young man who got so infatuated with her that he managed to propose to her family and marry her. The marriage could have been a happy one, had Mira accepted it on male terms which she did not. She had her own ideas about life and she felt miserable with her husband's obsessive love.

Mira was eighteen and talented. She probably did not have any aspirations to becoming a working woman but she did aspire to write poetry and be accepted as a poet. This we can establish through the incident when she met the poet Venu. An entry in her diary reads thus: "Written on my thirteenth birthday" and it recorded her meeting with Venu, the poet, and her secret desire to write like him. Reading this entry Urmi surmises that Mira was already a writer, "aspiring for eternity" (p. 65). Mira wrote but she was afraid of showing her poems to anybody lest they laugh at her. Mira's diary entry clearly shows her urge to write, her fear of ridicule and her questioning conscience. "Will I ever be able to write like this? Today, after hearing him, I know this is what I want—to be able to write like this. But I can't believe I ever can. And, thank God, I never say this aloud. They will laugh at me" (pp. 65-66).

Mira was fascinated by Venu's poetry. She aspired to write like him and wanted to show him her poems. She, therefore, met him again. At this second meeting she showed her poems to him. The poet's reaction was not encouraging. It was the stock male response saying that women do not need to write. Their poetry is to give "birth to children" (p. 127). Mira resents this male view of women as breeders. She even resents her mother's self-effacing attitude, and she has a clear vision that she would not like to be like her mother.

Her diary entries show her relationship with her parents. She was closer to her father than to her mother. She did not want to be like her mother—self-obliterating, mute and helpless. "Nothing. That was all she could do in her entire life—nothing. 'Don't ask me', she used to say to us. 'Nothing is in my hand'" (p. 126). Mira hated such self-effacement and she rejected her mother. She wrote: "To make myself in your image/was never the goal I sought" (p. 124).

What was her goal? It was probably to be innovative, to be a part of a new order. One of her earlier verses shows this:

Come my brothers, come, my sisters, let us join our hands;
a new road, a new way
a new age to begin (p. 44)

Mira was rebellious, in a way. Of course in the patriarchal system she did not have any chance to speak out but she said 'no' whenever she could. She was also possessive of her identity and resented when they changed her first name after her marriage. They called her Nirmala but Mira would not respond to this name. She wondered how a stroke of a pen could change her identity.

Despite all her anger, despair and fears, Mira was not an unwomanly woman. She loved life and wanted to live it with zest. The constant fear lurking in her writing was that she may cease to be. It seems to be a kind of premonition. Mira loved life after she became pregnant. The "spring of life" stirring within her made her happy. It was the joy of approaching motherhood. Mira was never happy as a wife, but she could be a happy mother. The author, however, does not give us the chance to know this because Mira dies in childbirth, leaving her space for Akka.

20.3.4 Shakutai

The most unfortunate woman in The Binding Vine is Shakutai, Kalpana's mother. She has no social status, no monetary standing, no family life and very few choices. She is the representative of the vast lower class population of our cities who just pull on. Life is a drudgery for them and without social backing and financial strength it is crippling.

Shakutai lives in a chawl in Bombay with her three children—Kalpana, Sandhya and Prakash. She is working in a school, probably as a peon, and hence is economically independent. Her husband has deserted her for another woman, leaving her insecure and that is why she turns to Sulu's husband Prabhakar for male support. However, this desperate need for support makes her vulnerable. It also makes her falter in her assessment of Prabhakar's motives. Usually, women are sensitive to male moves; they judge male advances quickly. Unfortunately, Shakutai makes a mistake in judging Prabhakar, because of her love for Sulu and her dependence on Prabhakar. She has faith in him and she cannot understand that Kalpana's earlier refusal to stay with her Sulu Mavshi could have a deeper meaning. She thinks Kalpana is being whimsical. When Kalpana comes back stubbornly refusing to go to Sulu, Shakutai's reaction is predictable. "Die then", she cursed Kalpana, "What do I care? What can I give you but dry chappaties and one set of clothes?" (p. 111).

Shakutai's anger is understandable. She loves her children, is concerned for their safety and wants them to have a comfortable life. She understands the handicap of being uneducated and without support; she is put to hardships in the callous big city and she does not want her history repeated in the case of her children. She wants them to be educated. The eldest being Kalpana, Shakutai sends her to Sulu. "I wanted her to have all that I never had—education, a good life, a good marriage, respect from others. Look at me—what am I? I don't want my children to be like me" (p.112), Shakutai tells Urmi. This is normal—the dream of a mother for her children.

As a woman, Shakutai knows her limits and she is content to live within that boundary. There are pitfalls outside and she would rather be safe within. This is not acceptable to Kalpana. She is not mature enough to understand fear. She likes to dress up well, flaunts her youth and subsequently gets raped. This is how Shakutai looks at the entire episode. She repudiates Kalpana's love for good things. According to her, the best option for Kalpana is to marry Prabhakar, be a co-wife with Sulu and be happy. She cannot see beyond this.

Unfortunately, Kalpana can never toe the line set for her by her mother. The mother-daughter relations are thus strained. Shakutai is unhappy with Kalpana because of her obstinacy and Kalpana is unhappy with her mother's do's and don'ts. Shakutai, calls her "self-willed" though she admires her secretly for her smartness. "She is very smart, that's how she got that job in the shop" (p. 92). Shakutai feels proud when she recounts this to Urmi. Shakutai, as a deprived and dispossessed mother herself, fails to understand her daughter's dreams.

Dreams are not alien to Shakutai though. As a woman, Shakutai has had her dreams. Dreams of a happy married life, of a good, understanding husband, and of owning things. She tells Urmi that one of her dreams has been to get a cooking gas connection and the second one is to have a "mangalsutra made in gold" (p. 110). The dreams wither in the face of life's problems. Her life with her husband is pathetic and she is filled with anger when she talks about him. The man is worthless and she decides not to have a mangalsutra.

The full pathos of Shakutai's life bursts upon us after Sulu's death. She is inconsolable. We shudder to think of her condition with Sulu gone, Kalpana struggling between life and death, her son going wayward and the entire fabric of life shattered.

20.3.5 Kalpana

Shashi Deshpande has modelled Kalpana on a nurse about whom she tells us in one of her interviews. The nurse was “a very pretty, attractive woman, a radiant kind of person” (Pathak, p. 250), and so is Kalpana. The readers meet Kalpana only after her mutilated body has been brought to the hospital. There is no chance of meeting her in person. The author gives this responsibility to her mother Shakutai to portray her daughter. Kalpana’s character takes shape slowly through Shakutai’s outbursts. She is the only source through whom we learn that Kalpana was self-willed, obstinate, fond of dressing up and smart. People like the police officer and the doctors paint her as a tainted young woman. Urmi’s comments are however, positive. It gives the picture of Kalpana as a young, vivacious girl who loved life. Thus, Kalpana becomes a palpable reality.

Our first encounter with Kalpana is not a happy one. The girl is lying in the hospital, in a state of coma. The doctors feel that she must have been with a boy friend and when she was coming home after being with him, she must have been knocked down by some vehicle. These are negative ideas. Kalpana in this case does not get our sympathy. But the author wants to create a true picture of society and the real Kalpana emerges through Shakutai’s laments.

First of all, the fact is that Kalpana is not a girl of easy morals. We have to read between the lines to arrive at this conclusion. Kalpana refuses to stay with Sulu and her husband and nothing can induce her to go back. Shakutai gets irritated at her stubbornness. Her plan was to keep Kalpana with Sulu for her education. Shakutai fails to see anything fishy, as Kalpana does not tell her the real reason. It is only after the incident that we get a faint idea about Prabhakar’s amorous advances and Kalpana’s resentment. And if Kalpana had a boy friend, it can be understood as normal. After all, having a boyfriend and dreaming of marrying him is not a crime. And we exonerate Kalpana from any charge of being a flirt.

From Shakutai’s remarks we see that Kalpana is smart. She got a job in a shop because she could speak English. Shakutai is proud of her daughter’s persistence and carefree attitude. “People in our chawl used to laugh at her, but she didn’t care. When she wants something, she goes after it, nothing can stop her” (p. 92). This assessment gives us one side of the picture. The other side is that she is stubborn and secretive, as she did not share anything with her mother.

Shakutai blames Kalpana for having brought disaster on herself and on the family. According to her, Kalpana dressed gaudily, used nail-polish and lipstick and therefore attracted the male-gaze. Whatever the mother may say, Urmi understands that Kalpana loved life. It is not a crime to enjoy life’s joys and small pleasures.

Kalpana had her own plans for life, her own dreams. She had the courage to repel the advances of Prabhakar, to reject his offer of marriage and to make known her decision to marry a boy of her choice. She is punished for crossing the limits of a woman’s existence, and for exercising her free will and harbouring dreams. Kalpana may not wake up from her coma, but she presents

1. Deshpande presents the conflicts of her protagonists without presenting simple solutions She believes that women have so deeply internalized the dominant mores that sometimes, despite being better endowed than most other Indian women, her protagonists cannot visualize an independent identity for themselves and so they become submissive (Mukta Atrey and Viney Kirpal, p. 38).
2. Through the female characters of her novels Shashi Deshpande gets to the root of existence itself. Male or female, there is a divide within ourselves that leads us to love and hate, to be gentle and good and at the same time become an agent of cruelty. (“Women in The Binding Vine” Shanthi Sivaraman in R.S. Pathak ed. The Fiction of Shashi Deshpande, p. 137).
3. The novelist has skillfully portrayed her characters, though her pictures of women are more lively. Even Kishore, Harish, Amrut and Bhaskar are adequately individualized and live through their characteristic behaviour, action and words. Aju, grandfather, father, Akka and Inni represent the old generation, more loving, kind, patient, self-abnegating and of wide sympathies. (“The Binding Vine and Indian Ethos” by J.P. Tripathi in R.S. Pathak ed. The Fiction of Shashi Deshpande, p. 152)
4. Most of the female protagonists of Deshpande reject their mothers as role models, because they represent a patriarchal outlook on life. (“Gender, Feminism and Post-coloniality: A Reading of Shashi Deshpande’s Novels” by Shalmalee Palekar in Chanchala Naik ed. Writing Difference, p. 60.)
5. The Binding Vine occupies a special place in the oeuvre of Shashi Deshpande in the sense that it presents predominantly the women’s world. (“The Binding Vine: Multi-Storied Misunderstanding” by A.G. Khan in Chanchala Naik, p. 163)
6. Deshpande’s novels are all about growing up—not through an adolescent period, but growing up into selfhood.... (Jasbir Jain in Gendered Realities, Human Spaces, p. 264).

20.5 GLOSSARY

- protagonist: main character in a literary work. These days instead of hero or heroine the word protagonist is used.
- showing and telling: these are two broad methods authors use to delineate their characters. In “showing” the author merely presents his/her characters, acting and interacting. The novelist leaves it to the reader to infer the motives and dispositions that lie behind their words or actions. In the “telling” method, the author intervenes and tells the reader about his character. He/she often describes and evaluates his/her characters and their qualities.
- flashback: the method in a dramatic or fictional work to show an event that happened at an earlier time. It is, in simple words, the act of looking back in time. A memory, or a reverie, or a confession may be used to represent the past.
- round and flat characters: these terms are given to us by E.M. Forster. Round characters are complex, life-like and have the capacity to learn from experience and change accordingly. Flat characters are types and are not developed. They do not change in the course of the story or play. They are presented in outline and have just one predominant quality.

20.6 LET US SUM UP

In this unit we discussed Shashi Deshpande's art of characterization and drew a few character sketches from The Binding Vine. We also spoke about the importance of characters in a work of fiction and learnt to appreciate Shashi Deshpande's art of characterization. We were also able to understand the main characters in the novel as human beings with their peculiar motives, strengths and weaknesses.

21.0 OBJECTIVES

After reading this unit carefully, you would be able to:

- understand the structure of the novel
- comment on the use of language
- outline the author's style
- discuss the use of point of view
- discuss the novel as portraying women's vision of life.

21.1 INTRODUCTION

In Unit 20, we discussed Shashi Deshpande's art of characterization and also commented on some important characters in the novel. So now, we know the plot, the themes and the characters. To present his/her story, a novelist requires technique. It does not mean that the novelist moulds and twists the story deliberately according to some given technique. No. The writer is an artist who works with the medium of words. We cannot bind him/her within any norms. Art is spontaneous and technique emerges all by itself. When we analyze a novel as readers/ scholars/critics, we try to find the technique.

In this unit, which is the final unit of this block, we shall explore Shashi Deshpande's technique from various angles—how does she use the language? What is her style? What is the structure of the novel? And how do we rate The Binding Vine as a feminist novel?

21.2 WHAT IS TECHNIQUE?

Technique is the means by which the novelist chooses to tell his/her story. The novel is a living thing. It grows, leaves its impact on us and inspires the readers to ponder over it. When a novelist imagines a story and works out its plot and characters, he/she starts the process of composing the subject matter. Experience, discovery, use of language all come together to bring forth the work of art. The writer has to write the story in a convincing manner. How should he/she begin? Who would be the narrator? How can language be used effectively? These and many such questions crop up while the story is moving in the author's mind. Sometimes after deliberation, and sometimes suddenly, the writer finds his/her path. A pattern takes shape, it acquires a rhythm with words and the story starts developing.

Shashi Deshpande, talking about various aspects of writing says that at the moment of writing a writer "steps out of the room.... Stands at a distance, a little away from her own humanity and sees the world from this vantage point of view. This gives a unique perspective, the larger picture, which is closer to the truth than anything else" (Naik, p. 34). This perspective allows a writer to see his/her strengths and weakness and accordingly present the story.

In other words, technique is "craftsmanship". Shashi Deshpande agrees in her interview with Lakshmi Holmstrom that craftsmanship is important in writing. One learns it by doing it. There are several choices before a writer in the matter of technique, in the way one wants to "tell" the story. Once a writer chooses her style, she has to follow it faithfully. Deshpande is selective about her technique. Her books, therefore, are finished works of art. They are free from strain, the story runs smoothly and the form and content do not smother each other.

Part of the purpose of a novel or story is to communicate the underlying dramatic structure or message of the writer. The other part is to make that communication as interesting and effective as possible. In addition, the story has to be readable and enjoyable. When the writer gets a plot, he/she has to determine how that plot is to be presented, how the scenes will be played out for the reader. The order in which the scenes have to come up determines which information is a first impression and which is a modifier. The first impressions usually carry more weight than anything that follows. So, a writer has to decide on a technique that will hold the interest of the reader, for which deciding the structure becomes important.

21.3 WHAT IS STRUCTURE?

In order to understand the meaning of the structure with regard to the novel, let us take an everyday example. When you want to build a house, you need a plot of land, a map, raw material and workmen to raise the structure with the raw material. The walls are raised, doors and windows are fitted and then inner decorations are done. The structure acquires a finished form and becomes a house, and when you shift in, it becomes a home.

Likewise, the writer has raw material, he/she chooses his/her tools (the use of language), raises the structure as an organized form, gives it decorations with dialogue, characters and actions according to the subject matter.

The structure of the novel is the essential organizing principle. It is not simply a fixed container into which you pour in your contents i.e. the "subject matter", but it is a combination of component parts put together according to the principle of decorum. That means, the characters, action, style of narration, and dialogue are all used in a befitting manner according to the literary genre. It is thus the arrangement of the constituent parts. It contributes to the developing unity of a work. According to Miriam Allott, the structure of a novel can be classified into three sub-headings: (i) Unity and coherence (ii) Plot and story and (iii) Time-factor. Unity and coherence mean that the actions, dialogue and incidents must be according to the requirement of the plot and the role assigned to the character. Plot refers to the way the various events that occur in the narrative (the story) are arranged in terms of causality. Thirdly, structure also means a formal ordering of the content in time. Time may be used as linear or as non-linear. In the linear time, events are recorded as they happen but in fugal time they go back and forth. This technique is used in the stream of consciousness novel.

According to Edwin Muir, structure can be understood in terms of Time, Space and Causality. This definition may appear a little difficult at first but on re-reading it, you will find that it is meaningful. Let us explain. We, human beings, can understand the events of life in a limited sense; only God can see the whole unity from beginning to end i.e. the unity of time, space and cause. But, human imagination can create that unity in a work of art or literature by arranging time, space, cause and effect.

This will be clear to you when we take up the novel for discussion from different angles.

21.4 TECHNIQUE IN THE BINDING VINE

An analysis of The Binding Vine shows that the novel has many strands running side by side. It has two rape cases, but rape is not the central event of the story. Death may be termed as the central motif because the novel starts with Urmi grieving over the death of her infant daughter Anusha. There are several deaths reported at short intervals—Baiajji, Aju, Urmi's father, Mira, Sulu and Kalpana's near-dead condition. Women desperate with grief occupy the novel. But that again is not the only theme. In fact, the novel is an amalgam of death, violence, fear, insecurity, rape and memory. As the title suggests, the dominating theme is love and human relationship, "this cord, this binding vine of love" (p. 137).

The unifying strand is provided by Urmi, her memory, her interaction with various characters and her comments. The novel is divided in four parts all joined by a common strand. Part One opens with Urmi's grief at her loss, but this major event leads to other revelations. Urmi appears aggressive, irritable and given to hurting Vanaa. The first few sentences reveal an important streak in her character.

It is also relevant to know that Urmi harbours a kind of grudge against her mother. The author does not tell us directly that Urmi has strained relations with her mother. She reveals it slowly to heighten the suspense. On page nine of the novel, Urmi and Vanaa discuss how Urmi, as a girl, used to wear the badly-stitched dresses made by Baiajji, quietly rejecting the beautiful, expensive dresses brought by Inni. After a few pages Urmi asks her brother, Amrut, "When has she ever acted the doting mother with me..." (p. 25). This is not a question. This is a complaint that her mother has never been a mother to her. Urmi remembers her Baiajji with deep affection but she is often rude to her mother. This sets the tone for mother-daughter tension.

We wish to know the reason. But we have to wait. The novelist chooses to solve the mystery only towards the end of the novel. Inni tells the incident when Urmi's father took the decision to send Urmi to Ranidurg. He did not consult his wife (Urmi's mother) on the issue. This fact reveals two aspects: one, in the patriarchal system a man's decision is final, and second, a woman suffers in silence as she has no voice. At this point, Urmi understands her mother's agony. She feels sorry for Inni. This revelation is important here because it leads to Urmi's growth. The pattern is thus progressive, not static.

The narrational technique is first person. The events unfold slowly with Urmi's memory playing a key role. The first person narrational technique is difficult to handle. Authors like Anthony Trollope, Henry James, Emile Zola, Charles Dickens and many others have found it limiting. Anthony Trollope once remarked, "It is always dangerous to write from the point of 'I.'" Henry James called it the "accursed autobiographic form." Shashi Deshpande uses Urmi to tell her story and she does it dexterously. Events flow back and forth without any gap, and the various strands are linked smoothly through Urmi.

The narration begins with Urmi's shattered state of mind: the death of Anu reminds her of several deaths in the family, as well as the fear of death and the human ability to get over it. This mourning period provides her with an opportunity to know Mira through her poems. Till then she did not know much about her deceased mother-in-law. Now that the trunk containing Mira's writings comes into her possession, she is able to see a woman's life from yet another angle. Every time Urmi sees the reality of woman's existence, she is led to count her blessings. Let us see, how Urmi broods over Mira's life:

Mira was only 22 when she wrote this. She had been married at the age of 18. Since then, she had lived a life which, even if normal to most women of that time, must have seemed terrible to her. It seems appalling to me when I think of the choices of my own life, of its freedom. Cloistered in a home, living with a man she could not love, surrounded by people she had nothing in common with—how did she go on? (p. 127).

Here Shashi Deshpande shows not only Mira's suffocating life but through her, she also points out that there are more choices open to women today.

While Mira rises from the dead, Urmi encounters another woman ready to march into the realm of the dead. She is Kalpana, the rape victim. Kalpana is in a coma, unable to tell her story. It is through her mother Shakutai that Kalpana comes alive. Shashi Deshpande gives another dimension to her story here. Besides "showing" the problem of rape, she provides us material to think deeply over the need to expose such cases, the vulnerability of women and the fear that is their constant companion. She blames the system through these two cases. The author does not openly blame patriarchy, she only generates an atmosphere.

There are not many descriptive passages in the novel. The only elaborate descriptions are provided by Mira and Urmi's comments on them. The rest of the situations are evoked through comments, conversations and memory. The novel is technically a successful one.

21.5 POINT OF VIEW

Point of view signifies the way a story gets told. A novelist may use 'I' to narrate his story, which is called first person point of view, or he/she may use third person point of view, as if someone else is telling the story of another person. In other words, it is the perspective through which the novelist presents his characters, events, episodes, actions and setting. This is the narrative mode or narrative voice adopted by the writer. To some critics this is the fundamental device to convey his story. According to Percy Lubbock, "The whole intricate question of method, in the craft of fiction, I take to be governed by the question of the point of view—the question of the relation in which the narrator stands to the story and his book." The novelist can either describe the characters from outside, as an impartial or partial onlooker, or he can assume omniscience and describe them from within or he can place himself in the position of one of them. The question of point of view is directly related to the power of the writer—the creator.

The Binding Vine is told from the autobiographical point of view of Urmi. She is in a pivotal position. Everything happens around her or within her purview. She is the judge, the commentator, and the prime mover. The reader knows the episodes through her. The characters too come to life, as Urmi wants them. But Shashi Deshpande does not make her all powerful. Urmi's comments are countered and balanced through situational facts.

The author "shows" Urmi through her words and actions, through her motives and interactions with people around her. The other characters gain personality through her. At the beginning of the novel Urmi gives a generalized statement about how we live as our image. She determines to fight that image and be her “self”. This is a big resolve and we have to see if Urmi succeeds in it or not. The path is not so easy. There are psychological problems too. Urmi is grief-stricken and she has to fight it out to get over it. Urmi unfolds her life through her memory, through flashbacks and through the present.

The first person point of view has limitations because one person can tell only what he/she sees, experiences and thinks. But, to get over this, Shashi Deshpande uses the diary technique. Mira is given a voice because she has written down her thoughts. These are Mira’s thoughts as interpreted by Urmi. Mira is equally a narrator, we can say. The author shows us her importance by two methods: first, the four-line stanzas from Mira’s poems become important because each stanza is an epigraph to the four parts. As we have seen in our preceding unit, an epigraph is a kind of motto. That means when Mira’s stanza becomes an epigraph, she governs the narrative. For example, the epigraph to Part One is:

The fragrance of the night-queen crosses the hedge of thorns touches the pinnacle of the shrine and is no longer mine

This part shows the fleeting nature of joy and beauty. Happiness and the fragrance elude Mira and even Urmi. Mira’s thoughts influence Urmi and she gives space to Mira to tell us her side of the story. Her presence is felt throughout the novel as it ends again with Mira’s lines. Another point that establishes Mira’s importance is Shashi Deshpande’s comment in an interview when she tells Lakshmi Holstrom that her sympathies are not with Urmi but with Mira.

Kalpana’s story comes to us primarily through Shakutai. Shakutai is not the narrator. She is given this duty by circumstances. Urmi does not know Kalpana at all. Then how would she narrate her story? The point of view is Urmi’s but the narration is Shakutai’s. As a mother, she tells Urmi, how her daughter behaved, how she looked and how smart she was. Urmi reacts to her description and generates discussion, which further reveals some more facts. Shakutai does not narrate Kalpana’s story at a stretch. This would have become boring. She gives out her thoughts in bits and pieces as and when required to advance the story

Urmi is the bridge that links the stories and gives them meaning. Her comments are revealing. As Shashi Deshpande observes, “Urmi is more than a filter, a medium through whom the other stories come through...” (Pathak, p. 250).

21.6 THE STRUCTURE OF THE NOVEL

As we studied in section 21.3 of this unit, structure is an all-encompassing term. It includes unity and coherence, time and space and the plot, the story and the characters. All these put together give us the structure. Thus, when we think of the structure, we think of the work in its totality. Shashi Deshpande is a serious novelist. She is very careful about her craftsmanship. She is aware that there are many choices to build up a story but she takes long to decide on the technique so that the structure holds fast and does not crumble.

The structure of The Binding Vine is based on the stories of three women but the responsibility to reveal the stories is given to one woman—Urmi. She is the medium who not only tells her own story of grief but also in the process discovers the lives of two other women. Together, these stories expose the entire patriarchal system and the novel comes nearer the feminist novel. The plot revolves round the themes of death, marriage, fear and violence. The importance of communication, of establishing bonds, is repeatedly emphasized. It is the death of Anu, Urmi's infant daughter that makes Urmi hysterical. In the course of the narrative, Urmi realizes that she is not the only sufferer, there are other women who are worse sufferers. The stories of Kalpana and Mira assume significance and the two sub-plots get attached to the main plot.

The themes of death, violence, fear, women's marginalization, their power, their strength despite their vulnerability give many strands to the plot. Kalpana is nearly dead. This generates fear born out of the uncertainty of the situation. Kalpana's mother thinks, that she got into trouble because she was not afraid and a woman should know fear. Urmi feels that all women instinctively know fear. The novel also takes up the theme of marriage and love. All marriages in the novel are not unsuccessful, but for making them successful, women have to sacrifice much. Inni and Papa were a happy couple, because Inni was submissive, Vanaa-Harish are happy but again it is because of Vanaa's submission. In Baiajji and Aju's case, Baiajji wielded power secretly. As for Urmi and Kishore, it is really based on understanding though Urmi feels unfulfilled due to Kishore's reticence. Akka and Mira suffer, the former as a neglected wife and the latter as a misunderstood wife. The worst marriage is of Shakutai, who is a forsaken wife, and of Sulu as a childless woman; she remains frightened and insecure, and is driven to suicide.

The overall effect of the novel is of sadness and helplessness. Particularly grim are the portions dealing with Kalpana. There are patches of humour or light conversation between Amrut and Urmi and Dr. Bhaskar and Urmi. But this is infrequent. The rest of the conversation/dialogue is angry, flippant or sad.

Angry and flippant exchanges often take place between Vanaa-Urmi, Vanaa and her daughter Mandira, and Urmi-Inni. Urmi and Vanaa are childhood friends, now they are related—Vanaa is Urmi's sister-in-law. Their exchanges are heated in which Vanaa as the meeker one is silenced. Urmi is discourteous to her mother and her mother withdraws when Urmi becomes angry. Mandira, though just a kid, is often angry with Vanaa for going out to work. She wants her mother at home.

Despite these strains and stresses, pains and agonies, the novel ends on an optimistic note. Urmi stands up as a strong character. In the beginning we find her almost broken but she gets over it. She tells her brother, "I will not break" and true to this, she does not. She understands the priorities of life, the urge to survive and the necessity to survive with hope. The heavy atmosphere clears as Urmi decides to get busy with her usual routine.

Shashi Deshpande sets the novel in Bombay, gives Urmi the required freedom, and portrays her as free, frank and uninhibited. She is the middle class, educated urban woman of the 1980's. India of the 1980's is certainly different from the small-town India of the 1940's and 50's when Mira was growing up, and living after her marriage. By allowing the characters to move according to the existing social norms, Deshpande maintains the unity of time and space. The novel has coherence. Though different stories are joined, the forging link is strong. The language is refined and the expressions are accurate. Deshpande keeps the local flavour by using words like Aju (grandfather), Ajji (grandmother) Tai and Mavshi (aunt). While describing Mira's life she refers to traditions like the change of maiden name after marriage. The rest of the ambience is neutral. The novel is recounted through the consciousness of Urmi and is a stream of consciousness novel.

21.7 THE BINDING VINE AS A STREAM OF CONSCIOUSNESS NOVEL

In the preceding units we have often referred to the term stream of conscious technique. We also read about clock time and psychological time. Now, let us apply these terms to The Binding Vine and discuss its salient points.

We know that in literature "stream of consciousness" denotes a narrative technique by which a writer chooses to tell his/her story. This phrase was first used by William James to characterize the unbroken flow of thought and awareness in the waking mind. But James was talking with reference to psychology. In literature, when a story runs in the mind of the main character, his/her senses seem to work in the past. The character remembers his/her past and the flow of thought takes us back and forth. The thoughts, memories, feelings and past associations create the world of the novel. We see and feel everything in relation to the character. For example, in our novel, Urmi comments on the rainy season in Bombay when she remembers her mother's remarks. Shashi Deshpande does not describe rains, nor does she tell us the locale of the novel. From such a flow of thoughts we know that: the novel is set in Bombay, rains in coastal areas are long and intense, and the time has passed (when the novel opened it was summer).

To convey the scenes the novelists use interior monologue, long introspective passages and flashbacks. In interior monologue, the characters express their thoughts and feelings by talking to themselves. The time is not clock time; it is psychological time. In literature many writers have used the stream of consciousness technique but we cannot say that they have all followed the same pattern. They have perfected it from time to time by making minor changes, keeping the main pattern intact.

Let us now start our discussion. The Binding Vine is a stream of consciousness novel because it is told from the consciousness of the main character, Urmi. What happened to Urmi? Her daughter has died and she is grief-stricken. Nobody tells us this fact. It is through Urmi's laments that we get to know it. Her consciousness works through association. Anu's death reminds Urmi of Baiajji's death, and Baiajji reminds her of her girlhood days in Ranidurg. We are not told that Urmi stayed with her grandparents. Urmi's thoughts going back and forth reveal this fact. Was Urmi happy in Ranidurg? From her conversation, interior monologue and her thoughts we know her feelings. Her childhood was a happy one, but she missed her parents and held Inni responsible for sending her away. This shows a great psychological fact that children may be happy and comfortable with their grandparents but they do not like to be away from their parents. Urmi's thoughts also reveal to us another fact that her relations with her mother (Inni) were strained. Towards the end of the novel, Inni recounts how Urmi's Papa took the decision to send her to Ranidurg. Here we realize a significant social fact that women have no "voice".

To reveal this theme, Shashi Deshpande takes the help of Mira's diaries. Urmi's flow of thought now merges with Mira's consciousness through her writings. Mira's life is revealed to us through Urmi's interpretation. Urmi often makes use of interior monologue when she comments on life situations and Mira's philosophy of life. For example, we do not know that Mira was raped in marriage, we only know that she dreaded her husband's advances. Urmi comments, "what has happened to Kalpana happened to Mira too" (p. 63). This comment is not spoken out, it is nonverbal and yet, it is revealing. A powerful example of interior monologue is Urmi's summing up at the end of the novel. It gives us solid proof of Urmi's optimism, her philosophy of life, her strength and her success in getting over her grief. In the beginning of the novel she resolves, "I will not break" and by the end she shows that she is not broken.

The time used is psychological time but it is intermingled with clock-time in the Kalpana episode. Kalpana's rape takes place in the present; she is revealed to us through Shakutai. Now, it is Shakutai's memory that is at work. The present is revealed with the day-to-day happenings in Shakutai's life—her husband's visit, her son Prakash's wayward behaviour, and her sister Sulu's suicide. Shakutai reminisces only when she is recounting some past experience, otherwise it is her present that is more saddening and the future that is frightening. During this period, Urmi also lives in the present and records her movements in clock-time, like her visit to Dr. Bhaskar, and the second visit of Amrut. Past and present mingle here.

Urmi emerges as a dynamic personality. She is engrossed in the present, lives in the past through memory and association and her consciousness becomes the consciousness of the entire story. By repetition, dreams, recurrence in the structure, Shashi Deshpande has depicted inner time and created a world that is as real as life. The repeated use of Mira's poems also serves to give unity to the structure of the novel.

21.8 GLOSSARY

interior monologue:

when a character recreates a conversation in his/her consciousness and follows the question-answer pattern and talks to himself/herself, revealing other characters or situations. This is nonverbal.

psychological time: as opposed to clock time which is chronological and linear, and measured in minutes, hours, days etc., psychological time runs in the mind of the character and can go back and forth.

stream of Consciousness: literary technique that depicts the inner thoughts and feelings that flow through the mind of a character in a work of fiction. Sense perceptions like thoughts, memories, feelings and random associations are presented in a mingled manner. James Joyce's Ulysses is the best example of this technique.

21.9 LET US SUM UP

In this final unit we discussed the novel in its finished form. You now know the rise of the novel, its aspects, the place of Shashi Deshpande in Indian English Literature and her works. We also studied The Binding Vine thoroughly with regard to theme, plot, and characters. In this last unit, we looked at:

- the structure of the novel

- the significance of technique and the technique followed by Shashi Deshpande
- The Binding Vine as a stream of consciousness novel

We are sure you now have an in-depth knowledge of this novel.

1. Refer to section 21.2. It is discussed elaborately.
2. Refer to section 21.4.
3. Shashi Deshpande uses the technique of fragmented narration, memory and association to generate suspense and thus sustainS the readers' interest. While recounting an episode or incident, she stops when it reaches the climax and takes up another related incident. At a later stage she picks up the threads and starts again to narrate the previous episode. The story moves backwards and forwards in psychological time and we have to wait to know the result.

Check Your Progress 2

1. Structure is an all-encompassing term. It includes unity and coherence, time and space, and the plot, the story and the characters.
2. The structure of the novel is based on the stories of three women—Urmila (Urmi), Mira and Kalpana.
3. Refer to section 21.7. This is discussed elaborately.
4. Yes, the novel gives women's vision of life. It portrays a middle-class female protagonist's predicament in a male-dominated society. The Binding Vine is the story of Urmi, Mira and Kalpana, who are the main movers; and Shakutai, Inni, Vanaa, Akka and Baiajji who are the minor characters.

We see the modern Indian society through the eyes of Urmi, Vanaa and Priti. In this society, women are educated and have relatively more freedom than their mothers had. But, they have a double burden on them, while men are free. Urmi thinks, "it is women who take parenthood seriously; men don't, not to the same extent anyway." (p. 76). Vanaa finds it difficult to deal with Mandira, her elder daughter, who resents her going out to work. She asks, "Urmi, why is it nobody thinks of blaming Harish? He's never around, but it's never his fault" (p. 75). In fact, even children are more demanding about their mother's attention. Mandira does not want her mother Vanaa to go out but it is an accepted fact that the father has to work. He is not supposed to shoulder household responsibilities.

The novel also shows how women search for love, meaning and happiness in life. Urmi is happy with Kishore but she feels that he is too remote. She remains unfulfilled. Mira wants love but has to settle for lust. Kalpana searches for a good life but is raped. A woman, thus, cannot cross the limits imposed by society.

The novel comments on the vulnerability of women, their servile attitude, their desires and their inability to speak out. We do not know what men think of life except through a few comments that Amrut and Dr. Bhaskar provide. Urmi remembers Amrut asking her, “Do women want to be dominated?” And she comments, “No human being wants to be dominated. The most important need is to love.... But love makes you vulnerable” (p.137). Dr. Bhaskar thinks women are strange creatures and it is difficult to understand them. This he says with regard to Shakutai who wants her daughters to be married though marriage for her has been a bitter experience. To this Urmi’s answer is that for a woman like Shakutai marriage means, “you are safe from other men”.

The total picture that emerges tells us that all men are not bad and all women are not good. We are made what we are by our society, our experiences of life and our innate personality.

(Note: The examples given above can be elaborated).

5. Shashi Deshpande is an Indian writer who writes in English. Her mother-tongues are Kannada and Marathi, but she has had her education in English. She uses English with ease and there are no jarring notes in her language. Instead, her expressions flow smoothly and words are used appropriately. She keeps intact some of the words from Marathi. For example, she prefers to use Aai for mother, Mavshi for maternal-aunt, Ajji for grandmother. She finds it unnatural to use these in their English translation. When she narrates the story, she thinks in English but when she writes dialogues, she thinks in her mother-tongue. Deshpande has admitted in many of her interviews that she likes to write in English as it comes easily to her, but she also agrees that it is difficult sometimes to find exact expressions for cultural nuances. She affirms that English is no longer a foreign language, as it is much used in India.

22.0 OBJECTIVES

After a careful reading of this unit, you will be able to:

- define the essay as a literary form;
- trace its origins and growth;
- analyse Bacon’s essay “Of Great Place” with regard to its theme and prose style; and
- write explanations to selected passages.

22.1 INTRODUCTION

In this Unit, we shall first discuss the form of the essay and then give you a note on its history with special reference to its growth and development in England.

Our focus will then shift to Bacon’s essay “Of Great Place”. A short biographical note on the author and an introduction precede the actual essay and a glossary succeeds it. After you have read the essay, we briefly discuss its theme and style. We shall also give you some exposure to writing explanations of passages from the essay.

We have prepared some exercises for you. Please complete these before moving on to the answers provided by us at the end of the unit.

22.2 WHAT IS AN ESSAY?

You must have read many articles in the daily newspapers and found that they are prose compositions usually written on single subjects. The essay is more or less like an article, but more personal in character as shown by its genesis. The word 'essay' comes from the French word essai (first used by the French writer Michel de Montaigne for his Essais, published in 1580), which means 'to attempt' or 'to try out'. This suggests that an essay is an individual's attempt to look at his/her subject in a personal way.

Samuel Johnson (1709-1784) called an essay "a loose sally of the mind... not a regular and orderly performance". The Oxford English Dictionary (OED) defines it as 'a composition more or less elaborate in style, though limited in range'. Both definitions differ from each other. What is loose, irregular and disorderly for Johnson, is minutely worked out and highly developed for the OED. The latter definition, moreover, gives us some idea about the length of an essay but Johnson's definition does not. The essay is usually short and compact but it can, occasionally, also be of book length, like "Essay on the Human Understanding" written by John Locke (1632-1794). As stated above, essays are prose compositions. However, some have also been written in verse like "Essay on Criticism" (1711) and "Essay on Man" (1732-4), written by the English poet Alexander Pope (1688-1744).

The essay is, thus, difficult to define as it is one of the most flexible and adaptable of literary genres. It can loosely be described as a composition, usually in prose, that attempts to discuss a subject. A further dimension was added by the nineteenth century English writer, Matthew Arnold (1822-1888), who said that an essayist humanizes knowledge, i.e; presents it in familiar terms, divesting it of all that is harsh, uncouth, abstract, exclusive, etc., so that it is of common interest, and is written in a style that appeals to us. Hence, we can conclude that an essay, as a literary form, is a short prose composition, treating a subject in a general manner, so that it can be of interest to many readers.

Essays can be written in formal as well as in informal style, depending on the purpose they are meant to achieve. A formal essay tends to be serious in tone, objective in presentation, more expository in nature, giving the reader new perspectives on the subject, and even persuading him/her to a particular point of view. The informal essay, on the other hand, is written in a lighter vein, reading more like a conversation, affording pleasure in its reading, or at times, amusing the reader if the tone adopted by the essayist is humorous or even sarcastic.

Of the three essays included for your study in this Block, Francis Bacon's "Of Great Place" is an example of a brief, formal and objective essay; "On Seeing England For The First Time" by Jamaica Kincaid illustrates both Doctor Johnson's definition of the essay being "a loose sally of the mind" and the OED definition of it being 'limited in range'; Charles Lamb's essay "A Dissertation upon A Roast Pig" is a good example of an informal essay. It's style is conversational, subjective and humorous.

While reading each essay, it will be helpful if you keep in mind its theme and style and relate it to the author's life and times.

22.3 THE ENGLISH ESSAY : A HISTORICAL PERSPECTIVE

Francis Bacon :
"Of Great Place

The essay began with Montaigne (1533-1592) in France and with Francis Bacon (1561-1626) in England. Bacon is credited with giving the English essay the status of a literary art. Since Bacon, the essay, as literary prose, has been used for a variety of purposes by seventeenth century writers like Abraham Cowley (1618-1667), John Dryden (1631-1700), Daniel Defoe (1660-1731) and others. Alexander Pope (1688-1744), as mentioned earlier, added a new dimension to essay-writing by using verse to write his "Essay on Criticism" and "Essay on Man." The eighteenth century also saw the rise of the periodical essay of which the chief exponents were Richard Steele (1672-1729) and Joseph Addison (1672-1719), who published their essays in their periodicals or magazines The Tatler (published by Steele) and The Spectator (published by Addison). Their essays hold a mirror to the eighteenth century social and political life of England, dealing with subjects like fashions of the day, superstitions, rural and urban manners, political rivalries etc.

The English essay really came into its own in the early nineteenth century with the Romantic Revival in English Literature. As in romantic poetry, so also in the essay the individual became the measure of all things and there appeared a group of essayists such as William Hazlitt (1778-1830), Charles Lamb (1775-1834) and Thomas de Quincey (1785-1859), who are termed as personal essayists. The word 'personal' here may appear repetitive since the essay, by definition, is personal in character as stated earlier. But whereas in the eighteenth century, the essay became a vehicle of social, political, literary and cultural criticism, in the early nineteenth century, in the hands of the personal essayists, it became a record of the essayist's personal emotions and feelings and, sometimes, even his whims and fancies. Because of the quality of freshness in them, we still enjoy reading the personal essays of Hazlitt such as "On Going on a Journey" and "The Fight"; Lamb's "A Dissertation upon Roast Pig" and "Dream Children"; and de Quincey's "Confessions of an English Opium Eater" and "The English Mail Coach", to mention only a few of their many essays. Some other outstanding essayists of the early and late nineteenth century like S.T. Coleridge (1772-1834), Thomas Carlyle (1795-1881), John Ruskin (1819-1900), Matthew Arnold (1822-1888) and R.L. Stevenson (1850-1896), chose to employ the genre to write formal and objective pieces on literature, aesthetics, philosophy and history rather than for writing personal essays.

The essay may not be as popular or dominant a literary form of expression today as it was in the early eighteenth and the early nineteenth centuries, yet it has become indispensable to our times largely because of the extensive growth of knowledge and that of magazines, periodicals and newspapers. Twentieth century essayists like A.G. Gardiner (1865-1946), G.K. Chesterton (1874-1936) and Robert Lynd (1879-1949) have delighted us with many of their instructive and entertaining essays such as "The Rule of the Road", "On Running After One's Hat" and "Forgetting", respectively, to mention one each of their many memorable essays. The great names of the twentieth century who have changed the essay into a highly organized and perfected literary form for presenting their points of view and arguments cogently and systematically, are Hilaire Belloc (1870-1953), Lytton Strachey (1880-1932), E.M. Forster (1879-1970), D.H. Lawrence (1885-1930), T.S. Eliot (1888-1965), Aldous Huxley (1894-1964), George Orwell (1903-1950) and Bertrand Russell (1872-1969). The list of names is endless, but to know what an essay is and how it grew, and to enjoy its different flavours, it is best to read as many essays as you can from different periods.

22.4 FRANCIS BACON: A BIOGRAPHICAL NOTE

Francis Bacon (1561-1626), the father of the English essay, was also one of the pioneers of modern philosophy and modern science. Born into an affluent family, Bacon studied law and took it up as his profession, making rapid progress in it. When twenty-three, he turned his thoughts to Parliament and entered it in 1584. Knighted in 1603, Bacon held many prominent offices in his public career. He became Solicitor-General in 1607, Attorney-General in 1613, Lord Keeper of the Great Seal in 1617, and, finally, Lord Chancellor of England in 1618. Within six months, he was elevated to nobility as Baron Verulam, and was made Viscount St. Albans in 1621. However, Bacon's career as Lord Chancellor came under a cloud with charges of bribery and corruption against him, leading to his removal from the post. Bacon died in 1626, five years after his disgrace and retirement from public life. Despite facing reverses in his public career, Bacon's literary career remained splendid and uninterrupted. His best known works on science and philosophy are: Advancement of Learning (1605), Novum Organum (1620), and De Augmentis (1623). He is also known for his History of Henry VII (1621) and New Atlantis (1627), the latter being a kind of imaginary dreamland akin to Thomas More's Utopia. Bacon's fame, however, rests primarily on his work Essays or Counsels Civil and Moral.

Francis Bacon :
"Of Great Place

It may interest you to know that Bacon had a very poor opinion of the English language and was convinced that it would 'play the bankrupt with books'. He, therefore, took care to write all his serious works in Latin 'for greater permanence' as he put it. He used English for writing his essays because he considered them as being insignificant. In fact, Bacon referred to his essays as 'certain brief notes' or 'repositories of dispersed meditation' and 'receptacles for detached thoughts'. Their genesis lay in his jotting down, at random, any brilliant or suggestive thing he heard or any illuminating thought that came into his mind, and then putting these together into a book, constantly augmenting the stock. Ironically, it is the essays Bacon wrote in English that have brought him lasting fame, while his Latin works are no more than historical curiosities today.

Although equipped with great intellect and wisdom, Bacon sadly lacked moral principles. He did not hesitate to adopt unscrupulous means to rise in life or to betray the friends who helped him to rise. Perhaps Alexander Pope was right in calling Bacon "the wisest, the brightest and the meanest of mankind".

22.5 AN INTRODUCTION TO "OF GREAT PLACE"

The Essays of Bacon evolved in three distinct stages marked by the editions of 1597, 1612 and 1625. The first edition came out with a total of ten essays; the second was expanded to thirty-eight essays, with a few earlier essays having been revised; and the last edition carried fifty-eight essays, some of which were the revised versions of the earlier ones. "Of Great Place" first appeared in the 1612 edition.

Bacon called his essays Counsels and that was what they were – practical advice on a variety of subjects of general interest. "Of Great Place" is a good example of this. It constitutes a code of conduct for persons occupying high public offices, and spells out the do's and don't's for them. The essay is saturated with the worldly wisdom Bacon had acquired, through observation and experience, during his political career and is reflected in statements like 'The rising unto place is laborious: and by pains men come to greater pains...' or 'The standing is slippery, and the regress is either a downfall, or at least an eclipse...' or again, 'All rising to great place is by a winding stair...'

You may now read the essay and use the glossary to understand the meanings of difficult words.

22.5.1 Text

Men in great place are thrice servants: servants of the sovereign or state; servants of fame; and servants of business. So as they have no freedom, neither in their persons, nor in their actions nor in their times. It is a strange desire to seek power and to lose liberty; or to seek power over others, and to lose power over a man's self. The rising unto place is laborious: and by pains men come to greater pains; and it is sometimes base; and by indignities men come to dignities. The standing is slippery, and the regress is either a downfall, or at least an eclipse, which is a melancholy thing. Cum non sis qui fueris, non esse cur velis vivere. Nay retire men cannot when they would; neither will they when it were reason: but are impatient of privateness even in age and sickness, which require the shadow: like old townsmen, that will be still sitting at their street door, though thereby they offer age to scorn. Certainly great persons had need to borrow other men's opinions, to think themselves happy; for if they judge by their own feeling, they cannot find it; but if they think with themselves what other men think of them, and that other men would fain be as they are, then they are happy as it were by report; when, perhaps, they find the contrary within. For they are the first that find their own griefs, though they be the last that find their own faults. Certainly, men in great fortunes are strangers to themselves, and while they are in the puzzle of business they have no time to tend their health either of body or mind.

*Illi mors gravis incubat,
Qui notus nimis omnibus,
Ignotus moritur sibi.*

In place there is license to do good and evil; whereof the latter is a curse: for in evil the best condition is not to will; the second not to can. But power to do good is the true and lawful end of aspiring. For good thoughts (though God accept them), yet towards men are little better than good dreams, except they be put in act; and that cannot be without power and place; as the vantage or commanding ground. Merit and good works is the end of man's motion; and conscience of the same is the accomplishment of man's rest. For if a man can be partaker of God's theatre, he shall likewise be partaker of God's rest. Et conversus Deus, ut aspiceret opera quæ fecerunt manus suæ, vidit quod omnia essent bona nimis; and then the sabbath. In the discharge of thy place set before thee the best examples; for imitation is a globe of precepts. And after a time set before thee thine own example; and examine thyself strictly whether thou didst not best at first. Neglect not also the examples of those that have carried themselves ill in the same place: not to set off thyself by taxing their memory, but to direct thyself what to avoid. Reform therefore, without bravery or scandal of former times and persons; but yet set it down to thyself, as well to create good precedents as to follow them. Reduce things to the first institution, and observe wherein and how they have degenerate; but yet ask counsel of both times; of the ancient time what is best; and of the latter time, what is fittest. Seek to make thy course regular; that men may know beforehand what they may expect; but be not too positive and peremptory; and express thyself well when thou digressest from thy rule. Preserve the right of thy place; but stir not questions of jurisdiction: and rather assume thy right in silence, and de facto, than voice it with claims and challenges. Preserve likewise the rights of inferior places; and think it more honour to direct in chief than to be busy in all. Embrace and invite helps and advices touching the execution of thy place; and do not drive away such as bring thee information as meddlers; but accept of them in good part. The vices of authority are chiefly four: delays, corruption, roughness, and facility. For delays; give easy access; keep times appointed; go through with that which is in hand; and interlace not business but of necessity. For corruption, do not only bind thine own hands or thy servants' hands from taking, but bind the hands of suitors also from offering. For integrity used doth the one; but integrity professed, and with a manifest detestation of bribery, doth the other: and avoid not only the fault, but the suspicion. Whosoever is found variable, and changeth manifestly without manifest cause, giveth suspicion of corruption. Therefore, always, when thou changest thine opinion or course, profess it plainly, and declare it, together with the reasons that move thee to change; and do not think to steal it. A servant or a favourite, if he be inward, and no other apparent cause of esteem, is commonly thought but a by-way to close corruption. For roughness, it is a needless cause of discontent: severity breedeth fear, but roughness breedeth hate. Even reproofs from authority ought to be grave, and not taunting. As for facility, it is worse than bribery. For bribes come but now and then; but if importunity or idle respects lead a man, he shall never be without. As Solomon saith, To respect persons is not good; for such a man will transgress for a piece of bread. It is most true that was anciently spoken, 'A place showeth the man': And it showeth some to the better, and some to the worse: Omnium consensu capax imperii, nisi imperasset, saith Tacitus of Galba; but of Vespasian he saith; Solus imperantium, Vespasianus mutatus in melius. Though the one was meant of sufficiency, the other of manners and affection. It is an assured sign of a worthy and generous spirit, whom honour amends. For honour is, or should be, the place of virtue; and as in nature things move violently to their place and calmly in their place, so virtue in ambition is violent, in authority settled and calm. All rising to great place is by a winding stair; and if there be factions, it is good to side a man's self whilst he is in the rising; and to balance himself when he is placed. Use the memory of thy predecessor fairly and tenderly; for if thou dost not, it is a debt will sure be paid when thou art gone. If thou have colleagues, respect them, and rather call them when they look not for it, than exclude them when they have reason to look to be called. Be not too sensible or too remembering of thy place in conversation and private answers to suitors; but let it rather be said, When he sits in place he is another man?

22.6 THEME

Theme is the matter or content of a literary work. It is the thought on which the writer builds his work. Bacon's essays revolve around topics of perennial human interest like truth, religion, friendship, revenge, envy, love, nobility etc., which 'come home to men's business and bosom' as Bacon himself wrote in his dedication to the last edition of his Essays. Now that you have read "Of Great Place", answer the questions given below to work out the theme of the essay before reading the answers provided by us below each question:

a. What price do men have to pay to reach high places?

On reaching high places, men lose their personal liberty and happiness.

b. How are men in great places thrice servants?

Once people attain high posts, they are, firstly, no longer free to do as they please but have to constantly please their masters. Secondly, the great are always conscious of their reputation, and the fear of their losing it keeps them tense. Lastly, because of the heavy duties and responsibilities of their office, they get no time for themselves. Thus, people in high posts are servants of their master, their fame and their work.

- c. Why does Bacon say that ‘great persons had need to borrow other men’s opinions, to think themselves happy’?

Persons in high places are actually quite unhappy in their hearts. They seek happiness in the thought that other people think them to be happy. They enjoy when others envy their position and aspire to be like them.

- d. What does Bacon mean by the statement: ‘All rising to great place is by a winding stair...’?

He means to say that one has to employ dubious means to rise to great place.

- e. Name the four vices, mentioned by Bacon, that are associated with high office.

The four vices are – delays, corruption, roughness and facility.

- f. In what way does ‘Of Great Place’ reflect Bacon’s idealism?

Though Bacon advocates in his essays ways to attain and sustain success in life by means scrupulous or otherwise, he emphatically states in this essay that ‘power to do good is the true and lawful end of aspiring’. He again reiterates the importance of doing good when he says that ‘Merit and good work is the end of man’s motion; and conscience of the same is the accomplishment of man’s rest’. He is convinced of the efficacy of noble actions as he knows that the best course for man is ‘to create good precedents as to follow them’. In short, Bacon feels that a man in a position of power should devote his life to good actions that are beneficial to mankind.

In this section we shall discuss Bacon’s prose style and the literary devices he has used in writing “Of Great Place”.

Style is the manner in which a writer presents his theme. It involves the effective use of language and literary devices like similes, metaphors, parallels, anti-thesis, paired and triple constructions of sentences etc. One of the striking features of Bacon's style is his opening statements which immediately take up the subject and engage the reader's attention. You must have been intrigued by the dramatic opening of the present essay: 'Men in great places are thrice servants', and been compelled to read the sentences following it to get at its meaning. Let us consider some more examples: "Of Revenge" begins with the words: 'Revenge is a kind of wild justice'; the opening line of "Of parents and children" is: 'The joys of parents are secret; and so their griefs and fears'; the essay "Of Marriage and Single Life" starts with: 'He that hath wife and children hath given hostages to fortune'.

Each of the above statements also shows Bacon's ability to compress abundant thought in extremely small space. This quality is called terseness. A terse speaker, as you know, is one who delivers very short but weighty lectures. All Bacon's essays are short and made up of terse and epigrammatic or aphoristic statements that say a lot in a few words, like the ones quoted above. An epigram or aphorism is a short, sharp and amusing saying, usually making a general observation. Bacon's essays are replete with epigrams that have universal appeal. Some instances from "Of Great Place" are: 'It is a strange desire to seek power and to lose liberty'; 'The rising unto place is laborious; and by pains men come to greater pains'.

Bacon seems to have a natural instinct for neat and elegant proverbial expressions that highlight his ideas and concepts in the fewest possible words. He has furnished the maximum number of proverbs to the English language. A proverb or maxim is a pithy saying expressing a supposed truth or moral lesson, or is a saying that requires an explanation. You may have heard the following proverbs which are often quoted from Bacon's Essay:

Some books are to be tasted, others to be swallowed, and some few to be chewed and digested.

("Of Studies")

Men fear death as children fear to go in the dark.

("Of Death")

Suspicious thoughts are like bats among birds, they ever fly by twilight.

("Of Suspicion")

Severity breedeth fear, but roughness breedeth hate.

("Of Great Place")

Bacon avoids using abundant words and drops conjunctions and linking words in his essays and yet his prose is clear and lucid. Can you think of a good reason for this? This is so because his prose is well-aided by similes, metaphors, analogies and quotations. In the essay under study, Bacon uses an interesting analogy. He writes: "All rising to great place is by a winding stair." He means to say that high posts are not achieved through fair and straight means but through dubious means, which is akin to climbing up a winding stair. Another statement from the same essay – "Imitation is a globe of precepts" persuades us to look for a different level of meaning suggested by the analogy. You must have also come across quotations, some of them in Latin, which Bacon has used to elaborate his statements. He has quoted from various sources – the Bible, Tacitus, Solomon etc.

Although Bacon's essays emerge out of his own varied experiences in life, he is never subjective or personal in his expression. Sentences like "All rising to great place is by a winding stair" may hint at his own rapid rise in public life through questionable means, yet he adopts an objective and impersonal tone to convey it.

Bacon's unit of structure is generally a short clause. Sentences are sometimes short, at other times they consist of a number of connected clauses, but they are always loose rather than periodic and 'come down like the strokes of a hammer' as Dean Church so aptly put it.

After reading "Of Great Place" a few times, you must have observed that Bacon's sentences are symmetrically arranged in paired and triple constructions with their parallels and anti-thesis. Anti-thesis is a thesis or proposition opposing another. In other words, it is a statement in which thoughts or words are balanced in contrast. Read carefully the examples given below from a few of Bacon's essays, to understand how he arranges his sentences:

Studies serve for delight, for ornament, and for ability.

("Of Studies")

Some books are to be tasted, others to be swallowed, and some few to be chewed and digested.

("Of Studies")

Travel, in the younger sort, is a part of education; in the elder, a part of experience.

("Of Travel")

Certainly virtue is like previous odours, most fragrant when they are incensed, or crushed for prosperity doth best discover vice, adversity doth best discover virtue.

("Of Adversity")

Check Your Progress-III

By now you must have got a fairly good idea of how Bacon organizes his material and how he makes use of literary devices in his essays. Attempt the following on the basis of your reading of "Of Great Place".

1. Tick (✓) the most appropriate choice in the following statements:
 - a. The essay has an emphasis that is (i) scientific (ii) practical (iii) moral (iv) theoretical.
 - b. A distinctive feature of Bacon's style is (i) digression (ii) literalness (iii) hyperbole (iv) aphorism.
 - c. In giving a series of items in the essay, Bacon uses the stylistic device (i) parallelism (ii) paralepsis (iii) polysyndeton (iv) periphrasis.

2. Pick up an example of a paired construction with its parallel and antithesis from the essay.
3. Cite an example of a triple construction from the essay.
4. Pick up a proverb from the essay.

22.8 WRITING EXPLANATIONS OF PASSAGES

Explanations of passages from prescribed texts serve a useful purpose in conveying how well you have understood the text besides indicating your ability to relate the given text to the author's philosophy, language, style etc. Take a look at the following passage and then read the explanation with reference to the context provided by us.

Passage:

"The rising unto place is laborious: and by pains men come to greater pains; and it is sometimes base; and by indignities men come to dignities. The standing is slippery, and the regress is either a downfall, or at least an eclipse, which is a melancholy thing."

Explanation:

The above passage has been taken from Francis Bacon's famous essay "Of Great Place" wherein the author deliberates upon the predicament of men in high places. Bacon refers to the two ways by which men can attain high positions: through hard labour and through questionable means. Men rise to high positions with great labour and pain but they have to suffer greater pains and make harder efforts to sustain their positions. Men may also rise to higher positions by adopting unfair and undignified means such as flattery, bribery, treachery etc. But however undignified the means, the end is endowed with honour and dignity. Once one reaches a position of high honour, everybody is bound to fear or respect him. Bacon also observes that a feeling of insecurity always accompanies those who reach high positions. Uneasy lies the head that wears a crown. A man who holds a high position is always on uncertain ground since there is always the risk of his losing the position he has attained. His position is risky and shaky since his fate is now controlled by the whims and fancies of those for whom he works. The incumbent is always in danger of losing his power once and for all or being eclipsed or superseded by someone in the race for power. Such loss of power and position is bound to result in making the person concerned sad and miserable.

Critical Comments:

The passage indicates Bacon's expertise in formulating precepts of practical wisdom based on his own experiences in the corridors of power.

The passage also reveals Bacon's ability to convey with economy and precision the charms and hazards of power politics. With the help of short epigrammatic sentences, Bacon imparts a world of wisdom without, of course, taking any moral stand.

- relate the essay to the author’s major theme in her writings;
- identify examples of:
 - 1) sarcasm
 - 2) irony
 - 3) pathos

23.1 INTRODUCTION

In the previous unit, you saw Bacon’s attempt to look at his subject in an objective way. It was a dispassionate account written in a style characterized by brevity. In contrast, we have Jamaica Kincaid’s essay which is personal and reveals the author’s passionate indignation, characteristic of a colonized person against her colonizer. This essay is in keeping with Samuel Johnson’s definition of an essay as ‘a loose sally of the mind’ and is limited in its range as it reflects the writer’s anger against the English who had colonized her country.

23.2 JAMAICA KINCAID: A BIOGRAPHICAL NOTE

The black writer Jamaica Kincaid was born in 1949 as Elaine Potter Richardson in the Caribbean island of Antigua, and had her schooling there. Although she was very intelligent, her education was interrupted when her third brother was born as her stepmother was sick and could no longer support them. She went to the United States at the age of seventeen; she was supposed to be the bread writer for the family, but refused to send the money home, and instead tried to get an education. She studied photography at the New York School of Social Research, and attended Franconia College in New Hampshire for some time. In 1973, she changed her name to Jamaica Kincaid because her family disapproved of her writing, and she did not want them to know about it. She began writing articles and short stories, and took up a job with the magazine The New Yorker, where she worked as a staff writer from 1976 to 1995. She married Allen Shawn, the son of William Shawn, The New Yorker's longtime editor. Jamaica Kincaid is the author of novels, short stories, and non-fiction works. She is a visiting professor and teaches creative writing at Harvard University.

Issue of race, gender, class and colonialism dominate her writing, and the mother-daughter relationship is a recurrent theme. Her first work, At the Bottom of the River (1983) was a volume of short stories based on childhood in the Caribbean. Her first novel, Annie John (1985) set in Antigua, explores the fierce ups and downs of a daughter's love for her mother and her motherland. Other novels include A Small Place (1988), Lucy (1990), which begin with a girl leaving Antigua for America (as Jamaica Kincaid herself did) and The Autobiography of my Mother (1995), a first person narrative in which a woman looks back on her troubled life. The essay “On Seeing England for the First Time” was first published in Harper's Magazine in 1991.

Speaking about her major theme in all her writings, she said: “I was always being told I should be something, and then my whole upbringing was something I was not: it was English”.

After you finish reading the essay, you will understand the essence of the above statement of Jamaica Kincaid

23.3 “ON SEEING ENGLAND FOR THE FIRST TIME” – AN INTRODUCTION

As is evident from its title, the essay was written after Kincaid's first visit to England. In this Unit, we shall examine both the subject matter and the manner of presentation in the essay, and also take note of the various literary devices used by Kincaid to express her personal feelings on being colonized.

23.3.1 Text

When I saw England for the first time, I was a child in school sitting at a desk. The England I was looking at was laid out on a map gently, beautifully, delicately, a very special jewel; it lay on a bed of sky blue – the background of the map – its yellow form mysterious, because though it looked like a leg of mutton, it could not really look like anything so familiar as a leg of mutton because it was England – with shadings of pink and green, unlike any shadings of pink and green I had seen before, squiggly veins of red running in every direction. England was a special jewel all right, and only special people got to wear it. The people who got to wear England were English people. They wore it well and they wore it everywhere: in jungles, in deserts, on plains, on top of the highest mountains, on all the oceans, on all the seas. When my teacher had pinned this map up on the blackboard, she said, “This is England” – and she said it with authority, seriousness, and adoration, and we all sat up. It was as if she had said, “This is Jerusalem, the place you will go to when you die but only if you have been good.” We understood then – we were meant to understand then – that England was to be our source of myth and the source from which we got our sense of reality, our sense of what was meaningful, our sense of what was meaningless – and much about our own lives and much about the very idea of us headed that last list.

At the time I was a child sitting at my desk seeing England for the first time, I was already very familiar with the greatness of it. Each morning before I left for school, I ate a breakfast of half a grapefruit, an egg, bread and butter and a slice of cheese, and a cup of cocoa; or half a grapefruit, a bowl of oat porridge, bread and butter and a slice of a cheese, and a cup of cocoa. The can of cocoa was often left on the table in front of me. It had written on it the name of the company, the year the company was established, and the words “Made in England.” Those words, “Made in England,” were written on the box the oats came in too. They would also have been written on the box the shoes I was wearing came in; the bolt of gray linen cloth lying on the shelf of a store from which my mother had bought three yards to make the uniform that I was wearing had written along its edge those three words. The shoes I wore were made in England; so were my socks and cotton undergarments and the satin ribbons I wore tied at the end of two plaits of my hair. My father, who might have sat next to me at breakfast, was a carpenter and cabinetmaker. The shoes he wore to work would have been made in England, as were his khaki shirt and trousers, his underpants and undershirt, his socks and brown felt hat. Felt was not the proper material from which a hat that was expected to provide shade from the hot sun should have been made, but my father must have seen and admired a picture of an Englishman wearing such a hat in England, and this picture that he saw must have been so compelling that it caused him to wear the wrong hat for a hot climate most of his long life. And this hat – a brown felt hat – became so central to his character that it was the first thing he put on in the morning as he stepped out of bed and the last thing he took off before he stepped back into bed at night. As we sat at breakfast, a car might go by. The car, a Hillman or a Zephyr, was made in England. The very idea of the meal itself, breakfast, and its substantial quality and quantity, was an idea from England; we somehow knew that in England they began the day with this meal called breakfast, and a proper breakfast was a big breakfast. No one I knew liked eating so much food so early in the day; it made us feel sleepy, tired. But this breakfast business was “Made in England” like almost everything else that surrounded us, the exceptions being the sea, the sky, and the air we breathed.

Jamaica Kincaid:
“On Seeing England
for the First Time”

At the time I saw this map – seeing England for the first time – I did not say to myself, “Ah, so that’s what it looks like”, because there was no longing in me to put a shape to those three words that ran through every part of my life no matter how small: for me to have had such a longing would have meant that I lived in a certain atmosphere, an atmosphere in which those three words were felt as a burden. But I did not live in such an atmosphere. When my teacher showed us the map, she asked us to study it carefully, because no test we would ever take would be complete without this statement: “Draw a map of England.” I did not know then that the statement “Draw a map of England” was something far worse than a declaration of war, for a flat-out declaration of war would have put me on alert. In fact, there was no need for war – I had long ago been conquered. I did not know then that this statement was part of a process that would result in my erasure – not my physical erasure, but my erasure all the same. I did not know then that this statement was meant to make me feel awe and small whenever I heard the word “England”: awe at the power of its existence, small because I was not from it.

After that there were many times of seeing England for the first time. I saw England in history. I knew the names of all the kings of England. I knew the names of their children, their wives, their disappointments, their triumphs, the names of people who betrayed them. I knew the dates on which they were born and the dates they died. I knew their conquests and was made to feel good if I figured in them; I knew their defeats.

This view – the naming of the kings, their deeds, their disappointments – was the vivid view, the forceful view. There were other views, subtler ones, softer, almost not there – but these softer views were the ones that made the most lasting impression on me, the ones that made me really feel like nothing. “When morning touched the sky” was one phrase, for no morning touched the sky where I lived. The morning where I lived came on abruptly, with a shock of heat and loud noises. “Evening approaches” was another. But the evenings where I lived did not approach; in fact, I had no evening – I had night and I had day, and they came and went in a mechanical way: on, off, on, off. And then there were gentle mountains and low blue skies and moors over which people took walks for nothing but pleasure, when where I lived a walk was an act of labour, a burden, something only death or the automobile could relieve. And the weather there was so remarkable because the rain fell gently always, and the wind blew in gusts that were sometimes deep, and the air was various shades of gray, each an appealing shade for a dress to be worn when a portrait was being painted; and when it rained at twilight, wonderful things happened: People bumped into each other unexpectedly and that would lead to all sorts of turns of events – a plot, the mere weather caused plots.

The reality of my life, the life I led at the time I was being shown these views of England for the first time, for the second time, for the one hundred millionth time, was this: The sun shone with what sometimes seemed to be a deliberate cruelty; we must have done something to deserve that. My dresses did not rustle in the evening air as I strolled to the theatre (I had no evening, I had no theatre; my dresses were made of a cheap cotton, the weave of which would give way after not too many washings). I got up in the morning, I did my chores (fetched water from the public pipe for my mother, swept the yard), I washed myself, I went to a woman to have my hair combed freshly every day (because before we were allowed into our classroom our teachers would inspect us, and children who had not bathed that day, or had dirt under their fingernails, or whose hair had not been combed anew that day might not be allowed to attend class). I ate that breakfast. I walked to school. At school we gathered in an auditorium and sang a hymn, "All Things Bright and Beautiful," and looking down on us as we sang were portraits of the queen of England and her husband; they wore jewels and medals and they smiled. I was a Brownie. At each meeting we would form a little group around a flagpole, and after raising the Union Jack, we would say, "I promise to do my best, to do my duty to God and the queen, to help other people every day and obey the scouts' law."

But who were these people and why had I never seen them? I mean, really seen them, in the place where they lived? I had never been to England. England! I had seen England's representatives. I had seen the governor-general at the public grounds at a ceremony celebrating the queen's birthday. I had seen an old princess and I had seen a young princess. They had both been extremely not beautiful, but who among us would have told them that? I had never seen England, really seen it. I had only met a representative, seen a picture, read books, memorized its history. I had never set foot, my own foot, in it.

The space between the idea of something and its reality is always wide and deep and dark. The longer they are kept apart – idea of thing, reality of thing – the wider the width, the deeper the depth, the thicker and darker the darkness. This space starts out empty, there is nothing in it, but it rapidly becomes filled up with obsession or desire or hatred or love – sometimes all of these things, sometimes some of these things. That the idea of something and its reality are often two completely different things is something no one ever remembers; and so when they meet and find that they are not compatible, the weaker of the two, idea or reality, dies.

And so finally, when I was a grown-up woman, the mother of two children, and wife of someone, a person who resides in a powerful country that takes up more than its fair share of a continent, the owner of a house with many rooms in it and of two automobiles, with the desire and will (which I very much act upon) to take from the world more than I give back to it, more than I deserve, more than I need, finally then, I saw England, the real England, not a picture, not a painting, not through a story in a book, but England, for the first time. In me, the space between the idea of it and its reality had become filled with hatred, and so when at last I saw it I wanted to take it into my hands and tear it into little pieces and then crumble it up as if it were clay, child's clay. That was impossible, and so I could only indulge in not-favourable opinions.

If I had told an English person what I thought, that I find England ugly, that I hate England; the weather is like a jail sentence; the English are a very ugly people; the food in England is like a jail sentence; the hair of English people is so straight, so dead-looking; the English have an unbearable smell so different from the smell of people I know, real people, of course, I would have been told that I was a person full of prejudice. Apart from the fact that it is I – that is, the people who look like me – who would make that English person aware of the unpleasantness of such a thing, the idea of such a thing, prejudice, that person would have been only partly right, sort of right: I may be capable of prejudice, but my prejudices have no weight to them, my prejudices have no force behind them, my prejudices remain opinions, my prejudices remain my personal opinion. And a great feeling of rage and disappointment came over me as I looked at England, my head full of personal opinions that could not have public, my public, approval. The people I come from are powerless to do evil on a grand scale.

Jamaica Kincaid:
“On Seeing England
for the First Time”

The moment I wished every sentence, everything I knew, that began with England would end with “and then it all died, we don’t know how, it just all died” was when I saw the white cliffs of Dover. I had sung hymns and recited poems that were about a longing to see the white cliffs of Dover again. At the time I sang the hymns and recited the poems, I could really long to see them again because I had never seen them at all, nor had anyone around me at the time. But there we were, groups of people longing for something we had never seen. And so there they were, the white cliffs, but they were not that pearly, majestic thing I used to sing about, that thing that created such a feeling in these people that when they died in the place where I lived they had themselves buried facing a direction that would allow them to see the white cliffs of Dover when they were resurrected, as surely they would be. The white cliffs of Dover, when finally I saw them, were cliffs, but they were not white; you could only call them that if the word “white” meant something special to you; they were steep; they were so steep, the correct height from which all my views of England, starting with the map before me in my classroom and ending with the trip I had just taken, should jump and die and disappear forever.

23.4 THEME

A good essay is a cohesive unit and there has to be a continuous flow in which you discern the running theme or the subject of the author's thoughts. Answer the questions that follow to get at the theme of the essay. Do not read the answers provided by us till you have written out your own.

1. What is the main thought that links the first two paragraphs of the essay?

The first paragraph of the essay describes Kincaid's impressions of England as seen from a map in school. She found the shape of England resembling a leg of mutton, but quickly erased the comparison because she had been conditioned to think of England as a great land which could not be compared with familiar objects like a leg of mutton. She thought of England as a precious jewel that only the English had the right to wear. For the Antiguans, England was a distant land, a holy land, like Jerusalem. In short, under their colonial masters, Antiguans had no existence of their own except what the English imposed on them.

In the second paragraph, the author tells us that the Antiguans had nothing they could call their own. As a child, Kincaid had realized that everything from breakfast cereal to school uniforms, from shoes to hats and cars plying on the streets of Antigua, were made in England. Thus, the second paragraph takes off from the first and reiterates that Antigua was nothing except what England gave it to exist as a British colony.

2. Why does Kincaid feel anguished at her plight?

Kincaid's statement: "I had long ago been conquered" is full of anguish. She feels that she had no identify of her own and that she had been erased completely. The only thing that mattered was the compulsion to know about England and feel a sense of awe at its might and a sense of smallness because she was not English by birth, although her upbringing was English. She was pained at the thought that, like her, all other Antiguans were 'nobodies'; they could never be 'something'; they were just 'nothing'.

3. How did the English colonizers impose their own culture on the natives?

The children were taught only British history in the schools. The views children heard about the weather or the natural scenery, were views about the English weather and the English natural scenery. The exotic and picturesque beauty of England was totally alien to the children's imagination because the reality in Antigua was quite the opposite. There was also the compulsory singing of English hymns and paying obeisance to the English flag, with duty to the British Queen and the British people whom the children had never seen. This reveals how far the colonized Antiguans were forced to live an English life alien to their native culture. The literature they read did not relate to Caribbean islands.

4. What opinion does Kincaid form of England when she first visits it? Why can she not express her opinion?

Kincaid forms a very poor opinion of England. There is nothing in it that appeals to her. She dislikes England, its food, its weather and its people. Even the white cliffs of Dover, that she had read about at school, were a disappointment when she saw them. Kincaid knows that all her views about England, starting with the map and ending with her trip, will remain within her because colonized people were powerless to exert or express any opinion on the mighty English. She is sure that her opinions, if expressed, will be contemptuously dismissed as irrational prejudices by the English.

Check Your Progress-I

Briefly answer the following questions in your own words before you turn to the answers at the end of the unit:

- How was Kincaid familiar with the greatness of England, as a child?
- Relate the essay to the phrase "Made in England".
- How does the writer experience the space between the idea of England and the real England?

23.5 PROSE STYLE

Style is the writer's manner of presenting his/her theme, and involves a skilful use of language and literary devices. Jamaica Kincaid's major theme in all her writings, including the present essay, is to show how the colonized people find themselves at a disadvantage in becoming something in life because they are forced to live an English life alien to their native culture. In expressing her personal indignation against the English who had colonized her native home, Antigua, Kincaid is at times sarcastic in her expression and at others, ironical. However, there is a rare degree of pathos that underlies both her sarcasm and her irony. Sarcasm refers to remarks that imply the opposite of what they appear to mean and are intended to mock. In other words, sarcasm is a bitter sneer or a satirical remark in scorn or contempt. For instance, when the author says that everything in Antigua had the 'Made in England' label on it, she sarcastically points out that the only exceptions were "the sea, the sky, and the air we breathed" that were not made in England.

Irony is another literary device used by Kincaid to present her thoughts. Irony is also the expression of one's meaning by saying the opposite of what one is thinking, and is often used to be amusing. One example of an ironical expression in the essay is when the author compares her situation with that of the English people. She says: "My dresses did not rustle in the evening air as I strolled to the theatre...". The remark is ironical because she neither had fine dresses, nor took an evening stroll, nor went to any theatre. In her own words: "I had no evening, I had no theatre; my dresses were made of a cheap cotton, the weave of which would give way after not too many washings."

Pathos in literature implies a condition that excites a feeling of pity or sadness. In paragraph three, the author sums up the compulsion faced by the Antiguans to know all about England, in the statement: "Draw a map of England". Her remark excites pity at the Antiguan situation under the English domination: 'I did not know then that this statement was part of a process that would result in my erasure – not my physical erasure, but my erasure all the same. I did not know then that this statement was meant to make me feel awe and small whenever I heard the word "England": awe at the power of its existence, small because I was not from it'.

- a. Pick up an example of sarcasm from the essay that has not been mentioned in the discussion above.
- b. Which paragraphs in the essay show a striking contrast between the English situation and the Antiguan reality?
- c. Explain the pathos contained in the following statement occurring in paragraph two: 'And this hat – a brown felt hat – became so central to his character that it was the first thing he put on in the morning as he stepped out of bed and the last thing he took off before he stepped back into bed at night.'

Jamaica Kincaid:
“On Seeing England
for the First Time”

In this unit you have:

- examined Jamaica Kincaid’s essay “On Seeing England for the First Time” as a personal essay that reveals her anger against the English in a very candid manner;
- gathered that the essay does not present an account of travel but is an attempt to give expression to the author’s thoughts as they occur to her; and
- noticed that the essay is heavily laced with sarcasm and irony, with a thread of pathos running throughout.

23.8 ANSWERS TO EXERCISES

Check Your Progress-I

- a. As a child, Kincaid was already familiar with the greatness of England as everything she and her family used came from England, right from the breakfast cereal they ate each morning, to the clothes and shoes they wore. The child also knew of England’s greatness from what she read of its history at school, or from what she had read about it in a book or seen in a picture.
- b. The essay is expressive of the indignation felt by the colonized people against their colonizers. Antigua, being a British colony, was in awe of its colonizers. As a child, Kincaid realized that her upbringing was totally English, with nothing of the native culture in it. All the things used by her and her family, like their breakfast and the clothes and shoes they wore, had “Made in England” written on them. This made her feel as if England had taken over her life and erased her very identity. It made her feel very small and insignificant, a ‘nobody’ who could never be ‘something’ in life.
- c. The writer experiences the space between the idea of England and the real England when she first takes a trip to that country. This space had previously been filled with hatred, so that when she first sets foot in England, she feels like tearing everything into pieces. She finds everything about it and its people ugly. Even the chalk-white cliffs of Dover do not appear white to her at all and she wonders why the English in Antigua had considered them so majestic and romantic.

Check Your Progress-II

- a. The author, as a schoolgirl, finds the map of England resembling a leg of mutton but remarks sarcastically that anything so great like England should not be compared to an ordinary object like a leg of mutton.
- b. Paragraphs five and six.
- c. The author's father had perhaps seen and admired a picture of an Englishman wearing a felt hat in England. Felt was right for a cold climate but not the right material for a hat that had to be used in the hot Antigua climate. Kincaid's remark about her father's hat is more pathetic than sarcastic. It arouses a sense of pity in us for her father who wore "the wrong hat for a hot climate most of his long life" just because he admired the English way of life. The extent to which the colonizers had taken hold of the native mind arouses our pity for the native situation.

24.0 OBJECTIVES

After a careful reading of the unit, you will be able to:

- explain the theme of "A Dissertation upon Roast Pig";
- relate the essay to Lamb's personality, tastes and temperament;
- identify the devices used by Lamb to provoke humour;
- appreciate the prose style of the essay.

24.1 INTRODUCTION

In this unit we shall look at Charles Lamb's essay "A Dissertation upon Roast Pig" and discuss it in terms of its theme, use of literary devices and style. After you complete reading the essay, you should be able to answer the in-text questions and thus discover it for yourself. We will help you in discovering it by providing you with answers to the questions which you should read only after you have written your answers.

Since Lamb's essays bear essentially the imprint of his personality, you should begin by reading the brief biographical sketch of the author. The study of the theme will make you familiar with the content of the essay. From the theme we go on to observe the humorous aspects of the essay and take a look at the devices that Lamb uses to evoke humour. Then we shall proceed to examine the prose style of the essay to see it in relation to Lamb's life and times.

We have placed exercises for you at the end of sections 24.2 and 24.6 so that you may be able to 'check your progress' before you move on to the next topic. The answers are provided at the end of the unit.

24.2 CHARLES LAMB: A BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

Charles Lamb (1775-1834), one of the most engaging personal essayists of all

Temple, London. His father held the post of clerk to Mr. Samuel Salt, a barrister and one of the benchers of the Inner Temple.

Charles Lamb spent his youth at Inner Temple and went to school in 1782 at Christ's Hospital and remained there till 1789. At Christ's Hospital, Charles formed a lasting friendship with Samuel Taylor Coleridge. Coleridge was his elder by two years. Lamb had great respect for Coleridge's genius which lasted until death dissolved their friendship. Lamb was able to read Greek, and had acquired great facility in Latin composition when he left the Hospital.

For a short while Lamb was employed in the South Sea House where his brother John held a good appointment. On 5th April 1792, he joined as a clerk in the Accounts office of the East India Company and continued there till his superannuation in 1825.

The circumstances of his personal life were harsh and even tragic. Charles and his sister Mary Ann both suffered periods of mental illness, and Charles spent six weeks in a psychiatric hospital during 1795. After 1799 they lived together and collaborated on several books for children, publishing in 1807 their famous Tales from Shakespeare. Literary fame came to Lamb relatively late, after many attempts in the fields of drama and poetry. He wrote four plays, none of which was successful. However, his essays, Specimens of English Dramatic Poets (1808), established his reputation as a critic and did much in reviving the popularity of Elizabethan drama.

Lamb began publishing his Essays of Elia in the London Magazine in 1820; they were so immediately popular that a book-length collection was published in 1823. These essays touch upon a wide range of compelling subjects from the humorous "A Dissertation upon Roast Pig" to the reflective "New Year's Eve" and collectively they also comprise a fascinating personal memoir, veiled under the pseudonymous disguise of Elia.

Lamb's personality was a happy blend of tenderness, good sense and humour and he had a strong aversion to pretence and hypocrisy. His close-knit, subtle organization, his self-revealing observations on life, and his humour, fantasy, and pathos combine to make him one of the great masters of the English essay. Lamb was a gifted conversationalist and was friendly with most of the major literary figures of his time. William Hazlitt found him to be "the most delightful, the most provoking, the most witty and sensible of men."

Roast Pig"

24.3 AN INTRODUCTION TO "A DISSERTATION UPON ROAST PIG"

In September, 1822, Charles Lamb published his classic essay "A Dissertation upon Roast Pig" in London Magazine under the pen name of Elia. This is an essay that shows Lamb at his humorous best. It is full of fun from beginning to end. In this unit we shall examine both content and style of the essay and observe the various devices that Lamb uses to portray a humorous account of the origin of mankind's practice of roasting pigs besides giving us insight into his own temperament and tastes.

- 1) MANKIND, says a Chinese manuscript, which my friend M. was obliging enough to read and explain to me, for the first seventy thousand ages ate their meat raw, clawing or biting it from the living animal, just as they do in Abyssinia to this day. This period is not obscurely hinted at by their great Confucius in the second chapter of his Mundane Mutations, where he designates a kind of golden age by the term Cho-fang, literally the Cooks' holiday. The manuscript goes on to say, that the art of roasting, or rather broiling (which I take to be the elder brother) was accidentally discovered in the manner following. The swine-herd, Ho-ti, having gone out into the woods one morning, as his manner was, to collect mast for his hogs, left his cottage in the care of his eldest son Bo-bo, a great lubberly boy, who being fond of playing with fire, as youngers of his age commonly are, let some sparks escape into a bundle of straw, which kindling quickly, spread the conflagration over every part of their poor mansion, till it was reduced to ashes. Together with the cottage (a sorry antediluvian make-shift of a building, you may think it), what was of much more importance, a fine litter of new-farrowed pigs, no less than nine in number, perished. China pigs have been esteemed a luxury all over the east from the remotest periods that we read of. Bo-bo was in the utmost consternation, as you may think, not so much for the sake of the tenement, which his father and he could easily build up again with a few dry branches, and the labour of an hour or two, at any time, as for the loss of the pigs. While he was thinking what he should say to his father, and wringing his hands over the smoking remnants of one of those untimely sufferers, an odour assailed his nostrils, unlike any scent which he had before experienced. What could it proceed from? - - not from the burnt cottage -- he had smelt that smell before -- indeed this was by no means the first accident of the kind which had occurred through the negligence of this unlucky young fire-brand. Much less did it resemble that of any known herb, weed, or flower. A premonitory moistening at the same time overflowed his nether lip. He knew not what to think. He next stooped down to feel the pig, if there were any signs of life in it. He burnt his fingers, and to cool them he applied them in his booby fashion to his mouth. Some of the crumbs of the scorched skin had come away with his fingers, and for the first time in his life (in the world's life indeed, for before him no man had known it) he tasted -- crackling! Again he felt and fumbled at the pig. It did not burn him so much now, still he licked his fingers from a sort of habit. The truth at length broke into his slow understanding, that it was the pig that smelt so, and the pig that tasted so delicious; and, surrendering himself up to the new-born pleasure, he fell to tearing up whole handfuls of the scorched skin with the flesh next it, and was cramming it down his throat in his beastly fashion, when his sire entered amid the smoking rafters, armed with retributory cudgel, and finding how affairs stood, began to rain blows upon the young rogue's shoulders, as thick as hail-stones, which Bo-bo heeded not any more than if they had been flies. The tickling pleasure, which he experienced in his lower regions, had rendered him quite callous to any inconveniences he might feel in those remote quarters. His father might lay on but he could not beat him from his pig, till he had fairly made an end of it, when, becoming a little more sensible of his situation, something like the following dialogue ensued.

- 2) "You graceless whelp, what have you got there devouring? Is it not enough that you have burnt me down three houses with your dog's tricks, and be hanged to you, but you must be eating fire, and I know not what -- what have you got there, I say ?"
- 3) "O father, the pig, the pig, do come and taste how nice the burnt pig eats."
- 4) The ears of Ho-ti tingled with horror. He cursed his son, and he cursed himself that ever he should beget a son that should eat burnt pig.
- 5) Bo-bo, whose scent was wonderfully sharpened since morning, soon raked out another pig, and fairly rending it asunder, thrust the lesser half by main force into the fists of Ho-ti, still shouting out "Eat, eat, eat the burnt pig, father, only taste -- O Lord," -- with such-like barbarous ejaculations, cramming all the while as if he would choke.
- 6) Ho-ti trembled every joint while he grasped the abominable thing, wavering whether he should not put his son to death for an unnatural young monster, when the crackling scorching his fingers, as it had done his son's, and applying the same remedy to them, he in his turn tasted some of its flavour, which, make what sour mouths he would for a pretence, proved not altogether displeasing to him. In conclusion (for the manuscript here is a little tedious) both father and son fairly sat down to the mess, and never left off till they had despatched all that remained of the litter.
- 7) Bo-bo was strictly enjoined not to let the secret escape, for the neighbours would certainly have stoned them for a couple of abominable wretches, who could think of improving upon the good meat which God had sent them. Nevertheless, strange stories got about. It was observed that Ho-ti's cottage was burnt down now more frequently than ever. Nothing but fires from this time forward. Some would break out in broad day, others in the night-time. As often as the sow farrowed, so sure was the house of Ho-ti to be in a blaze; and Ho-ti himself, which was the more remarkable, instead of chastising his son, seemed to grow more indulgent to him than ever. At length they were watched, the terrible mystery discovered, and father and son summoned to take their trial at Peking, then an inconsiderable assize town. Evidence was given, the obnoxious food itself produced in court, and verdict about to be pronounced, when the foreman of the jury begged that some of the burnt pig, of which the culprits stood accused, might be handed into the box. He handled it, and they all handled it, and burning their fingers, as Bo-bo and his father had done before them, and nature prompting to each of them the same remedy, against the face of all the facts, and the clearest charge which judge had ever given, -- to the surprise of the whole court, towns-folk, strangers, reporters, and all present -- without leaving the box, or any manner of consultation whatever, they brought in a simultaneous verdict of Not Guilty.

- 8) The judge, who was a shrewd fellow, winked at the manifest iniquity of the decision: and, when the court was dismissed, went privily, and bought up all the pigs that could be had for love or money. In a few days his Lordship's town house was observed to be on fire. The thing took wing, and now there was nothing to be seen but fires in every direction. Fuel and pigs grew enormously dear all over the district. The insurance offices one and all shut up shop. People built slighter and slighter every day, until it was feared that the very science of architecture would in no long time be lost to the world. Thus this custom of firing houses continued, till in process of time, says my manuscript, a sage arose, like our Locke, who made a discovery, that the flesh of swine, or indeed of any other animal, might be cooked (burnt, as they called it) without the necessity of consuming a whole house to dress it. Then first began the rude form of a gridiron. Roasting by the string, or spit, came in a century or two later, I forget in whose dynasty. By such slow degrees, concludes the manuscript, do the most useful, and seemingly the most obvious arts, make their way among mankind.
- 9) Without placing too implicit faith in the account above given, it must be agreed, that if a worthy pretext for so dangerous an experiment as setting houses on fire (especially in these days) could be assigned in favour of any culinary object, that pretext and excuse might be found in ROAST PIG.
- 10) Of all the delicacies in the whole mundus edibilis, I will maintain it to be the most delicate -- princeps obsoniorum.
- 11) I speak not of your grown porkers -- things between pig and pork -- those hobbydehoys -- but a young and tender suckling -- under a moon old -- guiltless as yet of the sty -- with no original speck of the amor immunditiae, the hereditary failing of the first parent, yet manifest -- his voice as yet not broken, but something between a childish treble, and a grumble -- the mild forerunner, or praeludium, of a grunt.

- 12) He must be roasted. I am not ignorant that our ancestors ate them seethed, or boiled -- but what a sacrifice of the exterior tegument!
- 13) There is no flavour comparable, I will contend, to that of the crisp, tawny, well-watched, not over-roasted, crackling, as it is well called -- the very teeth are invited to their share of the pleasure at this banquet in overcoming the coy, brittle resistance -- with the adhesive oleaginous -- O call it not fat -- but an indefinable sweetness growing up to it -- the tender blossoming of fat -- fat cropped in the bud -- taken in the shoot -- in the first innocence -- the cream and quintessence of the child-pig's yet pure food -- the lean, no lean, but a kind of animal manna -- or, rather, fat and lean (if it must be so) so blended and running into each other, that both together make but one ambrosian result, or common substance.
- 14) Behold him, while he is doing -- it seemeth rather a refreshing warmth, than a scorching heat, that he is so passive to. How equably he twirleth round the string! -- Now he is just done. To see the extreme sensibility of that tender age, he hath wept out his pretty eyes -- radiant jellies -- shooting stars --
- 15) See him in the dish, his second cradle, how meek he lieth wouldst thou have had this innocent grow up to the grossness and indocility which too often accompany maturer swinehood? Ten to one he would have proved a glutton, a sloven, an obstinate, disagreeable animal -- wallowing in all manner of filthy conversation -- from these sins he is happily snatched away -
- “Ere sin could blight, or sorrow fade, Death came with timely care--”
- his memory is odoriferous -- no clown curseth, while his stomach half rejecteth, the rank bacon -- no coalheaver bolteth him in reeking sausages -- he hath a fair sepulchre in the grateful stomach of the judicious epicure -- and for such a tomb might be content to die.
- 16) He is the best of Sapors. Pine-apple is great. She is indeed almost too transcendent -- a delight, if not sinful, yet so like to sinning, that really a tender-conscienced person would do well to pause -- too ravishing for mortal taste, she woundeth and excoriateth the lips that approach her -- like lovers' kisses, she biteth—she is a pleasure bordering on pain from the fierceness and insanity of her relish -- but she stoppeth at the palate -- she meddleth not with the appetite -- and the coarsest hunger might barter her consistently for a mutton chop.
- 17) Pig -- let me speak his praise -- is no less provocative of the appetite, than he is satisfactory to the criticalness of the palate. The strong man may batten on him, and the weakling refuseth not his mild juices.
- 18) Unlike to mankind's mixed characters, a bundle of virtues and vices, inexplicably intertwined, and not to be unravelled without hazard, he is good throughout. No part of him is better or worse than another. He helpeth, as far as his little means extend, all around. He is the least envious of banquets. He is all neighbours' fare.

Charles Lamb:
"A Dissertation upon Roast Pig"

- 19) I am one of those, who freely and ungrudgingly impart a share of the good things of this life which fall to their lot (few as mine are in this kind) to a friend. I protest I take as great an interest in my friend's pleasures, his relishes, and proper satisfactions, as in mine own. "Presents," I often say, "endear Absents." Hares, pheasants, partridges, snipes, barn-door chicken (those "tame villatic fowl"), capons, plovers, brawn, barrels of oysters, I dispense as freely as I receive them. I love to taste them, as it were, upon the tongue of my friend. But a stop must be put somewhere. One would not, like Lear, "give everything." I make my stand upon pig. Methinks it is an ingratitude to the Giver of all good flavours, to extra-domiciliate, or send out of the house, slightly, (under pretext of friendship, or I know not what) a blessing so particularly adapted, predestined, I may say, to my individual palate -- it argues an insensibility.
- 20) I remember a touch of conscience in this kind at school. My good old aunt, who never parted from me at the end of a holiday without stuffing a sweet-meat, or some nice thing, into my pocket, had dismissed me one evening with a smoking plum-cake, fresh from the oven. In my way to school (it was over London bridge) a grey-headed old beggar saluted me (I have no doubt at this time of day that he was a counterfeit). I had no pence to console him with, and in the vanity of self-denial, and the very coxcombry of charity, school-boy-like, I made him a present of -- the whole cake! I walked on a little, buoyed up, as one is on such occasions, with a sweet soothing of self-satisfaction; but before I had got to the end of the bridge, my better feelings returned, and I burst into tears, thinking how ungrateful I had been to my good aunt, to go and give her good gift away to a stranger, that I had never seen before, and who might be a bad man for aught I knew; and then I thought of the pleasure my aunt would be taking in thinking that I -- I myself, and not another -- would eat her nice cake -- and what should I say to her the next time I saw her -- how naughty I was to part with her pretty present -- and the odour of that spicy cake came back upon my recollection, and the pleasure and the curiosity I had taken in seeing her make it, and her joy when she sent it to the oven, and how disappointed she would feel that I had never had a bit of it in my mouth at last -- and I blamed my impertinent spirit of alms-giving, and out-of-place hypocrisy of goodness, and above all I wished never to see the face again of that insidious, good-for-nothing, old grey impostor.
- 21) Our ancestors were nice in their method of sacrificing these tender victims. We read of pigs whipt to death with something of a shock, as we hear of any other obsolete custom. The age of discipline is gone by, or it would be curious to inquire (in a philosophical light merely) what effect this process might have towards intenerating and dulcifying a substance, naturally so mild and dulcet as the flesh of young pigs. It looks like refining a violet. Yet we should be cautious while we condemn the inhumanity, how we censure the wisdom of the practice. It might impart a gusto.

- 22) I remember an hypothesis, argued upon by the young students, when I was at St. Omer's, and maintained with much learning and pleasantry on both sides, "Whether, supposing that the flavour of a pig who obtained his death by whipping (per flagellationem extremam) superadded a pleasure upon the palate of a man more intense than any possible suffering we can conceive in the animal, is man justified in using that method of putting the animal to death?" I forget the decision.
- 23) His sauce should be considered. Decidedly, a few bread crumbs, done up with his liver and brains, and a dash of mild sage. But, banish, dear Mrs. Cook, I beseech you, the whole onion tribe. Barbecue your whole hogs to your palate, steep them in shallots, stuff them out with plantations of the rank and guilty garlic; you cannot poison them, or make them stronger than they are -- but consider, he is a weakling -- a flower.

Lamb recounts how when he was a little boy at school, his good old aunt gave him a delicious plum-cake as a present at the end of a holiday. On his way to school (over London Bridge) a grey-headed old beggar saluted him and begged him for some alms. Since he had no penny to console the beggar with, Lamb made him a present of the whole cake and felt instantly elated at his act of charity. But by the time Lamb reached the end of the bridge, he reflected upon the whole event and regretted his action. He felt that his generosity in giving away the whole cake to a total stranger was an act of ingratitude to his aunt.

- 3) How is the above anecdote related to his love for the roast pig?
.....
.....
.....

Lamb wants to emphasize his love for the roasted pig by stating that though he is generous enough to share with his friends all the good things of life, he would not under any circumstances ever desire to share with them this very delicacy. He may have given away the whole cake to please a beggar, but he wouldn't like to part with a roast pig for anything in the world.

- 4) Do you notice any sign of cruelty when Lamb is describing his passion for the roast pig?
.....
.....
.....
.....
.....

In waxing eloquent over his love for the roast pig, Lamb makes statements that seem to show signs of callousness towards the fate of the pigs. He enjoys the sight of the pig being roasted wherein the beautiful eyes of a pig melt and drop into the fire. Similarly, signs of cruelty can also be seen when he approves of a pig being whipped to death before being cooked.

- 5) The story of the origin of roasted pigs belongs to primitive times. But Lamb makes references to several elements in the narrative which may be called characteristically modern. Can you identify such elements?
.....
.....

.....
.....
Lamb refers to elements like a judge, a jury and a regular trial which are essentially not a part of a primitive scene. Even the statement, "The insurance offices one and all shut up shop" shows how Lamb places a primitive incident in the context of contemporary times.

24.5 HUMOUR

Avoiding public, philosophical and didactic topics, Lamb dwelt imaginatively in the historical past, or in that of his own memories and experiences, to create exquisitely beautiful essays that are a perfect blend of humour and pathos. A strong undercurrent of his great misfortunes and pity runs through most of his essays and it is perhaps rightly believed that he hastened to laugh at everything for fear of being obliged to weep. His subject matter is always intimately related to himself. He projected in his highly personalized essays the pretty, the humorous, the pathetic in the life and incidents around him. Yet, Lamb's "A Dissertation upon Roast Pig" is an exceptionally brilliant piece of prose where you may not find any trace of personal agony or pain. It is an essay where boisterous humour dominates the narrative from beginning to the end. This essay reveals to you the peculiar flavour of his humour.

One of the devices that Lamb uses to provoke laughter in this essay is exaggeration. He succeeds in exciting laughter by exaggerating the sheer absurdities in a particular situation. When Ho-ti discovers his son Bo-bo eating the roast pigs, he starts raining blows as thick as hail-stones on his errant son, which Bo-bo heeded not "any more than if they had been flies." Enjoying the tickling pleasure of tasting the crackling, Bo-bo remains unmindful of the beatings and says, "O father, the pig, the pig, do come and taste how nice the burnt pig eats." And even while offering his father the dainty meal, Bo-bo decides to keep the choice parts for his own self. Lamb's description of the scene is hilarious indeed: "Bo-bo, whose scent was wonderfully sharpened since morning, soon raked out another pig, and fairly rending it asunder, thrust the lesser half by main force into the fists of Ho-ti, still shouting out 'Eat, eat, eat the burnt pig, father, only taste -- O Lord,' -- with such-like barbarous ejaculations, cramming all the while as if he would choke."

Exaggeration is again employed by Lamb to create delightful humour when he describes how the judge and the jury respond to the crime of eating meat that was not raw. The jury fortunately had their fingers burned in the same way and tried Bo-bo's method of cooling them. And Bo-bo is promptly acquitted. The description related to the ensuing event which combines mock seriousness and gravity is humorous indeed. Lamb proceeds gravely:

"The judge, who was a shrewd fellow, winked at the manifest iniquity of the decision, and when the court was dismissed, went privily and bought up all the pigs that could be had for love or money. In a few days his lordship's town house was observed to be on fire. The thing took wing, and now there was nothing to be seen but fires in every direction. Fuel and pigs grew enormously dear all over the district. The insurance offices one and all shut up shop. People built slighter and slighter every day, until it was feared that the very science of architecture would in no long time be lost to the world.”

There is also abundant humour in the manner in which Lamb describes how “a sage arose, like our Locke, who made a discovery that the flesh of swine, or indeed of any other animal, might be cooked (burnt as they called it) without the necessity of consuming a whole house to dress it.” The situation is humorous again when Lamb addresses the matter of his own liking for the roast pig and describes with elaborate care the process of roasting the pig and how meekly the roasted creature lies on the dinner table. Lamb almost grows ecstatic in his narration while describing his preference for the delicacy.

What is noteworthy in these instances of Lamb’s humour is the lightness of tone which never borders on malice or cynicism. He is capable of making fun of himself as well as of others but his tone is always without spite. He highlights the incongruous by describing, in a very involved manner, the pleasant nonsense and gross absurdities that are an integral part of human life. In his narrative you can see how he explores and exploits all the elements in a situation that can make an event humorous and interesting. His close-knit, subtle organization, his self-revealing observations on life, and his harmonious blend of reality and fantasy, in evoking both humour and pathos, combine to make him one of the great masters of the English essay.

Style may be defined as the way in which the writer uses the resources of language to achieve his purpose. The effectiveness of a style is to be judged in how well it is adapted to implementing the writer’s point of view which not only controls the content of what he writes but also the style in which he writes. So we shall study in this section the various devices that Lamb uses to relate the content to his mode of expression and technique.

Charles Lamb frequently developed his essays according to associational patterns. The sequence of associations in “A Dissertation upon Roast Pig” furnishes remarkable insight into the author’s personality. Both anecdotes in “A Dissertation upon Roast Pig”—one related to the events narrated in the—imaginary Chinese manuscript he refers to, and the other concerning his childhood experience of having to part with the cake which his aunt gifted to him—serve as appropriate illustrations of the point he is trying to make. These anecdotes based on hearsay or personal experiences not only heighten the effect of the essay but also reveal to us the various dimensions of Lamb’s mind and the unique charm of his personality. His ability to enthusiastically relate universal interests to personal traits lends grace and charm to his narratives and gives his style a fascination of its own.

One of the ingredients of Lamb’s style is iteration or repetition. Separated by dashes, the phrases help in conveying the cumulative effect of impressions to the reader. In this essay Lamb uses a series of phrases to emphasize his ecstatic love for the roast pig. He writes: “There is no flavour comparable, I will contend, to that of the crisp, tawny, well-watched, not over-roasted, crackling, as it is well called -- the very teeth are invited to their share of the pleasure at this banquet in overcoming the coy, brittle resistance -- with the adhesive oleaginous -- O call it not fat -- but an indefinable sweetness growing up to it -- the tender blossoming of fat -- fat cropped in the bud -- taken in the shoot -- in the first innocence -- the cream and quintessence of the child-pig's yet pure food -- the lean, no lean, but a kind of animal manna -- or, rather, fat and lean (if it must be so) so blended and running into each other, that both together make but one ambrosian result, or common substance.”

Lamb's style is sometimes perverse, outrageously overstuffed with archaic and pedantic words and phrases. In “A Dissertation upon Roast Pig” expressions like “the adhesive oleaginous,” “villatic fowl,” “intenerating and dulcifying,” etc. do sound tedious at times but they do not, in any way, hinder the otherwise smooth flow evident in the narration. Likewise, this essay also abounds in the use of Latin expressions. In paras 10 and 11 he uses Latin expressions like mundus edibilis, princeps obsoniorum, bamor immunditiae, praeludium etc. in quick succession. But, here again, the progression of thought is not very much obstructed since it is not altogether difficult for a reader to understand the meaning of such Latin phrases from the context of the passages in question. The scholarly words and phrases are used in the mock heroic mode. Such an elevated diction is suited to epic poetry, to describe great events. When he uses it to describe trivial incidents, it is a source of humour.

A study of Lamb's style reveals his fondness for the styles adopted by various Elizabethan writers like Sir Thomas Browne, Spenser, Burton, Fuller and Izaak Walton. Lamb was undoubtedly fond of Elizabethan poets and playwrights and there are many points in which Lamb imitates these writers. But that does not mean that Lamb's style lacks originality. He succeeded in endowing his own thoughts with the strong imprint of his personality to give to his writings a strong dramatic quality not to be found in any of the writers mentioned above. Like a true Romantic, Lamb allows the spontaneous overflow of his powerful individual feelings and emotions to ignore the considerations of traditional and accepted norms of style and technique.

Check Your Progress-II

- a) Give examples of similes, one each from paragraphs 1 and 21.
- b) Give an example of iteration (that is not mentioned in the discussion above) from the essay.
- c) Identify from paragraph 1 of the essay three words or phrases that sound archaic or pedantic.
- d) Give an example of conversational style used by Lamb in the essay.

24.7 LET US SUM UP

In this unit you have:

- examined the essay “A Dissertation upon Roast Pig” in the light of the distinctive features of Lamb's style and personality;

- observed and identified the striking traits of Lamb's humour that go on to make this essay so hilariously entertaining;
- become aware of the various literary devices that Lamb uses in this essay; and
- been able to relate features of his style to his personality and to the writers of the Elizabethan period.

- appreciate the distinctive style of his letter-writing;
- understand the essence of man’s quest for knowledge; and
- attempt a letter to a friend on a serious topic of your interest

25.1 INTRODUCTION

In this unit, we will familiarize you with another form of non-fictional prose—the letter. What is a letter? On the personal level, a letter is a spontaneous expression of one’s self and is often called an extension of the self. On the social level, letters hold up a mirror to the age in which they are written. Letters can exude warmth, intimacy, passion and romance, like the letters written by Napoleon Bonaparte to his lady-love Josephine. Or, they can be scurrilous and full of invective like Alexander Pope’s Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot, a verse-letter in which each line comes whizzing like a poisoned dart to sink into its target. Letters can also be very informative, being at the same time very direct and informal, like Jawaharlal Nehru’s letter “The Quest of Man” that you are going to study in this unit.

25.2 LETTER WRITING – A HISTORICAL PERSPECTIVE

Letter writing came to be recognized as a literary form in England during the Renaissance when critics came in touch with the works of Seneca, Cicero and Guevara. Early Renaissance letter writers include the Paston family whose letters give us considerable insight into the social life of the age. Roger Ascham, another entertaining correspondent, achieved prose that is at once simple and straightforward in his Two Hundred and Ninety-Five Letters. Among the letter writers of the seventeenth century, Rachel Lady Russell's letters, that are as authentic an account of the times as the diaries and memoirs of the famous diarists Pepys and Evelyn, helped prepare the way along with diaries and memoirs for the rich blossoming of fiction during the seventeenth century.

The art of letter writing in the 18th century assumed an interesting form. It produced gossipy letters on things in general or political squibs. By means of this light, discursive literature, we have a steady flow of illuminating gossip on the life of the time, highly valuable to the social historian. Lady Mary Wortley Montagu's letters, written to her daughter from Italy, are among her best. Her Turkish Letters dispelled a good deal of ignorance about the Turkish character; Philip Dormer Stanhapse's literary fame rests upon the letters he wrote to his illegitimate son; Horace Walpole distinguished himself more as a letter writer than as a politician. His letters caught exquisitely the affectation and artificialities of his times. William Cowper, Lord Chesterfield, Gilbert White and Thomas Gray are some more famous letter writers of the 18th century. Many eminent novelists, both English and American, were great letter writers too. The letters of Jane Austen, Thomas Hardy, Virginia Woolf, Emily Dickinson, Henry James and many others are considered pieces of literature today. Henry James' letters are so delicately worded that Leon Edel calls them "the greatest glories" of literature.

Though letters comprise non-fictional prose, they lend themselves very usefully to the writing of both fiction as well as poetry. Alexander Pope's philosophic poem "Essay On Man," consisting of four epistles, and his satirical verse-letter Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot are good examples of verse-letters. Letter as a form of expression in fiction was explored by Samuel Richardson in his epistolary novels Clarissa and Pamela. Thereafter, many English fiction writers incorporated letters in their novels to explain a situation or to advance a character. An abundant use of letters has been made by Jane Austen in her novel Pride and Prejudice.

A good public letter is a literary piece of work that explores an issue, idea, impression or interpretation. It has a focused point and has both informative value and aesthetic appeal. Among the eminent Indian letter writers, we have Vivekananda, Swami Sri Aurobindo, Mahatma Gandhi and Jawaharlal Nehru, whose letters not only reveal historical, political and religious thoughts but also provide a commentary on Indian culture and civilization. One such volume of letters is Jawaharlal Nehru's Glimpses of World History from which "The Quest of Man" has been selected for your study in this unit.

25.3 JAWAHARLAL NEHRU : A BIOGRAPHICAL NOTE

Jawaharlal Nehru was born in 1889 in Allahabad to Motilal Nehru, a highly successful lawyer of Kashmiri lineage. Jawaharlal was educated at home by a host of English governesses and private tutors until he was admitted to Harrow, a public school in England, at the age of sixteen. In 1907, he went to Trinity College, Cambridge, and then pursued the study of Law at the Inner Temple, London. He was called to the Bar in 1912. The same year, he returned to India and came close to Mahatma Gandhi who had also returned to India as a lawyer, after fighting for political rights and equality for Indians in South Africa. Under Gandhi's magnetic influence, Nehru gave up his western style of living and joined Gandhi in the Civil Disobedience Movement. He remained in the forefront of the Indian Independence Movement for well over three and a half decades and was imprisoned seven times by the British rulers. His rise in Indian politics was meteoric. He was elected Congress President five times and became the first Prime Minister of Independent India, a post he held continuously till his death in 1964.

Nehru was a prolific writer with an enviable command over the English language which he used with the ease and facility of an Englishman. His language became poetic in describing a nature landscape; conversational in his personal letters and jail diaries; forceful, penetrating and occasionally scholastic in his addresses. Some of his major works like The Discovery of India, Glimpses of World History, A Bunch of the Old Letters, and An Autobiography are as thought-provoking in terms of their content as they are charming in their style.

25.4 AN INTRODUCTION TO 'THE QUEST OF MAN'

Jawaharlal Nehru:
Letter to Indira
Gandhi – 'The Quest of Man'

Nehru frequently interacted with his daughter, Indira Priyadarshini, through letters especially when he was serving a prison sentence during the British rule in India. The first set of letters were written in the summer of 1928, when the ten-year-old Indira was in the Himalayan hill station of Mussoorie and Nehru was in the plains. These were published in book form in 1929, with the title Letters From a Father to his Daughter, subtitled "Being a brief account of the early days of the world written for children." Nehru points out in his preface to the original edition of Glimpses of World History. These early letters were subsequently published in book form and they had a generous reception. The idea of continuing them hovered in my mind. "The result was Glimpses of World History published in two volumes, 1934-1935, with the subtitle "Being further letters to his daughter written in prison, and containing a rambling account of history for young people". All the 196 letters here, and his book The Discovery of India, were written in prison. The first such letter he wrote her was from the Central Prison in Naini, in 1930. The letter you are about to read was written two years later, in 1932, from Dehra Dun jail.

While in prison, cut off from active life and from his beloved daughter, Nehru decided to make use of the available time to write a brief and simple account of the history of the world. Nehru himself admits that he is not a historian but has attempted to put together facts and ideas he had culled from books. Very often, the facts of history are overrun by his own ideas and philosophic thinking.

"The Quest of Man", the fifty-sixth in the series of letters in Glimpses of World History and the first that he wrote from the district jail of Dehra Dun, takes us back to the origins of human civilization that had been preceded by the Earth's story for many thousands of years. The distinctive feature of human civilization is that it owes its existence and perpetuation to the genius of the human mind. It is the eternal curiosity of the human mind to find out and learn more and more about the world that started man on this quest. In this letter, Nehru goes beyond historical dates and facts to focus on man's innate quest to know and understand the world around him.

25.4.1 Text

JAWAHARLAL NEHRU : 'THE QUEST OF MAN'

June 10, 1932

Four days ago I wrote to you from Bareilly Gaol. That very evening I was told to gather up my belongings and to march out of the prison – not to be discharged, but to be transferred to another prison. So I bade good-bye to my companions of the barrack, where I had lived for just four months, and I had a last look at the great twenty-four-foot wall under whose sheltering care I had sat for so long, and I marched out to see the outside world again for a while. There were two of us being transferred. They would not take us to Bareilly station lest people might see us, for we have become pardahnashins, and may not be seen! Fifty miles out they drove us by car to a little station in the wilderness. I felt thankful for this drive. It was delightful to feel the cool night air and to see the phantom trees and men and animals rush by in the semi-darkness, after many months of seclusion.

We were brought to Dehra Dun. Early in the morning we were again taken out of our train, before we had reached the end of our journey, and taken by car, lest prying eyes should see us.

And so here I sit in the little gaol of Dehra Dun, and it is better here than at Bareilly. It is not quite so hot, and the temperature does not rise to 112 degrees, as it did in Bareilly. And the walls surrounding us are lower and the trees that overlook them are greener. In the distance I can even see, over our wall, the top of a palm tree, and the sight delights me and makes me think of Ceylon and Malabar. Beyond the trees there lie the mountains, not many miles away, and, perched up on top of them, sits Mussoorie. I cannot see the mountains, for the trees hide them, but it is good to be near them and to imagine at night the lights of Mussoorie twinkling in the far distance.

Four years ago – or is it three? – I began writing these series of letters to you when you were at Mussoorie. What a lot has happened during these three or four years, and how you have grown! With fits and starts and after long gaps I have continued these letters, mostly from prison. But the more I write the less I like what I write; and a fear comes upon me that these letters may not interest you much, and may even become a burden for you. Why, then, should I continue to write them?

I should have liked to place vivid images of the past before you, one after another, to make you sense how this world of ours has changed, step by step, and developed and progressed, and sometimes apparently gone back; to make you see something of the old civilizations and how they have risen like the tide and then subsided; to make you realize how the river of history has run on from age to age, continuously, interminably, with its eddies and whirlpools and backwaters, and still rushes on to an unknown sea. I should have liked to take you on man's trail and follow it up from the early beginnings, when he was hardly a man, to to-day, when he prides himself so much, rather vainly and foolishly, on his great civilization. We did begin that way, you will remember, in the Mussoorie days, when we talked of the discovery of fire and of agriculture, and the settling down in towns, and the division of labour. But the farther we have advanced, the more we have got mixed up with empires and the like, and often we have lost sight of that trail. We have just skimmed over the surface of history. I have placed the skeleton of old happenings before you and I have wished that I had the power to cover it with flesh and blood, to make it living and vital for you.

But I am afraid I have not got that power, and you must rely upon your imagination to work the miracle. Why, then, should I write, when you can read about past history in many good books? Yet, through my doubts I have continued writing, and I suppose I shall still continue. I remember the promise I made to you, and I shall try to fulfil it. But more even than this is the joy that the thought of you gives me when I sit down to write and imagine that you are by me and we are talking to each other.

Of man's trail I have written above, since he emerged stumbling and slouching from the jungle. It has been a long trail of many thousands of years. And yet how short a time it is if you compare it to the earth's story and the ages and aeons to time before man came! But for us man is naturally more interesting than all the great animals that existed before him; he is interesting because he brought a new thing with him which the others do not seem to have had. This was mind – curiosity – the desire to find out and learn. So from the earliest days began man’s quest. Observe a little baby, how it looks at the new and wonderful world about it; how it begins to recognize things and people; how it learns. Look at a little girl; if she is a healthy and wide-awake person she will ask so many questions about so many things. Even so, in the morning of history when man was young and the world was new and wonderful, and rather fearsome to him, he must have looked and stared all around him, and asked questions. Who was he to ask except himself? There was no one else to answer. But he had a wonderful little thing – a mind – and with the help of this, slowly and painfully, he went on storing his experiences and learning from them. So from the earliest times until to-day man’s quest has gone on, and he has found out many things, but many still remain, and as he advances on his trail, he discovers vast new tracts stretching out before him, which show to him how far he is still from the end of his quest – if there is such an end.

What has been this quest of man, and whither does he journey? For thousands of years men have tried to answer these questions. Religion and philosophy and science have all considered them, and given many answers. I shall not trouble you with these answers, for the sufficient reason that I do not know most of them. But, in the main, religion has attempted to give a complete and dogmatic answer, and has often cared little for the mind, but has sought to enforce obedience to its decisions in various ways. Science gives a doubting and hesitating reply, for it is of the nature of science not to dogmatize, but to experiment and reason and rely on the mind of man. I need hardly tell you that my preferences are all for science and the methods of science.

We may not be able to answer these questions about man’s quest with any assurance, but we can see that the quest itself has taken two lines. Man has looked outside himself as well as inside; he has tried to understand Nature, and he has also tried to understand himself. The quest is really one and the same, for man is part of Nature. “Know thyself”, said the old philosophers of India and Greece; and the Upanishads contain the record of the ceaseless and rather wonderful strivings after this knowledge by the old Aryan Indians. The other knowledge of Nature has been the special province of science, and our modern world is witness to the great progress made therein. Science, indeed, is spreading out its wings even farther now, and taking charge of both lines of this quest and co-ordinating them. It is looking up with confidence to the most distant stars, and it tells us also of the wonderful little things in continuous motion – the electrons and protons – of which all matter consists.

The mind of man has carried man a long way in his voyage of discovery. As he has learnt to understand Nature more he has utilized it and harnessed it to his own advantage, and thus he has won more power. But unhappily he has not always known how to use this new power, and he has often misused it. Science itself has been used by him chiefly to supply him with terrible weapons to kill his brother and destroy the very civilization that he has built up with so much labour.

protons:	tiny pieces of matter with a positive electric charge present in all atoms.
utilize:	to use for a practical purpose.
harness:	to control and use the force or strength of something to produce power or to achieve something.

25.5 THEME

The subject matter of this letter is philosophical but it has been rendered in a simple and elegant style. The writer makes it easy for the reader (here he had a fourteen-year-old girl in mind) to understand a serious subject matter relating to human quest for knowledge. The paragraphs are linked to make the letter read like a story about human civilization.

Answer the following questions in your own words, in the space provided for the purpose, to comprehend the subject matter of the letter. Read the answers given by us only after you have written yours.

- 1) Summarise paragraphs 1-3

Paragraphs 1 to 3 describe the author's current place of imprisonment and the sense of joy he experiences on being close to the mountains and the greenery surrounding his prison. There is no bitterness on being confined to a solitary stay in a prison. On the contrary, the writer has the rare ability to find joy even in the cool night air and trees and mountains that he can view at a far off distance.

- 2) Is the author sceptical about the worth of his writings? Give a reasoned answer.

Paragraph 4 expresses the author's scepticism as to the worth and value of his writings. It is however, our good fortune that despite his scepticism he continued to write these letters that are a delight to read even today, after a long gap of over seventy years.

In paragraphs 5 and 6 the writer attempts to recreate the history of the world from pre-historic times to modern days. Nehru says that he started with the narration about discovery of fire and agriculture and extended his writings to cover facts of history about empires and different civilizations. He wonders whether midway he had lost sight of the biggest human challenge that sought to unravel the mystery of the universe. He has written about civilisations that have come and gone, but somewhere along the line he had missed to delve upon the human quest to understand the world that man journeys through.

Paragraph 7 traces the journey of man in his long quest to know about his world. It is his mind which is man's greatest asset that helps him in his quest. Once Nehru starts writing about the quest of man, his scepticism fades away. He feels close to his daughter when he writes, as if they were sitting together and talking.

- 3) What has helped man in his quest to know more about his world?

Paragraphs 8-10 describe the twin approaches to understand the world—through religion and through science. Nehru feels that religion seeks to impose its own views that are based on faith and spiritual beliefs while science seeks answers through experiment and reason. There cannot be any single answer to what man is seeking, as his quest has taken two distinct directions – one to understand himself and the other to understand Nature. Religion looks to the inner nature of man while science to the outer nature. Both are important. But Nehru prefers the scientific approach, because it is rational and open minded, not dogmatic like religion. However, man is misusing science instead of harnessing its power, almost to the point of destroying the very civilization that he has built up.

25.6 PROSE STYLE

This letter has been selected for your study as it shows what makes a letter interesting. As you read the text, you will recognize its direct and simple style that makes you as much an addressee as Indira to whom it was first addressed. As Nehru himself says, he felt the presence of his daughter by his side when he wrote his letters as though they were talking to each other. Likewise, it is as though the reader and the writer are in conversation. The writer seems to engage his reader in direct talk and, therefore, the letter uses the direct form of address. In short, the prose style in all his letters is personal, subjective, conversational and informal. Even though Nehru's letters, to begin with, were personal and meant only for his daughter, they form a well-knit series of world history for every reader to savour.

Check Your Progress-II

- a. From which prison was Nehru transferred to the prison at Dehra Dun?
- b. Pick up a sentence from the letter that shows Nehru's preference for science and its methods.
- c. Mention three features of Nehru's prose style in the letter 'The Quest of Man'.

25.7 LET US SUM UP

In this unit you have:

- learnt something about Jawaharlal Nehru's life and writings;
- analysed one of his letters to his daughter in terms of its background, theme and prose style; and
- picked up some idea about how a letter on a complex topic like the quest of man, can be rendered in a fluent and easy style.

26.0 OBJECTIVES

The objective is to:

- appreciate a travelogue as a literary form;
- distinguish the prose style of a travelogue vis-à-vis other prose forms.

26.1 INTRODUCTION

In the previous four units (22-25), you have seen the distinctive prose styles used in writing an essay either on a serious or a light topic and the characteristic style –direct and informal –used in writing letters. In this unit we have selected the final two chapters from Bill Aitken's travelogue Travels by a Lesser Line.

What is a travelogue? It is a piece of writing about travel; it can also be a book or a film or a radio broadcast on travel. It is written in a style that is both interesting and informative. After reading excerpts from Aitken's travelogue, we will analyse their content and prose style to see what makes his travelogue a visual treat while, at the same time, making it informative and aesthetically pleasing.

26.2 TRAVELOGUES – A HISTORICAL PERSPECTIVE

The passion for knowledge about other countries has always driven men to embark upon land travels and sea-voyages to distant lands, the accounts of which have been left by them for posterity. Hence, the history of travelogues is as old as the history of man's travels. Going far back in time, when the world was not much known, there were travellers like Al-Beruni, Fahien, Hiuen Tsang and others who travelled to lands in the East (Fahien visited India from 399 to 411 B.C. and Hiuen Tasang from 627 to 645 B.C.) and the West and left rich accounts of their travels in books that have since served as important documents about the life, culture and history of the places they visited.

There have been almost as many written accounts of travel down the ages, as there have been travellers. Beginning with Renaissance England, a large number of Elizabethan adventurers, traders, settlers, explorers and even exploiters, influenced by Columbus' voyages in the fifteenth century, set sail to discover new lands. Innumerable narratives of travel, which we now term as travelogues, were printed during the times, of which some popular ones are: Sir Walter Raleigh's Discovery of Guiana, Silvester Jourdain's A Discovery of the Bermudas; Richard Hakluyt's Voyages; and History of Travel by Richard Eden, that traced travels from the earliest times to the sixteenth century. The seventeenth and eighteenth centuries in England saw the advent of diarists, letter-writers, memoir-writers and historians rather than the flourishing of travel writers. The Victorian age, however, saw a spurt in globe-trotting. Sir Richard Francis Burton, George Henry Borrow, Richard Jefferies and Laurence Oliphant were some eminent writers of nineteenth century England who were also extensive travellers. Burton's personal narrative of travel in Arabia, contained in his book Pilgrimage to El Medinah and Mecca (1885-56) exhibits his keen scholarly interest; Borrow's travel experiences with the gipsies, exuding an intimate charm, found expression in his Lavengro (1851); Jefferies' travelogue Wild Life in a Southern Country and Oliphant's Narrative of a Mission to China and Japan (1857-1859) enjoyed immense popularity. The list would be incomplete if mention were not made of David Livingstone's Missionary Travels in South Africa (1857) and R.L. Stevenson's Travels with a Donkey (1879) and his canoe journey in Belgium entitled An Island Voyage (1878), that are still read with relish. Travel accounts are non-fictional prose but, like letters, have found their way into fiction. We have a large number of novelists – both English and American – whose novels are a mix of travel and fiction. For instance, Daniel Defoe's novel Robinson Crusoe (1719) is a fictionalized account of Alexander Selkirk's real-life adventures and travels; Jonathan Swift's Gulliver's Travels (1726-27) is also a pseudo-realistic narrative that follows the voyages of Gulliver; Herman Melville, the great American writer, has given us Omoo (1847), and the popular classic Typee (1846), his very popular Moby-Dick, or, the Whale (1851) that reads more like a travelogue than a novel.

India has always attracted travellers, right from Fahien and Hiuen Tsang, as mentioned earlier, to the nineteenth and early twentieth century British travellers like Moorcraft, Harcourt, Francis young husband and Penelope Chetwood whose travelogues give us rich accounts of their treks across the Himalayas or into the interiors of India. Present day writers like V.S. Naipaul, Bill Aitken and some others have opened up India to the outside world in some of their books. Naipaul, whose Indian grandparents migrated to the West Indies, has recounted his travels to India in An Area of Darkness (1964), and India A Wounded Civilization (1977). Anees Jung's book Unveiling India is an account of travel mixed with interviews of Indian women from different walks of life. Vikram Seth won a literary prize for his travelogue From Heaven Lake (1986) describing his travels from Nanjing to Nepal. Amitav Ghosh whose In an Antique Land (1972) is a mix of novel and travelogue recounting his travel in Egypt, has tried his hand at travel writing in Dancing in Cambodia, At Large in Burma.

Parts of a travelogue selected for your study in this Block come from the pen of Bill Aitken, and describe his travels in India.

26.3 BILL AITKEN: A BIOGRAPHICAL NOTE

Bill Aitken was born in Scotland in 1934; he became a naturalized Indian by choice in 1972. He has written a number of books about India, capturing its Himalayan majesty, its scenic beauty and its spiritual core. He studied Comparative Religion at Leeds University in England and he moved to India in 1959. He lived in Himalayan ashrams for some time and undertook many trips all over India, extending from Nanda Devi, a Himalayan peak in the North to Kanyakumari, the southernmost tip in the South. Most of his excursions were either on an old motorbike or by the steam railway. It was not only the Indian scenic beauty that fascinated him, he was also attracted by the steam engine that helped him cover the whole of India from the North to the South, from the East to the West.

Bill Aitken has several books to his credit. Among them are:

1. Seven Sacred Rivers (1992)
2. Exploring Indian Railways (1994)
3. The Nanda Devi Affair (1994)
4. Divining the Deccan: A Motorbike to the Heart of India(1999)
5. Branch Line to Eternity (2001)
6. Footloose in the Himalaya (2003)
7. Sri Satya Sai Baba—A Life (2004)

Check Your Progress-I

- a. Define a travelogue.
- b. Name a Chinese traveller who came to India.
- c. Mention a biography from Aitken's books listed in 26.3.

These two chapters form the concluding part of Aitken's book Travels by a Lesser Line first published in 1993. These are the three gauges in the Indian Railways: Broad gauge (1.676 metre), metre gauge (1 metre in width) and narrow gauge (where the width of the rail track is 0.762 or 0.610 metre). 'Lesser Line' is a reference to metre gauge and the book describes the travel undertaken by the author along the metre gauge line from Ledo, the easternmost station in Assam to Bhuj, the westernmost station in Gujarat and again from Fazilka in Punjab to Kanyakumari in Tamilnadu. The journey took him through fourteen states and this was his attempt to find an answer to the transport riddle: "Can one travel all the way by one gauge?" If you are aware of India's size and diversity, such a unified single metric route will astonish you. This travel seems to be a railway marathon covering all the four corners of India and ends with his visit to Tiruchendur, the last resort in the south. The author has the gift of perception, a liberal and sympathetic understanding of the cultural divide between the North and the South and a gentle sense of humour that accommodates the idiosyncrasies of different people in different parts of India.

26.4.1 Text

Last Resort in the South

Tiruchendur is a tiny temple town that occupies the coast between Kanyakumari and Rameshwaram. Its white gopuram is almost on the shore. What looks like the giant hour-hand of a clock, affixed in neon lights, is actually the symbol of the lance with which Lord Murugan vanquished a particularly troublesome asura. Unusually this tower has been built to the west of the sprawling temple. Surrounded by the blue sea and waving palms, a more delightful end to one's metre gauge journey from the northern arid zone around Fazilka could not be imagined.

The small station has recently been renovated and is immaculate in appearance and operation. A notice threatens to fine anyone Rs. 16 who enters without a platform ticket, so quickly I buy one to photograph the train about to leave. This is the "732 Tirunelveli Passenger" hailed by a diesel. Though I can jump aboard and return by the "733 Down", the blue of the sea is too inviting and instead I settle for some conversation with the station master, who apparently has been alerted of my coming. When in Delhi, promises of flashed messages to ease my way had seemed a kind gesture by the Railway Information Officer, but to my pleasant surprise the friendliness with which I was met along the way was largely due to the promises kept in Delhi.

To make my day a steam engine lay smoking idly in the siding, waiting to haul the last of the three daily Passengers. For the end of the line, everything was perfect. The station building had been remodelled in the temple style, but tastefully so, and the miniscule reservation office must be the only one in the whole of India where the green discs are permanently on display. In fact you wonder how long this branch line can compete with the faster and similarly priced buses. With Tuticorin less than 40 km away, it is understandable that a famous port town can use a railway link. A friend had advised me to give Tuticorin a miss since it held little of railway or aesthetic interest.

The bus is much more direct than the train for the Rameshwaram-Tiruchendur section, but you pay for the convenience by becoming part of a hectic running battle between North and South. A party of 14 Hindi speakers got on a Rameshwaram-bound bus and from the word go there was bickering between them and the Tamil running staff. There were some rain clouds about and the travellers were worried about their luggage on the roof getting wet. The bus crew could not provide a tarpaulin and this began the acrimony. "If it rains, you can report me", said the conductor helpfully, implying that the clouds would go away – which they did. Next there were complaints of having to spend 25 paise every time the passengers from the free-peeing North went to spend a penny in the bus stations. Another grouse was that the driver was a great gobber, who marked each furlong with the discharge of spit. At speed this meant some of the passengers shared the fall-out.

The wayside halts for refreshments were spotlessly clean but almost blew customers away from their counters with the volume of Tamil rock music belted out. Another source of friction lay in the strict interpretation of 5 minutes by the bus crew. The timeless North assumed it meant anything up to 15. When you consider that most of the long-distance passengers between Rameshwaram and Kanyakumari are pilgrims from the North it means this verbal warfare occurs daily on the Tamil Nadu government buses. So much for the claims of cosy cultural integration that the temple at Rameshwaram puts out.

The resilience of Hindu culture is reflected in the casteless appeal of the six Murugan temples, of which Palani is considered third in importance. Tiruchendur is the second in the list and referred to as "The Abode of Fulfilment" – a very apt description of my feelings at completing the extended and involved metric circuit. It is besieged by busloads of pilgrims who sport on the beach as the rust-coloured breakers add another curious effect of this place with a cave valued for its "medicinal" properties. (Shankaracharya was cured here.) Many are the black-clad, bare-bodied Ayappa pilgrims bound for the Sabarimala temple in the Kerala hills. That too is a casteless attraction and it could well be the orthodox priests, seeing where the pickings are to be had, will decide to throw open their temples. Tiruchendur for all practical purposes seems a spiritual holiday resort. Devotees rent cottages overlooking the sea and though they may not have a whale of a time at least they upstage the much richer tourist clientele at the Hotel Tamil Nadu run by the government which is situated further behind. This hotel only had double rooms for 80 rupees, so I inquired at a new lodge nearby and ended up with a much better deal for 40 rupees, overlooking the temple and the sea. One breathed in the tantalizing realization that the elation one had felt at the start of one's journey on the majestic expanse of the Brahmaputra was echoed exactly in the furthest pounding of the waves at Tiruchendur, though the cultural chasm between the two is enormous. In shrinking the physical poles the metre gauge had performed a kind of alchemical union of opposites. I was tickled to recall at the half-way mark of my probings (near Dwarka) the stout teetotaller proposition that India's ancient propitiatory beer Somras was lugubriously "non-injurious to health," because the outstanding memory of this MG quartering had been my constant intoxication at the sheer wonder India still is. Those who declare India to be "poor" announce only their own poverty of acquaintance. But will they listen to the proving imprint of a lesser track that gave this traveller a unique glimpse of a rare unity; soon to be dismantled.

The Poetic Diction of Steam

Fulfilment is not just the satisfaction of seeing a laborious job through but is also felt in the more subtle relief of having performed a financial tight-rope act and managed to land on one's feet. My metric path veered crazily at times, to take in special likes such as the high ranges of Kerala. Looking back it went like a dream and all the worries about reservations and the elbowing through crowds that travel in the North implies, simply did not arise on the metre gauge in the South. It was leisure all the way. Full marks to the Railways for their unfailing efficiency and close sense of duty. This vast network with its million-and-a-half employees pulls together impressively to keep the economy running and the passengers for most of the time from complaining. When I started out from Ledo in furthest Assam, it was to see if it was possible to cover the whole of India by metre gauge. The answer is yes, provided you believe that journeying is as important as arrival.

That way the journey can teach you more than any university can about the diverse wonders of India so few of our political masters have the width of vision to encompass. Their India is nowhere near so remarkable as the real one which can only be viewed without blinkers. With its astounding array of human types and sublime array of beauty, anyone exposed to the marvel becomes a natural patriot. Whether it's boatmen on the Brahmaputra or toddy-tappers in Telengana, the railway gives you India like nothing else can. It enables you to ride camels in Jaisalmer and catamarans in Tiruchendur. Unlike the politicians who pass through in their helicopter you will know the difference between the two! Add the flavour of the metre gauge and you get the extra magic of the classic age of railway travel – the poetic diction of steam.

26.5 THEME – UNDERSTANDING THE TEXT

After reading the two extracts, ‘Last Resort in the South’ and ‘The Poetic Diction of Steam’, from Aitken’s travelogue Travels By A Lesser Line, you must have noticed the author’s eye for detail, his understanding of the cultural divide between the North and the South, and his fascination for the steam engine. Keeping in mind these three points, answer the following questions before you read the answers provided by us:

- 1) The temple and the railway station have two things in common—beauty and solidity. How does the author picturise the two in his narration?

.....
.....
.....
.....
.....
.....
.....
.....

The railway station has been remodelled in the temple style. The author adds: “tastefully so” which means that the station architecture has an aesthetic appeal similar to that of the temple. Both are situated close to the shore, surrounded by the blue sea and waving palms.

The temple has a giant lance on its tower looking like the hour-hand of a clock. Aitken graphically describes the lance by comparing it to the hour-hand of a huge clock that one normally sees in a railway station. The lance is a symbol of the mighty lance of Lord Murugan that gives it strength and solidity in addition to being radiant because of the neon lights fixed on it.

Imagine the temple, with a white gopuram, on the seashore surrounded by blue waves and green palms and observe the majestic lance shining from the temple tower. The picture is one of beauty and solidity.

- 2) How does Aitken comment upon the cultural divide between the North and the South? Is he severely critical or is he gentle and sympathetic in his observations?

.....
.....
.....

.....
.....
.....
.....

Aitken refers to the verbal bickering between the pilgrims from the North and the Tamil staff running the bus services in the Rameshwaram-Tiruchendur section. This is a good example of the difference in perspectives between the two groups. The travellers from the North do not feel the need to be punctual, while the Tamils are strict on punctuality. The Southern people have a far greater sense of hygiene than those from the North. The charge of 25 paise to use the toilets seems an extravagance to the Northern travellers. The flip side of all this is that the Tamil driver does not mind spitting all through the journey much to the consternation of the travellers inside his bus. The constant anxiety displayed by the travellers with regard to their luggage on the uncovered roof of the bus is made light of by the bus crew causing further bickering between the two.

The author is objective. He writes about both the groups in a light-hearted vein and displays no bias for one or the other. In fact these little foibles are more of a human frailty than serious flaws and they add harmless fun to an otherwise tedious travel narration. Only a writer with sympathetic understanding and gentle compassion can have an eye for such details and this is what makes his book a good read.

3) How does the author express his fascination for the steam engine?

.....
.....
.....
.....
.....
.....
.....

He begins by saying “ To make my day a steam engine lay...”(para 3) Apart from delighting in the architectural beauty of the temple and the station—both in the vicinity of the blue sea – the author says that his day was made richer by the presence of the steam engine in the station. In his concluding chapter “The Poetic Diction of Steam”, he pays a tribute to the steam engine for giving him the ride through fourteen states in a single metre gauge line. It had also been inexpensive in comparison to the fast moving broad gauge express trains whose fares are much higher. In its leisurely pace, with no jostling crowds around, the steam engine chugged its way through different regions of India gave Aitken a glimpse of the vast country. The train travel was almost like a pleasant dream as he could see the beauty of the land, listen to the animated talk of the co-passengers, feel the spiritual quest of the people and sway to the rhythmic motion of the slow moving steam locomotive. The author feels a great sense of repose, almost sublime, similar to repose one experiences in the writing and reading of poetry.

26.6 PROSE STYLE

Bill Aitken writes about the places he had seen when he travelled through the length and breadth of India, using a narrative prose of a rare simplicity and elegance. Every town, every hillside, every stream in different parts of India comes visually alive before our eyes. This is also a splendid use of descriptive prose style. The description is factual and photographic. In the excerpts from his travelogue Travels by a Lesser Line, you must have noticed that he has used a simple prose with no ornamentation. His lucid style and an unpretentious use of language gives a photographic edge to his travel account. It will not be an exaggeration to state that he seems to wield a camera more than a pen in his description of the magnificent temple town of Tiruchendur in the southernmost part of India. When it comes to expressing his love for rail travel, especially on the metre gauge, and with a steam engine, he almost goes into a rhapsody, calling it “the poetic diction of steam” – (rhapsody is an ecstatic or unrestrainedly enthusiastic utterance of feeling).

Aitken’s travel account is also marked by humour of the gentle variety. Without being maliciously critical, he describes the passengers from the North, who grumbled about having to pay 25 paise for using a toilet in the bus stations, as “passengers from the free-peeing North”. He also makes gentle fun of the bus driver from the South calling him “a great gobber, who marked each furlong with the discharge of spit”. These gentle digs relieve the monotony of the otherwise prosaic account of the bus journey to Rameshwaram.

26.7 LET US SUM UP

In this unit, you have studied an excerpt from a travelogue. You would have discovered that:

- travel writing has to be in simple, direct language;
- it has to be informative; correct to the minutest detail, requiring a perceptive eye for detail; and
- Aitken’s photographic description of Tiruchendur, his sympathetic understanding of the cultural difference between people of the North and the South, and his sense of poetic magic in the movement of the steam engine, make the extracts both informative and interesting to the reader.

27.0 OBJECTIVES

After having gone through this unit you will be able to:

- acquaint yourself with the life of Samuel Johnson;
- appreciate Boswell's biographical method;
- appreciate the art of Boswell as a biographer.

27.1 INTRODUCTION

The main intention of this unit is to acquaint you with the biographical techniques of one of the greatest biographers of all times—James Boswell. Boswell was a friend and disciple of Samuel Johnson, one of the greatest men of letters Britain has ever produced. Johnson was also a biographer. Boswell wrote the biography closely following Johnson's ideas on the art and craft of biography.

In the section on Boswell we give you an insight into Boswell's character and his method of writing biographies. This is, of course, with special reference to the Life of Johnson (1791).

In the next section you get some information on Johnson's life and work and his ideas on the art of biography. The pieces of information should help you co-relate the three sections from the Life of Johnson and appreciate them.

In the two major sections on Boswell and Johnson you learn a few things about the art and craft of biography. In the discussion that follows the three passages from the Life we examine the application of some of these techniques.

Lastly we examine the language of the passages you will have read.

27.2 JAMES BOSWELL (1740-95)

Boswell

Son of a Scottish Laird and Judge in Edinburgh, Boswell was trained in the family profession of law. He later became a successful advocate, especially on the criminal side. His main interest, however, was in cultivating the friendship of renowned people and becoming a great writer of English prose.

Among his friends and acquaintances were some of the most well-known people of the age—John Wilkes (1727-97) English radical M.P., journalist and agitator; David Hume (1711-76), the Scottish philosopher; Voltaire (1694-1778), the French philosopher, historian, playwright and poet; Jean Jacques Rousseau (1712-78), the French political philosopher and novelist; Pascal Paoli, the Corsican politician and leader about whom you would read more, later in this Unit; and above all Samuel Johnson. While on his tour of the Continent he tried to meet, (with the help of one Earl Marischal), Frederick the Great (1721-86) of Prussia, but without success.

After having read his Rambler essays and seen his famous dictionary (1755) Boswell was keen to meet Johnson. An opportunity presented itself to him on 16th May, 1763 in the back parlour of the actor and bookseller Thomas Davies. This is how Boswell recorded the event in his Life of Johnson.

Mr. Davies mentioned my name and respectfully introduced me to him. I was much agitated; and recollecting his prejudice against the Scott, of which I had heard much, I said to Davies, 'Don't tell where I come from'— 'From Scotland', cried Davies roguishly. 'Mr. Johnson, (said I) I do indeed come from Scotland, but I cannot help it.'

I am willing to flatter myself that I meant this as light pleasantry to sooth and conciliate him, and not as an humiliating abasement at the expense of my country. But however that might be, this speech was somewhat unlucky; for with that quickness of wit for which he was so remarkable, he seized the expression 'come from Scotland', which I used in the sense of being of that country; and, as if I had said that I had come away from it, or left it, retorted, 'That, Sir, I find, is what a very great many of your countrymen cannot help.' This stroke stunned me a good deal; and when we had sat down, I felt myself not a little embarrassed, and apprehensive of what might come next.

Johnson had defined oats in his Dictionary, as 'A grain, which in England is generally given to horses, but in Scotland supports the people', and gained a notoriety for Scot baiting. Johnson, of course, had no prejudice against the Scots. From the passage quoted above, you get a foretaste of the respect and awe with which Boswell treated Johnson. The former ruthlessly subordinated his own personality to the latter's and reported every blow that he received from his subject without reminding his readers of his own strong points—his manipulation of his subject, his powers of description, narration and analysis.

When Boswell published his first book on Johnson—The Journal of a Tour to the Hebrides, with Samuel Johnson LL.D (1785)—an account of 101 consecutive days' travel in Scotland with the great friend, it was the author's fatuity and the subject's greatness that struck the reading public. When in 1791 The Life of Samuel Johnson LL.D, was published the impression became stronger and Boswell did not receive the acclaim that was his due. On the other hand, to Hannah More who begged him to soften his portrait, he replied 'I will not make my tiger a cat to please anybody.'

In the nineteen-twenties Boswell's private papers were discovered at Malahide Castle near Dublin, and in the thirties in Aberdeenshire in Scotland, which placed him among the greatest diarists of all time. Boswell's writings are now studied with as great an avidity as Johnson's own.

Apart from the two works mentioned above, Boswell's An Account of Corsica, the Journal of a Tour to That Island; and Memoirs of Pascal Paoli were published in 1768. The 70 essays entitled The Hypochondriac were published in the London Magazine between 1777 and 1783. Boswell's letters, private papers and his London Journal were published in the twentieth century.

27.3 SAMUEL JOHNSON (1709-84)

Samuel Johnson has been called the symbol of the genius of England. 'He has become' wrote Sir Walter Raleigh, 'the tutelary genius of the English people. He embodies all that we most admire in ourselves.' What were those qualities of head and heart that Johnson had? Strong common sense, learning, wit, courage, honesty and sympathy. These are some of the qualities that we admire wherever we find them but we find all these together in any one person so rarely.

Johnson was born into a family of average means. His father Michael was a bookseller. He was also a learned man and his philosophical nature rather interfered with his trade and prosperity. His mother, Sarah came from a Birmingham family of Fords who were well-to-do. She was not much educated and she also feared that their economic condition was getting worse. The result was that there was not much peace in the family. Johnson had a younger brother, called Nathaniel. He committed suicide in 1737 and within a few days Johnson too moved to London, in search of a living. There he entered the service of Edward Cave (1691-1754) the printer, and wrote for The Gentleman's Magazine.

Johnson had to give up his studies at Oxford in 1729 for financial reasons. In his search of employment he went, among other places, to Birmingham. There he wrote essays for the Birmingham Journal and translated Jeronymo Lobo's French version of Voyage to Abyssinia into English. Apparently, during his stay at Birmingham, Johnson also met Elizabeth Porter, wife of the draper Harry Porter. After the death of her husband. Johnson married Elizabeth who had a son as old as Johnson himself. She was 20 years older than him. With the help of the dowry she brought, Johnson opened a school at Edial. One of its students, David Garrick, became eminent in the theatre and Johnson's lifelong friend. However, the attempt was unsuccessful and the school had to be closed.

Johnson was a poet (London and The Vanity of Human Wishes are his most famous poems), essayist (the three series Rambler, Adventurer and Idler are well known), novelist (Rasselas, Prince of Abyssinia) playwright (Irene), socio-political pamphleteer and above all a lexicographer and biographer.

One of the works that built Johnson's reputation was his Dictionary of the English Language (1755) in which he defined over 40,000 words, illustrating them with the help of 1,14,000 quotations. These were drawn from books in every branch of knowledge written since the time of Sir Philip Sidney (1563-1626). Nathaniel Bailey had preceded Johnson in the task but Johnson's was so much superior to Bailey's that the latter was soon wiped out of public memory. However, there are many words in the dictionary to which Johnson attached indefensible meanings either in sport or petulance. Some of these were not of this class. 'Pastern' Johnson defined as 'the knee of a horse.' When a lady asked him how he came to do that, he replied with admirable frankness, 'Ignorance, Madam, pure ignorance'. There are some other definitions that are commonly remembered. Lexicographer was defined as 'a harmless drudge' and pension 'a pay given to a state hireling for treason to his country.' These, however, are no specimens of the precision of the definitions of words in the Dictionary.

Apart from the journalism for the Magazine, Johnson wrote many short lives of eminent and not so eminent men. The first one was the Life of Paul Sarp published in 1738 in the Gentleman's Magazine and the last ones were the well-known Lives of the Poets (1779-81). In all he wrote about 70 of them. In Rambler, No. 60 (Oct. 13, 1750) he wrote:

I have often thought that there has rarely passed a life of which a judicious and faithful narrative would not be useful. For, not only every man has, in the mighty mass of the world, great numbers in the same condition with himself, to whom his mistake and miscarriage, escapes and expedients, would be of immediate and apparent use, but there is such an uniformity in the state of man, considered apart from adventitious and separable decorations and disguises, that there is scarce any possibility of good or ill, but is common to human kind.

In short, biographies are more useful to us than other branches of literature because from them we learn about the merits and shortcomings and their effect on the lives of certain people which can be examples for us to imitate or avoid. Johnson preferred autobiographies to biographies because the former could convey the truth better. He thought that biographers should record and collect facts with perseverance and try to arrive at the truth. He encouraged Boswell to keep a diary for the purpose, and it has often been pointed out that Boswell employed Johnson's precepts in the writing of the latter's life.

Now do the following exercise before going any further into the unit.

27.4 BOSWELL'S LIFE OF JOHNSON (1791): TEXT

Below (27.4.1, 27.4.2 and 27.4.3) are three short sections from Boswell's Life of Johnson. Read them, if necessary, with the help of the glossaries given at the end of each section.

27.4.1 Birth and Early Childhood

Samuel Johnson was born at Lichfield, in Staffordshire, on the 18th of September, N.S. 1709; and his initiation into the Christian Church was not delayed; for his baptism is recorded, in the register of St. Mary's parish in that city to have been performed on the day of his birth. His father is there styled Gentleman, a circumstance of which an ignorant panegyrist has praised him for not being proud; when the truth is that the appellation of Gentleman, though now lost in the indiscriminate assumption of Esquire was commonly taken by those who could boast of gentility. His father was Michael Johnson, a native of Derbyshire, of obscure extraction, who settled in Lichfield as a bookseller and stationer. His mother was Sarah Ford, descended of an ancient race of substantial yeomanry in Warwickshire. They were advanced in years when they married, and never had more than two children, both sons; Samuel, their first born, who lived to be the illustrious character whose various excellence I am to endeavour to record, and Nathaniel, who died in his twenty-fifth year.

When he was a child in petticoats and had learnt to read, Mrs. Johnson one morning put the common prayer book into his hands, pointed to the collect for the day, and said, 'Sam, you must get this by heart.' She went upstairs, leaving him to study it. But by the time she had reached the second floor, she heard him following her. 'What's the matter?' said she. 'I can say it,' he replied; and repeated it distinctly, though he could not have read it more than twice.

But there has been another story of his infant precocity generally circulated, and generally believed, the truth of which I am to refute upon his own authority. It is told that, when a child of three years old, he chanced to tread upon a duckling, the eleventh of a brood and killed it; upon which, it is said, he dictated to his mother the following epitaph:

Here lies good master duck,
Whom Samuel Johnson trod on;
If it had liv'd, it had been good luck,
For then we'd had an odd one.

There is surely internal evidence that this little composition combines in it, what no child of three years old could produce, without an extension of its faculties by immediate inspiration; yet Mrs. Lucy Porter, Dr. Johnson's stepdaughter, positively maintained to me, in his presence, that there could be no doubt of the truth of this anecdote, for she had heard it from his mother. So difficult is it to obtain an authentic relation of facts, and such authority may there be for error; for he assured me, that his father made the verses, and wished to pass them for his child's. He added, 'my father was a foolish old man; that is to say, foolish in talking of his children'.

27.4.2 Lord Chesterfield's Neglect

Lord Chesterfield to whom Johnson had paid the high compliment of addressing to his Lordship the Plan of his Dictionary, had behaved to him in such a manner as to excite his contempt and indignation. The world has been for many years amused with a story confidently told and as confidently repeated with additional circumstances, that a sudden disgust was taken by Johnson upon occasion of his having been one day kept long in waiting in his Lordship's antechamber, for which the reason assigned was, that he had company with him, and that at last, when the door opened, out walked Colley Cibber; and that Johnson was so violently provoked when he found for whom he had been so long excluded, that he went away in a passion, and never would return. I remember having mentioned this story to George Lord Lyttelton, who told me, he was very intimate with Lord Chesterfield; and holding it as a well-known truth, defended Lord Chesterfield, by saying that Cibber, who had been introduced familiarly by the back-stairs, had probably not been there above ten minutes. It may seem strange even to entertain a doubt concerning a story so long and so widely current, and thus implicitly adopted, if not sanctioned, by the authority which I have mentioned; but Johnson himself assured me, that there never was any particular incident which produced a quarrel between Lord Chesterfield and him; but that his Lordship's continued neglect was the reason why he resolved to have no connection with him. When the Dictionary was upon the eve of publication, Lord Chesterfield, who, it is said, had flattered himself with expectations that Johnson would dedicate the work to him, attempted, in a courtly manner, to sooth, and insinuate himself with the Sage, conscious, as it should seem, of the cold indifference with which he had treated its learned author; and further attempted to conciliate him, by writing two papers in The World, in recommendation of the work; and it must be confessed, that they contain some studied compliments, so finely turned, that if there had been no previous offence, it is probable that Johnson would have been highly delighted. Praise, in general, was pleasing to him: but by praise from a man of rank and elegant accomplishments, he was peculiar gratified.

Johnson, who thought that all was false and hollow; ... despised the honeyed words, and was even indignant that Lord Chesterfield should, for a moment, imagine that he could be the dupe of such an artifice. His expression to me concerning Lord Chesterfield, upon this occasion, was, 'Sir, after making great professions, he had, for many years, taken no notice of me; but when my Dictionary was coming out, he fell a scribbling in The World about it. Upon which, I wrote him a letter expressed in civil terms, but such as might show him that I did not mind what he said or wrote, and that I had done with him.'

This is that celebrated letter of which so much has been said, and about which curiosity has been so long excited, without being gratified. I for many years solicited Johnson to favour me with a copy of it, that so excellent a composition might not be lost to posterity. He delayed from time to time to give it me; till at last in 1781, when we were on a visit at Mr. Dilly's at Southill in Bedfordshire, he was pleased to dictate it to me from memory. He afterwards found among his papers a copy of it, which he had dictated to Mr. Baretti, with its title and corrections, in his own handwriting. This he gave to Mr. Langton; adding that if it were to come into print, he wished it to be from that copy. By Mr. Lington's kindness, I am enabled to enrich my work with a perfect transcript of what the world has so eagerly desired to see.

'To the Right Honourable the Earl of Chesterfield

February 7, 1755

'My Lord,

'I have been lately informed, by the proprietor of The World, that two papers, in which my Dictionary is recommended to the public, were written by your Lordship. To be so distinguished, is an honour, which being very little accustomed to favours from the great, I know not well how to receive, or in what terms to acknowledge.

'When upon some slight encouragement, I first visited your Lordship, I was overpowered, like the rest of mankind, by the enchantment of your address; and could not forbear to wish that I might boast myself Le vainqueur du vainqueur de la terre;—that I might obtain that regard for which I saw the world contending; but I found my attendance so little encouraged, that neither pride nor modesty would suffer me to continue it. When I had once addressed your Lordship in public, I had exhausted all the art of pleasing which a retired and uncourtly scholar can possess. I had done all that I could; and no man is well pleased to have his all neglected, be it ever so little.

'Seven years, my Lord, have now passed, since I waited in your outward rooms, or was repulsed from your door; during which time I have been pushing on my work through difficulties, of which it is useless to complain, and have brought it at last, to the verge of publication, without one act of assistance, one word of encouragement, or one smile of favour. Such treatment I did not except, for I never had a Patron before.

'The shepherd in Virgil grew at last acquainted with Love, and found him a native of the rocks.

'Is not a Patron, my Lord, one who looks with unconcern on a man struggling for life in the water, and, when he has reached ground, encumbers him with help? The notice which you have been pleased to take of my labours, had it been early, had been kind; but it has been delayed till I am indifferent, and cannot enjoy it; till I am solitary, and cannot impart it; till I am known, and do not want it. I hope it is no very cynical asperity not to confess obligations where no benefit has been received, or to be unwilling that the Public should consider me as owing that to a Patron, which Providence has enabled me to do for myself.

'Having carried on my work thus far with so little obligation to any favourer of learning, I shall not be disappointed though I should conclude it, if less be possible, with less; for I have been long wakened from that dream of hope, in which I once boasted myself with so much exultation, my Lord, your Lordship's most humble, most obedient servant.

'Sam Johnson'

'While this was the talk of the town,' (says Dr. Adams, in a letter to me) 'I happened to visit Dr. Warburton, who finding that I was acquainted with Johnson, desired me earnestly to carry his compliments to him, and to tell him, that he honoured him for his manly behaviour in rejecting the treatment he had received from him, with a proper spirit. Johnson was visibly pleased with this compliment, for he had always a high opinion of Warburton. Indeed, the force of mind which appeared in this letter, was congenial with that which Warburton himself amply possessed.'

Glossary II

- Lord Chesterfield: Philip Dormer Stanhope, fourth earl of Chesterfield (1694-1773), a statesman and diplomat, English ambassador at the Hague 1728-32. He is best known for his letters to his son, Philip Stanhope (1732-1768), published by the son's widow in 1774. These letters consisting of instructions in etiquette were considered a handbook of good manners.
- Colley Cibber (1617-1757): a minor comic playwright and critic.
- George Lord Lyttelton: a prominent politician, and an opponent of Robert Walpole and a liberal patron of literature.
(1709-73)
- backstairs: private stairs at the back or side of a house, generally used by servants.
- insinuate: to suggest (something unpleasant) by one's behaviour, or questions or comments.
- The World: the title of a periodical (January 1753—December 1756) edited by Edward Moore.
- studied: carefully thought or considered especially before being expressed.
- finely: closely and delicately.
- gratified: to give pleasure and satisfaction to (often used in the passive)
- dupe: noun—a person who is tricked or deceived (by someone else) verb—to trick or deceive.

solicited:	asked for money, help, a favour, etc. from a person.
Mr Dilly:	John Dilly (1731-1806), brother of Edward and Charles Dilly, booksellers who published Boswell's An Account of Corsica . Johnson paid a visit to John Dilly in company with Boswell and Charles Dilly in June 1781
Mr Baretti:	Guiseppe Baretti (1719-89), an Italian teacher introduced to Johnson by one of his students called Charlotte Lennox, actress and playwright
Mr Langton:	Bennet Langton (1737-1801), a valued friend of Johnson, who read the Rambler essays and on their conclusion came to see him in London. Langton came from an ancient and noble family and his pedigree had been traced to Cardinal Stephen Langton in the reign of King John (1167-1216). Johnson admired him.
transcript :	something transcribed, a written or printed record.
Le vainqueur du vainqueur de la terre:	The conqueror of the conqueror of the earth: Boileau, L' Art Poetique iii 272.
contending:	to compete as in a race or against difficulties.
repulsed:	to refuse coldly; push away (a friendly person).
Virgil:	(70-19 B.C.) the greatest Roman poet, best known for his epic the Aeniad (about 30 B.C., unfinished at his death). His Eclogues (pastoral poems) influenced everyone who could read Latin.
Providence:	God and his wise care and direction of the affairs of living creatures, fate as a kindly influence.
Warburton:	Dr. William Warburton (1698-1779), rose to be bishop of Gloucester in 1759. His edition of Shakespeare in eight volumes brought out in 1747, was criticized as unscholarly. He was Pope's literary executor, and published an edition of his works in 1751. He admired Dr. Johnson, who remained grateful for his early praise of his essay on Macbeth (1747): Johnson said, "He praised me at a time when praise was of value to me."

On the evening of October 10, I presented Dr. Johnson to General Paoli. I had greatly wished that two men, for whom I had the highest esteem, should meet. They met with a manly ease, mutually conscious of their own abilities, and of the abilities of each other. The General spoke Italian, and Dr. Johnson English, and understood one another very well, with a little aid of interpretation from me, in which I compared myself to an isthmus which joins two great continents. Upon Johnson's approach, the General said, 'From what I have read of your works, Sir, and from what Mr. Boswell has told me of you, I have long held you in great veneration.' The General talked of languages being formed on the particular notions and manners of a people, without knowing which, we cannot know the language. We may know the direct signification of single words; but by these no beauty of expression, no sally of genius, no wit is conveyed to the mind. All this must be by allusion to other ideas. 'Sir (said Johnson) you talk of language, as if you had never done any thing else but study it, instead of governing a nation.' The General said, 'Questo e un troppo gran complimento; 'this is too great a compliment. 'I should have thought so, Sir, if I had not heard you talk.' The General asked him, what he thought of the spirit of infidelity which was so prevalent.

JOHNSON. 'Sir, this gloom of infidelity, I hope, is only a transient cloud passing through the hemisphere, which will soon be dissipated, and the sun break forth with his usual splendour.'

'You think then, (said the General) that they will change their principles like their clothes.'

JOHNSON. 'Why, Sir, if they bestow no more thought on principles than on dress, it must be so.' The General said, that a great part of the fashionable infidelity was owing to a desire of showing courage. Men who have no opportunities of showing it as to things in this life, take death and futurity as objects on which to display it.'

JOHNSON. 'That is mighty foolish affectation. Fear is one of the passions of human nature, of which it is impossible to divest it. You remember that the Emperour Charles V, when he read upon the tomb-stone of a Spanish nobleman. "Here lies one who never knew fear," wittily said, "Then he never snuffed a candle with his fingers."

Dr. Johnson went home with me, and drank tea till late in the night. He said, 'General Paoli had the loftiest port of any man he had ever seen.' He denied military men were always the best bred men. 'Perfect good breeding' he observed, 'consists in having no particular mark of any profession, but a general elegance of manners; whereas, in a military man, you can commonly distinguish the brand of soldiers, I'homme d'epée.'

Dr. Johnson shunned to-night any discussion of the perplexed question of fate and free will, which I attempted to agitate. 'Sir (said he) we know our will is free, and there's an end on't.'

Glossary III

Pascal Paoli: (1725-1807) was a Corsican democratic leader in exile in England. His father had been one of the leaders of the Corsicans in their revolt against Genoa in 1734. Paoli himself was chosen by the Corsicans as their General-in-Chief in 1755. In 1769 the island was conquered by the French and Paoli escaped in an English ship and arrived in England on 20 September. Paoli returned to Corsica in 1789. This was in response to Mirabeau's recall of the Corsican patriots, in the National Assembly of France, Paoli was appointed Lieutenant General and military commandant in Corsica by Louis XVI.

In Walpole's Memoirs of the Reign of George III we see Paoli in a rather unfavourable light. Walpole wrote, Paoli's character had been so advantageously exaggerated by Mr. Boswell's enthusiastic and entertaining account of him, that the opposition were ready to incorporate him in the list of popular tribunes. The Court artfully intercepted the project; and deeming patriots of all nations equally corruptible, bestowed a pension of $1000 a year on the unheroic fugitive.

This is a rather unflattering picture of Paoli and also, to some extent, Boswell who had dedicated An Account of Corsica to him. Boswell later introduced Johnson to Paoli. You have read the account of the meeting.

- isthmus: a narrow area of land with sea on each side, joined to a large land mass at both ends.
- signification: the intended meaning of a word.
- infidelity: (an example or act of) disloyalty, unfaithfulness.
- Emperour Charles V: (1500-1558) Holy Roman Emperor (1519-56) and king of Spain (as Charles I, 1516-56) who abdicated in September 1556 and joined the monastery of Yuste in Spain in February 1557.
- port: The manner in which one bears oneself; external deportment; carriage, bearing .
- L'homme d'epée: the man of the sword.

27.5 BIOGRAPHICAL TECHNIQUES

Let's now examine some of the biographical techniques employed by Boswell in the three sections you have read from his Life of Johnson.

27.5.1 Birth and Early Childhood

Notice Boswell's narration of the family background of Johnson. Johnson's father, Boswell carefully establishes, was not well-to-do or belong to a well-known family. The title of Gentleman, Boswell tells his readers, was 'taken by those who could not boast of gentility'. His mother, on the other hand came from a well-known family of small landowners. Boswell, no matter how appreciative of Johnson, was a biographer, who wished to enable his readers to see the man described and discussed in the life, and not a panegyrist. He was in a way, following Johnson's precept. 'He that narrates,' wrote Johnson in Idler No. 84, 'the life of another.....shows his favourite at a distance, decorated and magnified like the ancient actors in their tragic dress and endeavours to hide the man that he may produce a hero!' Boswell tried to project the man. Notice also the emphasis on 'never' in the first paragraph. It gives us a hint of the amount of research and interviews Boswell conducted in order to arrive at definite facts on the life of Johnson. In the second and third paragraphs Boswell tried to establish the precise nature of Johnson's precocity (prematurely developed in some faculty).

27.5.2 Lord Chesterfield's Neglect

Notice once again the pains Boswell takes to discover the true story about Johnson's break with Chesterfield. He tells us about the testimony of Lord Lyttelton, that palliates the act of Chesterfield to some extent. He narrates the manner in which he got a copy of the letter Johnson wrote to Chesterfield and having given the letter he tells us what one of his eminent contemporaries William Warburton thought about Johnson.

Boswell's biography is interesting and useful not only because he tries to tell us the true story objectively but also because he draws inferences from the events described. You will recall that in 'Birth and Early Childhood' Boswell said that he would endeavour to record the 'various excellences' of Johnson's character. It is this effort to record the qualities of the man and of course his shortcomings that is of central importance to us. Incidents and events only go to show the man that Johnson was. Can you now point out Boswell's observations on Johnson's character in the second section from the Life in this unit? Read the last sentence of the first paragraph. Can you relate it to the information you gained in the previous section on Johnson's birth and childhood?

Finally we may point out that there is a letter of Johnson quoted in full in this section. It is so perfectly worded that it has been committed to memory by many. Historians have pointed out that this letter signals the end of the system of patronage in England. You may like to know that Boswell painstakingly collected all the letters of Johnson he could and incorporated them into his Life. This set the trend in the nineteenth century, of writing the two-volume Life and Letters of so and so. In our own time, when collections of letters are published separately, biographers use letters with discretion.

27.5.3 Johnson and Paoli

One of the strengths of Boswell's Life is his reports of meetings and conversations of Johnson with or about the other eminent people of the age, and many a time also with people not so well known. In the short space of the first paragraph we have Johnson's views on language, infidelity and courage and fear, that he expressed before Paoli. In the last paragraph Johnson discusses good breeding and free will and pre-determination with Boswell. In the west very frequently and sometimes in India as well, religious people wish to know to what extent human beings are free to take moral decisions in their lives, and to what extent they are pre-planned for specific actions and functions by God. Orthodox Christians believe that we are free unlike animals and Johnson holds the same point of view.

Now answer the following questions and discover for yourself how well you have understood the three sections from Boswell's Life.

27.6 ART IN LIFE OF JOHNSON

Biography is often defined as an account of a person's life, and a branch of history. In the previous section, we examined the ways in which Boswell collected and sifted his material on Johnson's life. In Boswell's own time there were at least four others who wrote Johnson's life—Mrs. Piozzi, John Hawkins, William Shaw and Arthur Murphy. Many others have written since then and Johnson is still popular as a subject of biography. C.L. Reade, Joseph Wood Krutch, James L. Clifford and John Wain have written Johnson's life in this century and the need for another life of Johnson is still felt and Donald Greene is writing another one. Notwithstanding this, Boswell's Life is still read and edited, despite its voluminous size. Is it only because of its authentic material? No.

Boswell's Life of Johnson is a piece of art. In spite of the fact that the arrangement of the material is chronological rather than topic-wise, there is a unity of design. This unity is given to the work by Boswell's respect for the penetrating wisdom of the man that Johnson was, his piety, his courage, his wit, his learning, his sympathy for the oppressed, the weak and the poor.

It is often said that Boswell kept notes on Johnson's conversations. This is true but the way he recorded just the essence of a talk and not the chaff of the trivialities that often go on in company makes Boswell's biography so effective. Notice the brevity of Boswell's report of the meeting of Paoli and Johnson. Boswell was there on that occasion. Did he not say anything? He did. But what exactly did he say? That we do not know. Why did Boswell not tell us anything about it? Possibly because he said nothing of value. Possibly because what he said would have told us more about Boswell than about Johnson. Possibly because he wanted to maintain an artistic distance. Hence it is in his selection of material that Boswell employed his artistic talent.

Related to this is the issue of authenticity. If Boswell was trying to make his history interesting did the historical Johnson actually say what Boswell's Johnson says in the Life? Modern scholarship, through its comparison of the accounts of incidents related in the biography with those in the notes or the journals of Boswell and reports of others present on the occasions shows that Johnson was absolutely faithful in reporting the words of different persons. It is in condensation that Boswell exercised his artistic manipulation.

Sir Harold Nicolson has pointed out that Boswell's artistic talent lay in 'projecting his detached photograph with such continuity and speed that the effect produced is that of motion and of life.' There is both narrative speed and descriptive force in Johnson's biography. You do not only follow the narrative or a philosophical discussion you also see Lucy Porter talking to Johnson and Boswell in a homely setting and Johnson and Paoli in a very formal one. You feel the hurt pride of Samuel Johnson as he hits back Chesterfield in his reply to him. You live the tension of October 10, 1769 in Boswell's mind when Paoli paid Johnson a visit. These are made possible by Boswell's peculiar abilities of description and narration, analysis, exposition and intuitive understanding of his subject's mind.

James L. Clifford suggested that Boswell constantly tried to make his expression precise and suggestive of colour and charm. For instance, 'loved and caressed by everybody' of the notes become, 'caressed and loved by all about him', 'remarkably lively and gay and very happy' became 'a gay and frolicsome fellow'. Thus we find that the power of Boswell's Life of Johnson is a result of a variety of talents Boswell possessed—painstaking research, accurate description, honest narration, an imaginative understanding of the subject, and a command over the English language.

27.7 LET US SUM UP

In this unit we have examined Boswell's and Johnson's ideas on the art and craft of biography, and acquainted you with some of the bare facts of Johnson's life in order to enable you to place the three sections from Boswell's Life of Johnson in proper perspective. After you read and understood the three pieces, we discussed Boswell's biographical techniques as employed in the extracts from the Life. Finally we discussed some prominent features of Boswell's biographical art.

27.8 SUGGESTED READING

Lives of the Poets by Samuel Johnson (1779-1781). There are many popular editions of Boswell's Life of Johnson available in the market and also in the libraries. Abridged editions of the Life are also easily available. Two of these are by M.A. Pink (Macmillan: London, 1957) and Irvin Ehrenpreis (Washington Squares Press: New York, 1965). The most easily available collection of criticism is Twentieth Century Interpretations of Boswell's Life of Johnson, edited by J.L. Clifford (Prentice Hall: New Jersey, 1970). - 1) Lucy Porter held on the authority of Johnson's mother that he wrote the epitaph and Boswell heard her say so in Johnson's presence. Nonetheless, Samuel Johnson affirmed that his father Michael wrote it and wanted it to be taken as his son's.
- 2) Samuel Johnson, Lord Lyttelton, Bennet Langton, Dr. Adam and Dr. Warburton.
- 3) It is possible that Paoli thought of language as a topic for discussion because while he spoke Italian and Dr. Johnson English, they understood one another well enough. Hence Paoli may have wondered why they did not talk in the same language; either Italian or English. Moreover, Paoli must have known about Johnson's compilation of the Dictionary (1755).

It was in this context that Paoli thought aloud. To know a language properly involves a knowledge of the customs and traditions, notions and manners of the native speakers of that language. Beauty of expression and creative use of language were based on such a knowledge and not just the meanings of some words. Since they could not speak in one another's language effectively Paoli and Johnson chose to speak in their own languages banking on the other's ability to understand the language of the other person, with the help of Boswell as interpreter.

28.0 OBJECTIVES

After going through this unit you will be able to:

- understand and define autobiography as a form of prose;
- read and comprehend "A Month With Gokhale – I, II, III" from M. K. Gandhi's An Autobiography or The Story of My Experiments with Truth (1927);
- appreciate Gandhis' art and craft of autobiography.

28.1 INTRODUCTION TO AUTOBIOGRAPHY

What is Autobiography?

Autobiography is a branch of biographical literature written in subjective prose. It is always incomplete as it is the story of a person who writes it him/herself. It is usually written at a later stage in life. The events are recollected either in chronological sequence or at random, moving back and forth in time. However, all autobiographies are not written when the author is old. For example, Dom Moraes wrote his autobiography entitled My Son's Father when he was only twenty two!

An autobiography may appear biased which is justified because one person's point of view is being presented. Details of personal experience are made interesting so that regardless of the fame or obscurity of the writer, the reader's attention is engaged and curiosity aroused. Writers talk freely about themselves making frequent use of the first person pronoun. The reader is expected to be sympathetic rather than to sit on judgement. What is important in such a literary form is not a rigid or strictly logical structure, but a spontaneous, easy and flexible movement. Thus we cannot judge autobiography in the same way as we would biography. In a biography, the objectivity of the writer is a major consideration in judging its overall merit.

M.K. Gandhi's : An Autobiography or The Story of My Experiments with Truth

Informal Autobiography

Autobiographies can either be informal or formal. Informal autobiographies may or may not be intended for publication. Letters, diaries and journals fall within this category. Letters of famous men like Byron are an index to their personalities and therefore of great interest to the reader. The young Jewish girl Anne Frank's Diary created such an impact that it has often been staged as well as filmed. You will be reading about it in the next unit. Dorothy Wordsworth's Journals (1897) record her experiences providing us with information about the little-known facts about her more famous brother, the poet Wordsworth. All these books represent a self-conscious form of revelation. But they are not important only for the information that they provide but are also aesthetically pleasing. Memoirs are another form of informal autobiography. Here the emphasis is on the events and experiences remembered rather than on the personality of the person who remembers.

Formal Autobiography

Formal autobiography attempts to reconstruct a life through recollection. The autobiographer has the advantage of first-hand experience of his/her own subject i.e. him/herself. The problem that the author faces is that of striking a balance between sounding too modest or too aggressive. What are the other types of autobiographies? There are religious autobiographies like St. Augustine's Confessions (circa AD 397 to AD 401) and intellectual ones such as J.S. Mill's Autobiography (1873). (Mill's autobiography was published posthumously). Fictionalized autobiographies like James Joyce's Portrait of an Artist as a Young Man (1916) transpose the actual experiences of the author onto a fictional plane and as such do not come under the category of non-fictional prose.

Autobiography and Memoir

An autobiography is distinct from a memoir. As Roy Pascal put it. 'In the autobiography, proper attention is focused on the self, in the memoir or reminiscence on others' (Design and Truth in Autobiography RKP, 1960, p. 5). These two forms may be found in the same book or even the same page. But the difference lies in the focus. In an autobiography the emphasis is always on the self. It is clear that the individual does not live outside society. And thus even in an autobiography, it is essential to portray people and places. But in general the interest remains mainly on the self.

Biography and Autobiography: Differences

- 1) In autobiography, childhood is portrayed prominently. On the other hand, in biography the author concentrates on the active period of the individual especially his/her success.
- 2) The biographer places special emphasis on the death of the individual while in an autobiography, needless to say, death does not figure at all.
- 3) Autobiographies often feature the relationship with parents and siblings. Biographies, on the other hand, deal with relationships with friends and colleagues who directly or indirectly contributed to the person's success.

- 4) A biographer has to rely on external evidence. He may have a close relationship with the subject. Or he may reconstruct his/her life by culling evidence from documents, diaries and letters. An autobiographer does not need to rely on such evidence. S/he can take recourse to his/her memory.
- 5) The main difference, as we know, lies in the point of view. In a biography the life is recreated by a third person narrator, who may or may not be objective. In an autobiography, the first person narrator is mainly subjective.

Why do we read Autobiographies?

The reasons for reading autobiography are as manifold as those for reading biography. One reason could be curiosity and the other could be the desire to gain insight into the lives of people like ourselves. Another could be simply delight in the book as a work of art.

Autobiography, as you know is the most personal of literary forms. What are the ways of reading autobiography? One can read it as a historical record or as a work of art. A literary autobiography is read as a work of art. Here one would keep in mind the idea behind the writing. For example, how does the writer perceive his/her own nature and development and how does s/he give form to this perception? To put it simply, how does s/he shape his/her material? Another relevant question at this point would be: how effectively does s/he use language to convey his/her experience to the reader?

An Autobiography or The Story of My Experiments with Truth is the autobiography of Mohandas Karamchand Gandhi (or Mahatma Gandhi) and covers his life from early childhood through to 1920. It was initiated at the instance of Swami Anand, Jeramdas and other close co-workers of Gandhi, in his mother-tongue Gujarati entitled Satyanā Prayogo athvā Ātmakathā published in two volumes – Vol. I in 1927 and Vol. II in 1929. It was translated into English by Mahadev Desai and first appeared serially in Young India before being published in book form.

In this unit you are going to read three short chapters from Part III of Mahatma Gandhi's autobiography, which describe his month long stay with Gokhale in Bengal when he was on a visit to India from South Africa in 1901 in order to plead his cause for improving the condition of Indians settled in South Africa. You must remember that at this time in his life, Gandhi did not have the title of 'Mahatma' nor had he yet conceived of the idea of an independent India or of becoming a national leader in this cause. At the time of which you will read, he was a loyal British subject, a young lawyer in South Africa, who had been struck by the injustice meted out to the Indians there. So you will gain some insight into the making of a great leader and get a glimpse of some of the important people who influenced and shaped his thoughts.

Read the text carefully. You may not know about some of the places and people mentioned but give an uninterrupted first reading. You may consult the glossary later in subsequent readings.

Mohandas Karamchand Gandhi was the youngest son of Karamchand Gandhi and Putlibai. Karamchand Gandhi was the Diwan of Porbandar State for some time, and later became the Diwan of Raikot State. Of his mother, Putlibai, Gandhi once said, "If there is any purity in me, it is all due to my mother."

Born in Porbandar in the present day state of Gujarat in India on October 2, 1869, he studied law at University College, London. In 1891, after having been admitted to the British bar, Gandhi returned to India and attempted to establish a law practice in Bombay, but with little success. Two years later, an Indian firm with interests in South Africa retained him as legal adviser in its office in Durban. Arriving in Durban, Gandhi found himself treated as a member of an inferior race. He threw himself into the struggle for elementary rights for Indians in South Africa.

Gandhi remained in South Africa for twenty years, visiting India twice, in 1896 and 1901. When pleas and petitions failed, Gandhi began to teach a policy of passive resistance to, and non-cooperation with, the South African authorities. He was inspired by the Russian writer Leo Tolstoy and the 19th-century American writer Henry David Thoreau, especially by Thoreau's famous essay "Civil Disobedience." However, Gandhi considered the terms passive resistance and civil disobedience inadequate for his purposes and chose another term, Satyagraha. In Part IV, chapter XXVI of his autobiography, Gandhi relates how the term came into being:

"...I could not for the life of me find out a new name [for passive resistance], and therefore offered a nominal prize through Indian Opinion to the reader who made the best suggestion on the subject. As a result, Maganlal Gandhi coined the word "Satagraha" (Sat=truth, Agraha=firmness) and won the prize. But in order to make it clearer I changed the word to Satyagraha..."

Gandhi returned to India in 1914 and launched his movement of non-violent resistance to Great Britain. In 1920, witnessing a massacre of Indians protesting against the Rowlatt Act at Amritsar by British soldiers, Gandhi proclaimed an organized campaign of non-cooperation. As a consequence, Gandhi was arrested but the British were soon forced to release him.

Economic independence for India, involving the complete boycott of British goods, was made a corollary of Gandhi's Swaraj (which means "self-rule" in Sanskrit) movement. British industries had brought about extreme poverty and the virtual destruction of Indian home industries. As a remedy for such poverty, Gandhi advocated revival of native Indian industries and the production of Khadi was one step in this direction. Gandhi therefore, did not dream of an India free from the British rule but also free from poverty, social injustice and religious evils. Indians revered him as a saint and began to call him Mahatma.

In 1921 the Indian National Congress, the group that spearheaded the movement for nationhood, gave Gandhi complete executive authority, with the right of naming his own successor. The British government again seized and imprisoned him in 1922.

After his release from prison in 1924, Gandhi withdrew from active politics and devoted himself to propagating communal unity. Unavoidably, however, he was again drawn into the vortex of the struggle for independence. In 1930, he proclaimed a new campaign of civil disobedience, calling upon the Indian population to refuse to pay taxes, particularly the tax on salt. This campaign was the famous Dandi march, in which thousands of Indians followed Gandhi from Ahmedabad to the Arabian Sea, where they made salt by evaporating sea water. Once more the Indian leader was arrested, but he was released in 1931, halting the campaign after the British made concessions to his demands. In the same year Gandhi represented the Indian National Congress at a conference in London.

In 1932, Gandhi began new civil-disobedience campaigns against the British. Arrested twice, the Mahatma fasted for long periods several times; these fasts were effective measures against the British, because violence might well have broken out in India if he had died. In September 1932, while in jail, Gandhi undertook a "fast unto death" to improve the status of the Hindu Untouchables. Although he was himself a member of the Vaishya (merchant) caste, Gandhi was a great leader of the movement in India dedicated to the eradication of the injustice of the caste system.

In 1934 Gandhi formally resigned from politics and was replaced as leader of the Congress party by Jawaharlal Nehru. Gandhi travelled through India, teaching ahimsa (non-violence) and demanding eradication of "untouchability." A few years later, in 1939, he again returned to active political life because of the pending federation of Indian principalities with the rest of India. His first act was a fast, designed to force the ruler of the state of Rajkot to modify his autocratic rule. Public unrest caused by the fast was so great that the colonial government intervened and the demands were granted. The Mahatma again became the most important political figure in India.

By 1944 the Indian struggle for independence was in its final stages, the British government having agreed to independence on condition that the two contending nationalist groups, the Muslim League and the Congress party, should resolve their differences. Gandhi stood steadfastly against the partition of India but ultimately had to agree, in the hope that internal peace would be achieved after the Muslim demand for separation had been satisfied. India and Pakistan became separate states when the British granted India its independence in 1947. During the riots that followed the partition of India, Gandhi pleaded with Hindus and Muslims to live together peacefully. On January 13, 1948, he undertook a fast in New Delhi to bring about peace, but on January 30, 12 days after the termination of that fast, as he was on his way to his evening prayer meeting, he was assassinated by Nathuram Godse, a fanatic Hindu.

Gandhi's death was regarded as an international catastrophe. A period of mourning was set aside in the United Nations General Assembly, and condolences to India were expressed by all countries. The teachings of Gandhi came to inspire nonviolent movements elsewhere, notably in the U.S. under the civil rights leader Martin Luther King, Jr. and in South Africa under Nelson Mandela.

Gandhi was not just a lawyer, a politician or even a social reformer; he was a man who thought hard about life and humanity and eventually gave a whole new philosophy of life and governance. He did not claim either this philosophy or himself to be perfect; as the title of his autobiography states clearly, he saw his life as a series of experiments. You will now take a closer look at his quest, his search for the true path by reading the following extract from his autobiography. An Autobiography or The Story of My Experiments with Truth. Part III, Chapters 17, 18 and 19. (Trans. Mahadev Desai. Ahmedabad: Navjivan Publishing House, 2005. pp. 213-220).

28.3 TEXT: "A MONTH WITH GOKHALE"

28.3.1 Chapter 17

A MONTH WITH GOKHALE-I

From the very first day of my stay with him Gokhale made me feel completely at home. He treated me as though I were his younger brother, he acquainted himself with all my requirements and arranged to see that I got all I needed. Fortunately my wants were few, and as I had cultivated the habit of self-help, I needed very little personal attendance. He was deeply impressed with my habit of fending for myself, my personal cleanliness, perseverance and regularity, and would often overwhelm me with praise.

He seemed to keep nothing private from me. He would introduce me to all the important people that called on him. Of these the one who stands foremost in my memory is Dr. (now Sir) P. C. Ray. He lived practically next door and was a very frequent visitor.

This is how he introduced Dr. Ray : "This is Prof. Ray who having a monthly salary of Rs. 800, keeps just Rs. 40 for himself and devotes the balance to public purposes. He is not, and does not want to get married."

I see little difference between Dr. Ray as he is today and as he used to be then. His dress used to be nearly as simple as it is, with this difference of course that whereas it is khadi now, it used to be Indian mill-cloth in those days. I felt I could never hear too much of the talks between Gokhale and Dr. Ray, as they all pertained to public good or were of educative value. At times they were painful too, containing, as they did, strictures on public men. As a result, some of those whom I had regarded as stalwart fighters began to look quite puny.

To see Gokhale at work was as much a joy as an education. He never wasted a minute. His private relations and friendships were all for public good. All his talks had reference only to the good of the country and were absolutely free from any trace of untruth or insincerity. India's poverty and subjection were matters of constant and intense concern to him. Various people sought to interest him in different things. But he gave every one of them the same reply : "You do the thing yourself. Let me do my own work. What I want is freedom for my country. After that is won, we can think of other things. Today that one thing is enough to engage all my time and energy." His reverence for Ranade could be seen every moment. Ranade's authority was final in every matter, and he would cite it at every step. The anniversary of Ranade's death (or birth, I forget which) occurred during my stay with Gokhale, who observed it regularly.

There were with him then, besides myself, his friends Prof. Kathavate and a Sub-Judge. He invited us to take part in the celebrations and in his speech he gave us his reminiscences of Ranade. He compared incidentally Ranade, Telang and Mandlik. He eulogized Telang's charming style and Mandlik's greatness as a reformer. Citing an instance of Mandlik's solicitude for his clients, he told us an anecdote as to how once, having missed his usual train, he engaged a special train so as to be able to attend the court in the interest of his client. But Ranade, he said, towered above them all, as a versatile genius. He was not only a great judge, he was an equally great historian, an economist and a reformer. Although he was a judge, he fearlessly attended the Congress, and everyone had such confidence in his sagacity that they unquestioningly accepted his decisions. Gokhale's joy knew no bounds, as he described these qualities of head and heart which were all combined in his master.

Gokhale used to have a horse-carriage in those days. I did not know the circumstances that had made a horse-carriage a necessity for him, and so I remonstrated with him: "Can't you make use of the tramcar in going about from place to place? Is it derogatory to a leader's dignity?" Slightly pained, he said, "So you also have failed to understand me! I do not use my Council allowances for my own personal comforts. I envy your liberty to go about in tram-cars, but I am sorry I cannot do likewise. When you are the victim of as wide a publicity as I am, it will be difficult, if not impossible, for you to go about in a tramcar. There is no reason to suppose that everything that the leaders do is with a view to personal comfort. I love your simple habits. I live as simply as I can, but some expense is almost inevitable for a man like myself." He thus satisfactorily disposed of one of my complaints, but there was another which he could not dispose of to my satisfaction.

"But you do not even go out for walks," said I. "Is it surprising that you should be always ailing? Should public work leave no time for physical exercise?" "When do you ever find me free to go out for a walk?" he replied.

I had such a great regard for Gokhale that I never strove with him. Though this reply was far from satisfying me, I remained silent. I believed then and I believe even now, that, no matter what amount of work one has, one should always find some time for exercise, just as one does for one's meals. It is my humble opinion that, far from taking away from one's capacity for work, it adds to it.

28.3.2 Chapter 18

A MONTH WITH GOKHALE-II

Whilst living under Gokhale's roof I was far from being a stay at-home. I had told my Christian friends in South Africa that in India I would meet the Christian Indians and acquaint myself with their condition. I had heard of Babu Kalicharan Banerji and held him in high regard. He took a prominent part in the Congress, and I had none of the misgivings about him that I had about the average Christian Indian, who stood aloof from the Congress and isolated himself from Hindus and Mussalmans. I told Gokhale that I was thinking of meeting him. He said: "What is the good of your seeing him? He is a very good man, but I am afraid he will not satisfy you. I know him very well. However, you can certainly meet him if you like." I sought an appointment, which he readily gave me. When I went, I found that his wife was on her death-bed. His house was simple. In the Congress I had seen him in a coat and trousers, but I was glad to find him now wearing a Bengal dhoti and shirt. I liked his simple mode of dress, though I myself then wore a Parsi coat and trousers. Without much ado I presented my difficulties to him. He asked: "Do you believe in the doctrine of original sin?"

"I do," said I. "Well then, Hinduism offers no absolution therefrom, Christianity does," and added: "The wages of sin is death, and the Bible says that the only way of deliverance is surrender unto Jesus." I put forward Bhakti-marga (the path of devotion) of the Bhagavad Gita, but to no avail. I thanked him for his goodness. He failed to satisfy me, but I benefited by the interview. During these days I walked up and down the streets of Calcutta. I went to most places on foot. I met Justice Mitter and Sir Gurudas Banerji, whose help I wanted in my work in South Africa. And about this time I met Raja Sir Pyarimohan Mukarji.

Kalicharan Banerji had spoken to me about the Kali temple, which I was eager to see, especially as I had read about it in books. So I went there one day. Justice Mitter's house was in the some locality, and I therefore went to the temple on the same day that I visited him. On the way I saw a stream of sheep going to be sacrificed to Kali. Rows of beggars lined the lane leading to the temple. There were religious mendicants too, and even in those days I was sternly opposed to giving alms to sturdy beggars. A crowd of them pursued me. One of such men was found seated on a verandah. He stopped me, and accosted me: "Whither are you going, my boy?" I replied to him. He asked my companion and me to sit down, which we did.

I asked him: "Do you regard this sacrifice as religion?"

"Who would regard killing of animals as religion?"

"Then, why don't you preach against it?"

"That's not my business. Our business is to worship God."

"But could you not find any other place in which to worship God?"

"All places are equally good for us. The people are like a flock of sheep, following where leaders lead them. It is no business of us sadhus."

We did not prolong the discussion but passed on to the temple. We were greeted by rivers of blood. I could not bear to stand there. I was exasperated and restless. I have never forgotten that sight.

That very evening I had an invitation to dinner at a party of Bengali friends. There I spoke to a friend about this cruel form of worship. He said: "The sheep don't feel anything. The noise and the drum-beating there deaden all sensation of pain."

I could not swallow this. I told him that, if the sheep had speech, they would tell a different tale. I felt that the cruel custom ought to be stopped. I thought of the story of Buddha, but I also saw that the task was beyond my capacity.

I hold today the same opinion as I held then. To my mind the life of a lamb is no less precious than that of a human being. I should be unwilling to take the life of a lamb for the sake of the human body. I hold that, the more helpless a creature, the more entitled it is to protection by man from the cruelty of man. But he who has not qualified himself for such service is unable to afford to it any protection. I must go through more self-purification and sacrifice, before I can hope to save these lambs from this unholy sacrifice. Today I think I must die pining for this self-purification and sacrifice. It is my constant prayer that there may be born on earth some great spirit, man or woman, fired with divine pity, who will deliver us from this heinous sin, save the lives of the innocent creatures, and purify the temple.

How is it that Bengal with all its knowledge, intelligence, sacrifice, and emotion tolerates this slaughter?

28.3.3 Chapter 19

A MONTH WITH GOKHALE-III

The terrible sacrifice offered to Kali in the name of religion enhanced my desire to know Bengali life. I had read and heard a good deal about the Brahmo Samaj. I knew something about the life of Pratap Chandra Mazumdar. I had attended some of the meetings addressed by him. I secured his Life of Keshav Chandra Sen, read it with great interest, and understood the distinction between Sadharan Brahmo Samaj and Adi Brahmo Samaj. I met Pandit Shivanath Shastri and in company with Prof. Kathavate went to see Maharshi Devendranath Tagore, but as no interviews with him were allowed then, we could not see him. We were, however, invited to a celebration of the Brahmo Samaj held at his place, and there we had the privilege of listening to fine Bengali music. Ever since I have been a lover of Bengali music.

Having seen enough of the Brahmo Samaj, it was impossible to be satisfied without seeing Swami Vivekanand. So with great enthusiasm I went to Belur Math, mostly, or maybe all the way, on foot. I loved the sequestered site of the Math. I was disappointed and sorry to be told that the Swami was at his Calcutta house, lying ill, and could not be seen.

I then ascertained the place of residence of Sister Nivedita, and met her in a Chowringhee mansion. I was taken aback by the splendour that surrounded her, and even in our conversation, there was not much meeting ground. I spoke to Gokhale about this, and he said he did not wonder that there could be no point of contact between me and a volatile person like her. I met her again at Mr. Pestonji Padshah's place. I happened to come in just as she was talking to his old mother, and so I became an interpreter between the two. In spite of my failure to find any agreement with her, I could not but notice and admire her overflowing love for Hinduisim. I came to know of her books later.

I used to divide my day between seeing the leading people in Calcutta regarding the work in South Africa, and visiting and studying the religious and public institutions of the city. I once addressed a meeting, presided over by Dr. Mullick, on the work of the Indian Ambulance Corps in the Boer War. My acquaintance with The Englishman stood me in good stead on this occasion too. Mr. Saunders was ill then but rendered me as much help as in 1896. Gokhale liked this speech of mine, and he was very glad to hear Dr. Ray praising it.

Thus my stay under the roof of Gokhale made my work in Calcutta very easy, brought me into touch with the foremost Bengali families, and was the beginning of my intimate contact with Bengal.

I must needs skip over many a reminiscence of this memorable month. Let me simply mention my flying visit to Burma and the foongis there. I was pained by their lethargy. I saw the golden pagoda. I did not like the innumerable little candles burning in the temple, and the rats running about the sanctum brought to my mind thoughts of Swami Dayanand's experience at Morvi. The freedom and energy of the Burmese women charmed just as the indolence of the men pained me. I also saw, during my brief sojourn, that just as Bombay was not India, Rangoon was not Burma, and that just as we in India have become commission agents of English merchants, even so in Burma have we combined with the English merchants in making the Burmese people our commission agents.

On my return from Burma I took leave of Gokhale. The separation was a wrench, but my work in Bengal, or rather Calcutta, was finished, and I had no occasion to stay any longer.

Before settling down I had thought of making a tour through India travelling third class, and of acquainting myself with the hardships of third-class passengers. I spoke to Gokhale about this. To begin with he ridiculed the idea, but when I explained to him what I hoped to see, he cheerfully approved. I planned to go first to Benares to pay my respects to Mrs. Besant, who was then ill.

It was necessary to equip myself anew for the third-class tour. Gokhale himself gave me a metal tiffin-box and got it filled with sweetballs and puris. I purchased a canvas bag worth twelve annas and a long coat made up of Chhayawool. The bag was to contain this coat, a dhoti, a towel and a shirt. I had a blanket as well to cover myself with and a water jug. Thus equipped I set forth on my travels. Gokhale and Dr. Ray came to the station to see me off. I had asked them both not to trouble to come, but they insisted. "I should not have come if you had gone first class, but now I had to," said Gokhale.

No one stopped Gokhale from going on to the platform. He was in his silk turban, jacket and dhoti. Dr. Ray was in his Bengali dress. He was stopped by the ticket collector, but on Gokhale's telling him that he was his friend, he was admitted.

Thus with their good wishes I started on my journey.

28.4 GLOSSARY

Gokhale: Gopal Krishna Gokhale (1866-1915) was born at Kolhapur in a humble Chitpavan Brahman family. Graduating in arts from the Elphinstone College, Bombay, in 1884, he joined as Professor of history and political economy at the Fergusson College, Poona. Recognizing his services, he was conferred Professor to Order. He was one of the founding social and political leaders during the independence movement against the British Empire in India. Actively identified with the Indian National Congress, he was for some years the joint secretary of the Congress and in 1905, proclaimed its President at the Benares session. A few months before his death, he declined a knighthood. Gokhale was a mentor to Mahatma Gandhi when he returned from South Africa. In 1905 he founded his Servants of India Society which aimed at bringing about social reform. Though his last years were clouded by illness, he was a powerful member of the Indian Public Services Commission 1912-5.

overwhelm: overcome, as with emotions.

Dr. P. C. Ray: Acharya Prafulla Chandra Ray (1861–1942) was a Professor of Chemistry in the University and a scientist of international acclaim. His activities were concerned with all spheres of human interest—educational reform, industrial development, employment generation, poverty alleviation, economic freedom and political advancement of the country. He was a pioneer in social reforms in the country. Ray was a voracious reader of literature, history and biography. He knew half-a-dozen languages. He was knighted (and became Sir P. C. Ray) by the British monarch for his scientific achievements.

Ranade: Rao Bahadur (Justice) Mahadev Govind Ranade (1842–1901) was an energetic social, political and religious reformer. In the political sphere he founded the Poona Sarvajanik Sabha, through which he frequently helped the government with sound advice, and was one of the originators of the Indian National Congress. Ranade became a member of the legislative council of Bombay in 1885, and occupied that position until he was made a justice of the High Court in 1893. He published books on Indian economics and Maratha history. For this service, he was appointed Companion of the Order of the Indian Empire.

Telang: Kashinath Trimbak Telang (1850-1893) was a judge of the Bombay High Court and one of the founders of the Indian National Congress. Along with P.M. Metha, he was the originator of the Bombay Presidency Association. His translation of the Bhagavad Gita into English prose and verse is a standard work. His intimacy with Sanskrit enabled him to study and quote the Hindu law-books with an ease not readily attained by European lawyers and judges. He was nominated to the Bombay legislative council in 1884, but declined a similar position on the Viceroy's council.

Mandlik:	R. N. Mandlik was a member of the Executive Committee, Satyagraha Sabha, Bombay.
solicitude:	anxious concern.
versatile:	talented, having many skills.
sagacity:	ability to make good judgements.
remonstrated:	protested.
derogatory:	below one's dignity/showing a low opinion.
inevitable:	which cannot be avoided or prevented.
ailing:	ill or prone to illness.
strove:	struggle.
doctrine of original sin:	according to Christian tradition, original sin is the general condition of sinfulness (lack of holiness) into which human beings are born because of the Fall. The Fall refers to the first sin, committed when Adam and Eve succumbed to the serpent's temptation.
absolution:	salvation from sin; the condition of being formally forgiven by a Christian priest.
mendicants:	beggars.
sternly:	strictly; in a severe manner.
alms:	money or goods given to the poor as charity.
accosted:	approached and spoken to by someone.
exasperated:	greatly annoyed or impatient.
Brahmo Samaj:	It is a social and religious movement of the nineteenth century, founded by Raja Ram Mohun Roy on 20th August 1828. Brahmo Samaj literally means the society of worshippers of "One True God." "Brahmo" means one who worships Brahman, or the supreme spirit of the universe, and "Samaj" means community of people united together. It promoted belief in one God or monotheism, support for the rights of women, and opposition to such aspects of Hinduism as idolatry and animal sacrifice. The organization attained considerable importance but began to decline after the death of Roy in 1833. It was revived by Devendranath Tagore in 1843 under the name of Calcutta Brahmo Samaj. It got divided in 1866 under the leadership of Keshab Chandra Sen , who formed the Adi (original) Brahmo

Samaj. In 1869, Keshab Chandra Sen chose from amongst his missionaries, four persons and ordained them as *adhyapak*s or professors of four old religions of the world – Gour Govinda Ray for Hinduism, Pratap Chandra Mazumdar for Christianity, Aghore Nath Gupta for Buddhism and Giris Chandra Sen for Islam. Adi Brahmo Samaj itself suffered a split on 15th May 1878 when the Sadharan Brahmo Samaj was formed, led by Ananda Mohan Bose, Shibchandra Deb and Umesh Chandra Datta.

Swami Vivekananda: The pre-monastic name of Vivekananda (1863-1902) was Narendranath Dutta. He was one of the most famous and influential spiritual leaders on the philosophies of Vedanta and Yoga. He was the first known Hindu Swami to go to the West, where he introduced Hinduism, Yoga and Vedanta at the World's Parliament of Religions, in connection with the World Fair in Chicago, in 1893. It was there that he achieved world-wide fame by drawing huge audiences in Chicago and then later elsewhere in America. He was the chief disciple of Ramakrishna Paramahansa and the founder of Ramakrishna Math and Ramakrishna Mission. He died on July 4, 1902 at Belur Math near Kolkata at the young age of 39.

sequestered: providing privacy or seclusion.

Belur Math: located in the bank of the River Hooghly near Calcutta, has the Ramakrishna Temple, as well as many other temples. In 1899, Swami Vivekanand established it as the Mother House for all the monks of the Ramakrishna Order who live in various branch centres of the Ramakrishna Mission in different parts of India and the world.

ascertained: find out or determine with certainty.

Sister Nivedita: Nivedita (1867–1911) was christened Margaret Elizabeth Noble. She was an Anglo-Irish social worker, author, teacher and disciple of Swami Vivekananda, who gave her the name Nivedita (which means one who is dedicated to God) on March 25, 1898. She started a school for girls and worked to improve the lives of Indian women of all castes. Later, she took up the cause of Indian independence. At the time when Gandhiji saw her, Sister Nivedita was the guest of two ladies at the American consulate. She was not, therefore, responsible for “the splendour that surrounded her”.

Chowringhee: Chowringhee Road is a major road in Kolkata. In his book The Changing Face of Kolkata, David William Martin says, “It represents the nearest equation in India to what Piccadilly is to London, Fifth Avenue to New York and the Champs Elysees to Paris. Nostalgic Londoners like to regard their Circus as the centre of the universe. Kolkatans are more reserved in their acclaim, although the fervour they display for their city is perhaps unmatched.”

Indian Ambulance Corps: When the Boer war broke out in 1899, Gandhi organized The Natal Indian Ambulance Corps of 1100 Indian men. Its task was to take the wounded brought by the Natal Volunteer Ambulance Corps from the battlefield and carry them to the railhead.

Boer War: It was fought from 11 October 1899 until 31 May 1902, between the British Empire and the two independent Boer republics of the Orange Free State and the South African Republic (Transvaal Republic). After a protracted hard-fought war, the Boers were defeated, and the two independent republics were absorbed into the British Empire. It is also known as the Anglo-Boer War (among some South Africans) and in Afrikaans (the language of the Boers), as the Anglo-Boereoorlog or Tweede Vryheidsoorlog (“Second War of Independence”). The Boers were descendants of the Dutch colonizers of South Africa.

The Englishman: It was a newspaper began by British merchants in 1821 by the name of John Bull in the East to support the British rule in India. Stocqueler changed its name to “The Englishman.”

Mr. Saunders: Mr. J. O’B.Saunders brought The Englishman after the 1857 first war of independence, and became its editor.

foongis: monks.

lethargy: inactivity; showing an unusual lack of energy.

indolence: inactivity resulting from a dislike of work.

sojourn: a temporary stay.

wrench: painful uprooting or parting.

ridiculed: subject to laughter or ridicule.

Chhaya wool: wool from Chayya, a place in Porbandar State noted for its coarse woollen fabrics.

a lawyer by profession – when a friend argues that the sheep feel no pain in the noise of the drum-beating, Gandhi opposes such an outrageous excuse for cruelty.

“I told him that, if the sheep had speech, they would tell a different tale.”

Notice also that Gandhi feels incapable of stopping this custom and wishes, like the average person, for the birth of some great spirit to save the lives of the innocent sheep. He does not yet think of himself as a leader of the people, or as someone who could lead a revolution. He behaves just like you and me in wishing that someone else should stop the cruelty. However, the difference in his wish lies in the fact that he does not lament his helplessness but wishes to go through self-purification and self-sacrifice in order to become capable of saving others. He knows that before changing the world, you must first change yourself and rid yourself of weaknesses.

It is quite clear from our reading of the text that Gandhi not only had a very deep curiosity for knowledge and the desire to learn, but was willing to go through substantial trouble, criticism and hardship to attain his goals. He decides to travel third class in the trains on his tour of India, not to impress people or to make a political statement, but simply to understand the conditions in which third class passengers travelled and thereby gain knowledge about their hardships so that he could then decide how the situation could be improved, if at all.

In Part IV, Chapter XI of his autobiography, Gandhi comments thus on the writing of his autobiography:

“I understand more clearly today what I read long ago about the inadequacy of all autobiography as history. I know that I do not set down in this story all that I remember. Who can say how much I must give and how much omit in the interests of truth? And what would be the value in a court of law of the inadequate ex parte evidence being tendered by me of certain events in my life? If some busybody were to cross-examine me on the chapters already written, he could probably shed more light on them, and if it were a hostile critic’s cross-examination, he might even flatter himself for having shown up ‘the hollowness of many of my pretensions’.”

Gandhi is here emphasizing the fact that one cannot write down everything in an autobiography. We have just read about a whole month of Gandhi’s stay with Gokhale in a few pages and of course he does not describe every single moment of that stay: “I must needs skip over many a reminiscence of this memorable month.” While we can easily dismiss descriptions of mundane activities like eating or sleeping, he might have casually met many more people and seen more places than the ones he mentions. Here we must understand that an autobiography describes only those aspects of the author’s life that the author believes to be important and worth reading by others. Also, the author might omit embarrassing moments or events which he/she does not wish to disclose to public knowledge. And finally, there might be many things that he/she has simply forgotten although his friends or acquaintances might remember them and judge them to be important. All these omissions can lead us to question the “truth” of an autobiography and Gandhi voices his dilemma of how to select material while writing about his life. He says that he does not wish to distort the truth but he must be selective. He is also aware that he cannot provide “evidence” or proof for some of the things that he is writing. It is here that the role of the reader becomes all-important for it is up to the readers to interpret what they read according to their own judgement and preconceptions.

Gandhi establishes a relationship with his readers by moving back and forth between the past that he is describing in the autobiography and the time when he is actually writing it down. For example, he says:

“I see little difference between Dr. Ray as he is today and as he used to be then.”

“I believed then, and I believe even now, that, no matter what amount of work one has, one should always find some time for exercise...”

“I came to know of her books later.”

In the last sentence, Gandhi is talking about Sister Nivedita. He did not have a very favourable opinion of her from his first meeting but the second meeting made him admire her love for Hinduism and the reader is then told that he later came to know more of her through her books. This movement in time reminds the reader that this is not simply a chronological account of events but by writing this autobiography, the author is engaging in a conversation with the reader about his experiences and how he changed with time.

28.6 LET US SUM UP

The narrative of Gandhi's autobiography is structured by balancing contrasts – of praise and criticism, success and failure, past and present. He presents to the reader both the positive and the negative opinions about the people whom he meets and the customs and beliefs he encounters. He is successful in espousing his cause in South Africa but fails to do anything to stop the cruelty that he loathes in the Kali temple. Similarly, he succeeds in meeting many important people but not Maharshi Devendranath Tagore and Swami Vivekananda. There are two clear times mentioned in the text – the past or the time of which he is writing from memory and the present, i.e., the time at which he is writing the autobiography. There is of course a third time – the time when you are reading his words in the twenty-first century and have the advantage of knowing what was to happen later in his life, a knowledge that he did not share when he was writing in the 1920s.

- 1) An autobiography is a branch of biographical literature. It is the story of the life of a person written in his/her own words. It is usually written at a later stage in life, and events are recollected either in chronological sequence or at random. Autobiographies are either formal or informal. Memoirs and diaries are a kind of informal autobiography.
- 2) A biographer has to rely solely on external evidence, but an autobiography uses memory as a major source. The main difference lies in the point of view. In biography, the life is recreated by a third person narrator who gathers evidence from documents, diaries and letters. In autobiography, the first person narrator is generally subjective. A biographer concentrates on the successful middle class of a person's life, while autobiography childhood is portrayed extensively.

- 1) Gokhale introduced Gandhi to Dr. P. C. Ray by saying that Dr. Ray was a man who devoted nearly all his salary for public work, keeping just Rs. 40 for his own needs. He had decided not to marry.
- 2) Gandhi believed that no matter what amount of work one has, one should always find some time for exercise, just as one does for one's meals. Further, he believed that physical exercise adds to one's capacity for work and keeps the body free from diseases.

- 3) Gandhi's visit to the Kali temple left a deep impression on his mind. He was appalled at the sight of a stream of sheep going to be sacrificed to Kali. He also did not like the line of beggars along the lane that led to the temple among whom were also present able-bodied sadhus and Gandhi was strongly opposed to giving alms to those who could earn their own livelihood by working. He talked to one such sadhu who refused to take the responsibility of stopping the cruelty to the sheep. Inside the temple, he was exasperated at the rivers of blood and it was a sight that he never forgot.
- 4) The people whom Gandhi goes to meet and succeeds in doing so include Dr. P.C. Ray, Babu Kalicharan Banerji, and Sister Nivedita.

- 1) Gandhi's days in Calcutta were spent in seeing important people regarding his work in South Africa, and visiting and studying the religious and public institutions of the city.
- 2) Gandhi's most important impression of Burma was that just as Bombay was not India, Rangoon was not Burma and that the Indians had joined hands with English merchants in Burma in making the Burmese people their commission agents, i.e., Indians were equally responsible for the exploitation of the Burmese. Gandhi was pained by the lethargy of the monks or foongis and did not like the innumerable candles and rats in the golden pagoda. However, he was charmed by the freedom and energy of the Burmese women.
- 3) Gandhi wished to travel third class in order to acquaint himself with the hardships faced by the third class passengers. He was given a metal tiffin-box by Gokhale which he got filled with sweet balls and puris. He purchased a canvas bag worth twelve annas and a long coat made of wool. He also carried a blanket and a water-jug.

29.0 OBJECTIVES

After going through this unit you will be able to:

- comprehend the diary of a thirteen-year-old Jewish girl who lived in Holland under Nazi rule;
- outline the horrors of the Holocaust, the persecution of the Jews, and the trauma of the Second World War; and
- appreciate the art and craft of writing a diary.

29.1 INTRODUCTION: DIARY WRITING AS A LITERARY FORM

A diary, like an autobiography or a memoir, belongs to the autobiographical genre of writing. It is a literary form in which the writer maintains a regularly kept record of his or her own life and thoughts. As a genre it has been practiced for over five hundred years. The name diary is derived from the Latin word 'dies' meaning 'days' which makes clear the 'day to day' nature of the writing. In a diary, to avoid the monotony of a monologue, the writer often invents a fictional addressee, a recipient of the words that are created. The phrase 'Dear Diary', or as Anne Frank's christening of her diary 'Kitty', helps the writer avoid the pain of writing in a vacuum. The diary as a narrative of events in a day by day chronological order, records truthfully the thoughts hopes and emotions of the diarist which are often intensely personal and private. At its purest diary writing is a form of self reflection, a therapeutic mediation of one's life not intended for public eyes. Thus the diaries help individuals, as in the case of Anne Frank, to cope with the stress and trauma in their lives. Yet diaries are also intended for posterity and have future readership in mind. Writers like Jonathan Swift and Samuel Pepys have used the diary form not only to contempt upon the lives, but also as a means of describing and critically analyzing the society, culture and politics of their times.

The diary is also a valuable historical document of an individual life and gives the historian written evidence of the historical, social and political circumstances of a particular period. It helps to enhance our understanding of key periods in history. It is an individual's response to a public calamity and, as is typical of the genre, is an interesting mix of the 'literary' and 'non-literary', the public and private.

The main intention of this unit is to acquaint you with the literary form called the diary using the work of one of the greatest diary writers of all times – Anne Frank.

A diary, like an autobiography or a memoir, belongs to the autobiographical genre of writing. It is a literary form in which the writer maintains a regularly kept record of his or her own life and thoughts. As a genre it has been practised for over five hundred years. The name diary is derived from the Latin word 'dies' meaning 'days' which makes clear the 'day to day' nature of the writing. In a diary, to avoid the monotony of a monologue, the writer often invents a fictional addressee, a recipient of the words that are created. The phrase 'Dear Diary', or Anne Frank's christening of her diary 'Kitty', helps the writer avoid the pain of writing in a vacuum. The diary as a narrative of events in a day by day chronological order, records truthfully the thoughts, hopes and emotions of the diarist which are often intensely personal and private. At its purest, diary writing is a form of self reflection, a therapeutic mediation of one's life not intended for public eyes. Thus the diaries help individuals, as in the case of Anne Frank, to cope with the stress and trauma in their lives. Yet diaries are also intended for posterity and have future readership in mind. Writers like Jonathan Swift and Samuel Pepys have used the diary form not only to comment upon their own lives, but also as a means of describing and critically analyzing the society, culture and politics of their times.

Anne Frank's diary is a clandestine diary written in secret. Thus it is an example of the diary form used for providing an outlet for ideas, words and thoughts that would have been illegal or would have caused a scandal or even death for the writer had it been seized during the time of its writing.

The diary is also a valuable historical document of an individual life and gives the historian written evidence of the social and political circumstances of a particular period. It helps to enhance our understanding of key periods in history. Thus Anne Frank's diary offers us numerous glimpses of the lives of the victims of the Holocaust and gives us valuable insights into the persecution of the Jews during the Second World War. It is an individual's response to a public calamity and, as is typical of the genre, is an interesting mix of the 'literary' and 'non-literary', the public and the private.

During times of great social unrest when public records may have been suppressed, altered or destroyed, the diary can be relied upon to provide a truthful account of the events as is the case with Anne Frank's diary. In chronicling the life of a Jewish family in hiding in Nazi-occupied Holland, it gives us a powerful record of social history that would have remained unknown otherwise.

Anne Frank was a Jewish girl born in Hitler's Nazi Germany. Her diary reveals the trauma and agony of the Holocaust. Her diary, gifted to her on her thirteenth birthday, was named 'Kitty' by her and chronicles the events of her life from June 14, 1942 to August 1, 1944. These two years of her life, spent in hiding with her family in a 'Secret Annexe' in Amsterdam to escape Nazi persecution, also coincides with the height of World War II. Anne Frank died in a concentration camp after their hideout was discovered by the Gestapo in 1944. Friends found her diary in the attic of the hideout and it was published by her father Otto Frank under the title The Diary of a Young Girl (1947).

Anne Frank's diary is a remarkable book, a book that speaks truthfully about one of the most despicable chapters in human history – the Holocaust.

29.2 THE HOLOCAUST

What is a Holocaust?

Holocaust refers to the state-sponsored systematic killing of millions of Jewish people by Nazi Germany and its allies under the rule of Adolf Hitler during World War II (1939 – 45). The Nazis came to power in Germany in 1933 and from the very beginning, their policies were anti-Semitic (founded on hatred of the Jews). Under the Nazi rule the Jewish businesses were boycotted, Jews were dismissed from government services and finally they were also deprived of all citizenship rights. Synagogues were destroyed and Jews began to be hunted down, imprisoned in concentration camps or forced into ghettos. The early years of the World War II saw the victory of Germany and many parts of Europe came under Nazi rule. In all these places the Jews were systematically evacuated and killed or forced into slave labour under inhuman conditions. By the end of the Second World War, when the Allies defeated Germany nearly six million Jews had been killed by the Nazis.

29.3 LIFE OF ANNELIESE MARIE “ANNE” FRANK

Anne Frank

Anne Frank (1929-1945) was born in Germany as the second daughter of Otto Heinrich Frank and Edith Hollander. Her sister's name was Margot Frank. In 1933, when Hitler's Nazi party won the election and Anti-Semitic demonstrations began taking place in Germany, Otto Frank moved with his family to Amsterdam and started business there. In 1940 Germany invaded the Netherlands and Jews began to be persecuted in there too. The early references in Anne's diary depict the changes taking place under the German occupation. When a notice summoning Margot to the Nazi office was issued, Otto Frank and his family decided to move into a hiding place behind the company's premises which was called the "Secret Annexe". On July 6, 1942, the family moved into the secret annexe. The hideout consisted of two small rooms with an adjoining toilet on the first level, a large and smaller room at the second level and an attic. The door to the secret rooms was covered with a bookshelf. Another family consisting of Mr and Mrs Van Daan and their sixteen year old son Peter, joined Anne's family of four. Later a dentist called Albert Dussel was also given shelter. They were supported and looked after by a group of local friends — Koophuis, Miep, Elli and Menk Van Senten. Thus this group of eight people started their life in the cramped quarters of a secret hideout. In the beginning Anne speaks of her pleasure at having people to talk to, but soon tensions develop within the group. Anne's relationship with her mother is much strained but she remains very close to her father. Soon there is a romance between Peter and Anne.

Anne's time is mostly occupied by reading and studying and writing her diary. She constantly dreams of going back to school. The pages of her diary reveal the feelings and beliefs, ambitions and hopes of a young girl. She continued to write with increasing hope and joy, never disheartened by fear or isolation, until the last entry of August 1, 1944.

On August 4, 1944, Anne and her family and friends were captured and sent off for interrogation at the Gestapo headquarters and later on to the concentration camps. Anne Frank died at the Bergen-Belsen concentration camp a few weeks before the British troops liberated it on April 15, 1945. Only Otto Frank survived and when he came across Anne's diary salvaged by his friends, he decided to publish it.

You shall now read a few entries taken from Anne Frank's Diary.

29.4.1 Text

Saturday, 20 June, 1942.

Dear Kitty,

I haven't written for a few days, because I wanted first of all to think about my diary. It's an odd idea for someone like me to keep a diary; not only because I have never done so before, but because it seems to me that neither I – nor for that matter anyone else – will be interested in the unbosomings of a thirteen-year-old school girl. Still, what does that matter? I want to write, but more than that, I want to bring out all kinds of things that lie buried deep in my heart.

There is a saying that “paper is more patient than man”; it came back to me on one of my slightly melancholy days, while I sat chin in hand, feeling too bored and limp even to make up my mind whether to go out or stay at home. Yes, there is no doubt that paper is patient and as I don’t intend to show this cardboard-covered notebook, bearing the proud name of “diary”, to anyone, unless I find a real friend, boy or girl, probably nobody cares. And now I come to the root of the matter, the reason for my starting a diary: it is that I have no such real friend.

Let me put it more clearly, since no one will believe that a girl of thirteen feels herself quite alone in the world, nor is it so. I have darling parents and a sister of sixteen. I know about thirty people whom one might call friends – I have strings of boy friends, anxious to catch a glimpse of me and who, failing that, peep at me through mirrors in class. I have relations, aunts and uncles, who are darlings too, a good home, no – I don’t seem to lack anything. But it’s the same with all my friends, just fun and joking, nothing more. I can never bring myself to talk of anything outside the common round. We don’t seem to be able to get any closer, that is the root of the trouble. Perhaps I lack confidence, but anyway, there it is, a stubborn fact and I don’t seem to be able to do anything about it.

Hence, this diary, in order to enhance in my mind’s eye the picture of a friend for whom I have waited so long, I don’t want to set down a series of bald facts in a diary like most people do, but I want this diary itself to be my friend, and I shall call my friend Kitty. No one will grasp what I’m talking about if I begin my letters to Kitty just out of the blue, so albeit unwillingly, I will start by sketching in brief the story of my life.

My father was thirty-six when he married my mother, who was then twenty-five. My sister Margot was born in 1926 in Frankfort-on-Main, I followed on June 12, 1929, and, as we are Jewish, we emigrated to Holland in 1933, where my father was appointed Managing Director of Travies N.V. This firm is in close relationship with the firm of Kolen & Co. in the same building, of which my father is a Partner.

The rest of our family, however, felt the full impact of Hitler’s anti-Jewish laws, so life was filled with anxiety. In 1938 after the pogroms, my two uncles (my mother’s brothers) escaped to the U.S.A. My old grandmother came to us, she was then seventy-three. After May 1940 good times rapidly fled: first the war, then the capitulation, followed by the arrival of the Germans, which is when the sufferings of us Jews really began. Anti-Jewish decrees followed each other in quick succession. Jews must wear a yellow star, Jews must hand in their bicycles, Jews are banned from trams and are forbidden to drive. Jews are only allowed to do their shopping between three and five o’clock and then only in shops which bear the placard “Jewish shop.” Jews must be indoors by eight o’clock and cannot even sit in their own gardens after that hour. Jews are forbidden to visit theatres, cinemas, and other places of entertainment. Jews may not take part in public sports. Swimming baths, tennis courts, hockey fields, and other sports grounds are all prohibited to them. Jews may not visit Christians. Jews must go to Jewish schools, and many more restrictions of a similar kind.

So we could not do this and were forbidden to do that. But life went on in spite of it all. Jopie used to say to me, "You're scared to do anything, because it may be forbidden." Our freedom was strictly limited. Yet things were still bearable.

Granny died in January 1942; no one will ever know how much she is present in my thoughts and how much I love her still.

In 1934 I went to school at the Montessori Kindergarten and continued there. It was at the end of the school year, I was in form 6B, when I had to say good-bye to Mrs. K. We both wept, it was very sad. In 1941 I went, with my sister Margot, to the Jewish Secondary School, she into the fourth form and I into the first.

So far everything is all right with the four of us and here I come to the present day.

Friday, 9 October, 1942

Dear Kitty,

I've only got dismal and depressing news for you today. Our many Jewish friends are being taken away by the dozen. These people are treated by the Gestapo without a shred of decency, being loaded into cattle trucks and sent to Westerbork, the big Jewish camp in Drente. Westerbork sounds terrible: only one washing cubicle for a hundred people and not nearly enough lavatories. There is no separate accommodation. Men, women, and children all sleep together. One hears of frightful immorality because of this, and a lot of the women, and even girls, who stay there any length of time are expecting babies.

It is impossible to escape; most of the people in the camp are branded as inmates by their shaven heads and many also by their Jewish appearance.

If it is as bad as this in Holland whatever will it be like in the distant and barbarous regions they are sent to? We assume that most of them are murdered. The English radio speaks of their being gassed.

Perhaps that is the quickest way to die. I feel terribly upset. I couldn't tear myself away while Miep told these dreadful stories, and she herself was equally wound up for that matter. Just recently for instance, a poor old crippled Jewess was sitting on her doorstep; she had been told to wait there by the Gestapo, who had gone to fetch a car to take her away. The poor old thing was terrified by the guns that were shooting at English planes overhead, and by the glaring beams of the searchlights. But Miep did not dare take her in; no one would undergo such a risk. The Germans strike without the slightest mercy. Elli too is very quiet: her boy friend has got to go to Germany. She is afraid that the airmen who fly over our homes will drop their bombs, often weighing a million kilos, on Dirk's head. Jokes such as "he's not likely to get a million" and "it only takes one bomb" are in rather bad taste. Dirk is certainly not the only one who has to go: trainloads of boys leave daily. If they stop at a small station en route, sometimes some of them manage to get out unnoticed and escape, perhaps a few manage it. This, however, is not the end of my bad news. Have you ever heard of hostages? That's the latest thing in penalties for sabotage. Can you imagine anything so dreadful?

Prominent citizens - innocent people - are thrown into prison to await their fate. If the saboteur can't be traced the Gestapo simply put about five hostages against the wall. Announcements of their deaths appear in the paper frequently. These outrages are described as "fatal accidents". Nice people, the Germans! To think that I was once one of them too! No, Hitler took away our nationality long ago. In fact, German and Jews are the greatest enemies in the world.

Yours, Anne

Dear Kitty,

We had a short circuit last evening, and on top of that the guns kept banging away all the time. I still haven't got over my fear of everything connected with shooting and planes, and I creep into Daddy's bed nearly every night for comfort. I know it's very childish but you don't know what it is like. The A. A. guns roar so loudly that you can't hear yourself speak. Mrs. Van Daan, the fatalist, was nearly crying, and said in a very timid little voice, "Oh, it is so unpleasant! Oh, they are shooting so hard", by which she really means "I'm so frightened."

It didn't seem nearly so bad by candlelight as in the dark. I was shivering, just as if I had a temperature, and begged Daddy to light the candle again. He was relentless, the light remained off. Suddenly there was a burst of machine-gun fire, and that is ten times worse than guns. Mummy jumped out of bed and, to Pim's annoyance, lit the candle. When he complained her answer was firm: "After all, Anne's not exactly a veteran soldier," and that was the end of it.

Have I already told you about Mrs. Van Daan's other fears? I don't think so. If I am to keep you informed of all that happens in the "Secret Annexe", you must know about this too. One night Mrs. Van Daan thought she heard burglars in the attic, she heard loud footsteps and was so frightened that she woke her husband. Just at that moment the burglars disappeared and the only sounds that Mr. Van Daan could hear were the heartbeats of the frightened fatalist herself. "Oh, Putti [Mr. Van Daan's nickname], they are sure to have taken the sausages and all our peas and beans. And Peter, I wonder if he is still safely in bed?" "They certainly won't have stolen Peter. Listen, don't worry and let me go to sleep." But nothing came of that. Mrs. Van Daan was far too nervous to sleep another wink. A few nights after that the whole Van Daan family was woken by ghostly sounds. Peter went up to the attic with a torch—and scamper-scamper! What do you think it was running away? A swarm of enormous rats! When we knew who the thieves were, we let Mouschi sleep in the attic and the uninvited guests didn't come back again; at least not during the night.

Peter went up to the loft a couple of evenings ago to fetch some old newspapers. He had to hold the trap door firmly to get down the steps. He put his hand down without looking... and went tumbling down the ladder from the sudden shock and pain. Without knowing it he had put his hand on a large rat, and it had bitten him hard. By the time he reached us, as white as a sheet and with his knees knocking, the blood had soaked through his pajamas. And no wonder; it's not very pleasant to stroke a large rat; and to get bitten into the bargain is really dreadful.

Yours, Anne

Dear Kitty,

If I just think of how we live here, I usually come to the conclusion that it is a paradise compared with how other Jews who are not in hiding must be living. Even so, later on, when everything is normal again, I shall be amazed to think that we, who were so spick and span at home, should have sunk to such a low level. By this I mean that our manners have declined. For instance, ever since we have been here, we have had one oilcloth on our table which, owing to so much use, is not one of the cleanest. Admittedly I often try to clean it with a dirty dishcloth, which is more hole than cloth. The table doesn't do us much credit either, in spite of hard scrubbing. The Van Daans have been sleeping on the same flannelette sheet the whole winter, one can't wash it here because the soap powder we get on the ration isn't sufficient, and besides it's not good enough. Daddy goes about in frayed trousers and his tie is beginning to show signs of wear too. Mummy's corsets have split today and are too old to be repaired, while Margot goes about in a brassiere two sizes too small for her.

Mummy and Margot have managed the whole winter with three vests between them, and mine are so small that they don't even reach my tummy.

Certainly, these are all things which can be overcome. Still, I sometimes realize with a shock : "How are we, now going about in worn-out things, from my pants down to Daddy's shaving brush, ever going to get back to our pre-war standards?"

They were banging away so much last night that four times I gathered all my belongings together. Today I have packed a suitcase with the most necessary things for an escape. But Mummy quite rightly says: "Where will you escape to?" The whole of Holland is being punished for the strikes which have been going on in many parts of the country. Therefore a state of siege has been declared and everyone gets one butter coupon less. What naughty little children!

Yours, Anne

Tuesday, 4 April, 1944

Dear Kitty,

For a long time I haven't had any idea of what I was working for any more, the end of the war is so terribly far away. So unreal, like a fairy tale. If the war isn't over by September I shan't go to school any more, because I don't want to be two years behind. Peter filled my days—nothing but Peter, dreams and thoughts until Saturday, when I felt so utterly miserable, oh, it was terrible. I was holding back my tears all the while I was with Peter, then laughed with Van Daan over a lemon punch, was cheerful and excited, but the moment I was alone I knew that I would have to cry my heart out. So, clad in my nightdress, I let myself go and slipped down onto the floor. First I said my long prayer very earnestly, then I cried with my head on my arms, my knees bent up, on the bare floor, completely folded up. One large sob brought me back to earth again, and I quelled my tears because I didn't want them to hear anything in the next room. Then I began trying to talk some courage into myself. I could only say : "I must, I must, I must ...". Completely stiff from the unnatural position, I fell against the side of the bed and fought on, until I climbed into bed again just before half past ten. It was over!

And now it's all over. I must work, so as not to be a fool, to get on, to become a journalist, because that's what I want! I know that I can write, a couple of my stories are good, my descriptions of the "Secret Annexe" are humorous, there's a lot in my diary that speaks, but – whether I have real talent remains to be seen.

"Eva's Dream" is my best fairy tale, and the queer thing about it is that I don't know where it comes from. Quite a lot of "Cady's Life" is good too, but, on the whole, it's nothing.

I am the best and sharpest critic of my own work. I know myself what is and what is not well written. Anyone who doesn't write doesn't know how wonderful it is; I used to bemoan the fact that I couldn't draw at all, but now I am more than happy that I can at least write. And if I haven't any talent for writing books or newspaper articles, well, then I can always write for myself.

I want to get on; I can't imagine that I would have to lead the same sort of life as Mummy and Mrs. Van Daan and all the women who do their work and are then forgotten. I must have something besides a husband and children, something that I can devote myself to!

I want to go on living even after my death! And therefore I am grateful to God for giving me this gift, this possibility of developing myself and of writing, of expressing all that is in me.

I can shake off everything if I write, my sorrows disappear, my courage is reborn. But, and that is the great question, will I ever be able to write anything great, will I ever become a journalist or a writer? I hope so, oh, I hope so very much, for I can recapture everything when I write, my thoughts, my ideals and my fantasies.

I haven't done anything more to "Cady's Life" for ages, in my mind I know exactly how to go on, but somehow it doesn't flow from my pen. Perhaps I never shall finish it, it may land up in the wastepaper basket, or the fire ... that's a horrible idea, but then I think to myself, "At the age of fourteen and with so little experience, how can you write about philosophy?"

So I go on again with fresh courage, I think I shall succeed, because I want to write!

Yours, Anne

Anne Frank's : The Diary of a Young Girl

Dear Kitty,

At last, at last I can sit quietly at my table in front of a crack of window and write you everything.

I feel so miserable, I haven't felt like this for months; even after the burglary I didn't feel so utterly broken. On the one hand, the vegetable man, the Jewish question, which is being discussed minutely over the whole house, the invasion delay, the bad food, the strain, the miserable atmosphere, my disappointment in Peter; and on the other hand, Elli's engagement, Whitsun reception, flowers, Kraler's birthday, fancy cakes, and stories about cabarets, films and concerts. That difference, that huge difference, it's always there, one day we laugh and see the funny side of the situation, but the next we are afraid, fear, suspense, and despair staring from our faces. Miep and Kraler carry the heaviest burden of the eight in hiding. Miep in all she does, and Kraler through the enormous responsibility, which is sometimes so much for him that he can hardly talk from pent-up nerves and strain. Koophuis and Elli look after us well too, but they can forget us at times, even if it's only for a few hours, or a day, or even two days. They have their own worries, Koophuis over his health, Elli over her engagement, which is not altogether rosy, but they also have their little outings, visits to friends, and the whole life of ordinary people. For them the suspense is sometimes lifted, even if it is only for a short time, but for us it never lifts for a moment. We've been here for two years now; how long have we still to put up with this almost unbearable, ever increasing pressure?

The sewer is blocked, so we mustn't run water, or rather only a trickle, when we go to the W.C. we have to take a lavatory brush with us, and we keep dirty water in a large Cologne pot. We can manage for today, but what do we do if the plumber can't do the job alone? The municipal scavenging service doesn't come until Tuesday.

Miep sent us a currant cake, made up in the shape of a doll with the words "Happy Whitsun" on the note attached to it. It's almost as if she's ridiculing us, our present frame of mind and our uneasiness could hardly be called "happy". The affair of the vegetable man has made us more nervous, you hear "shh, shh" from all sides again, and we're being quieter over everything. The police forced the door there, so they could do it to us too! If one day we too should ... no, I mustn't write it, but I can't put the question out of my mind today. On the contrary, all the fear I've already been through seems to face me again in all its frightfulness.

This evening at eight o'clock I had to go to the downstairs lavatory all alone, there was no one down there, as everyone was listening to the radio, I wanted to be brave, but it was difficult. I always feel much safer here upstairs than alone downstairs in that large, silent house, alone with the mysterious muffled noises from upstairs and the tooting of motor horns in the street. I have to hurry for I start to quiver if I begin thinking about the situation.

Again and again I ask myself, would it not have been better for us all if we had not gone into hiding, and if we were dead now and not going through all this misery, especially as we shouldn't be running our protectors into danger any more. But we all recoil from these thoughts too, for we still love life, we haven't yet forgotten the voice of nature, we still hope, hope about everything. I hope something will happen soon now, shooting if need be – nothing can crush us more than this restlessness. Let the end come, even if it is hard, then at least we shall know whether we are finally going to win through or go under.

Yours, Anne

Tuesday, 6 June, 1944

Dear Kitty,

“This is D-day,” came the announcement over the English news and quite rightly, “this is the day”. The invasion has begun!

The British gave the news at eight o' clock this morning: Calais, Boulogne, Le Havre, and Cherbourg, also the Pas de Calais (as usual), were heavily bombarded. Moreover, as a safety measure for all occupied territories, all people who live within a radius of thirty-five kilometers from the coast are warned to be prepared for bombardments. If possible, the English will drop pamphlets one hour beforehand.

According to the German news, British parachute troops have landed on the French coast, “English landing craft are in battle with the German Navy,” says the B. B. C.

We discussed it over the “Annexe” breakfast at nine o'clock: Is this just a trial landing like Dieppe two years ago?

British broadcast in German, Dutch, French, and other languages at ten o'clock: “The invasion has begun!” – that means the “real” invasion. English broadcast in German at eleven o'clock: speech by the Supreme Commander, General Dwight Eisenhower.

The English news at twelve o'clock in English: “This is D-day”. General Eisenhower said to the French people: “Stiff fighting will come now, but after this the victory. The year 1944 is the year of complete victory, good luck.”

BBC news in English at one o'clock (translated): 11,000 planes stand ready, and are flying to and fro nonstop landing troops and attacking behind the lines, 4000 landing boats, plus small craft, are landing troops and material between Cherbourg and Le Havre incessantly. English and American troops are already engaged in hard fighting. Speeches by Gerbrandy, by the Prime Minister of Belgium, King Haakon of Norway, De Gaulle of France, the King of England, and last, but not least, Churchill.

Great commotion in the “Secret Annexe”! Would the long-awaited liberation that has been talked of so much, but which still seems too wonderful, too much like a fairy tale, ever come true? Could we be granted victory this year, 1944? We don't know yet, but hope is revived within us, it gives us fresh courage, and makes us strong again. Since we must put up bravely with all the fears, privations, and sufferings, the great thing now is to remain calm and steadfast. Now more than ever we must clench our teeth and not cry out.

France, Russia, Italy, and Germany, too, can all cry out and give vent to their misery, but we haven't the right to do that yet!

Anne Frank's : The Diary of a Young Girl

Oh, Kitty, the best part of the invasion is that I have the feeling that friends are approaching. We have been oppressed by those terrible Germans for so long, they have had their knives so at our throats, that the thought of friends and delivery fills us with confidence!

Now it doesn't concern the Jews any more, no, it concerns, Holland and all occupied Europe. Perhaps, Margot says, I may yet be able to go back to school in September or October.

Yours, Anne

P.S. I'll keep you up to date with all the latest news!

29.5 DISCUSSION

You have just read a few entries in Anne Frank's Diary. It describes the incidents in her life from her thirteenth birthday in June 1942 till she was captured by the Gestapo in August, 1944. The entries are full of interesting anecdotes, thoughts and dreams that are part of the life of a young girl. She truthfully describes the fear and hopes of a group of people comprising immediate family and friends who took refuge in a secret hideout to escape the persecution of the Nazis. Let us look at some of the important incidents and people in Anne's Diary.

Anne's early recollections of Jewish persecution

Anne was born of Jewish parents in Germany who emigrated to Holland in 1933, when Anne was four years old, due to Jewish persecution. Even there, the family felt the impact of Hitler's anti-Jewish laws. Once the Second World War started and the Germans captured Holland, life became really hard. Many Anti-Jewish laws were passed. Jews had to wear a yellow star to distinguish them, they had to hand in their bicycles, and they were banned from trams and forbidden to drive. They could shop only between three and five and only in Jewish shops. Cinemas and theatres were forbidden to Jews and they could not take part in public sports. Jewish children could study only in Jewish schools. So Anne had to discontinue her regular school and attend the Jewish Secondary School.

The family's escape to the 'Secret Annexe'

Anne's father had decided that they would escape the Germans before they came to collect them. When the Nazis summoned Anne's sister Margot, the family decided that the time has come to go into hiding. Anne and Margot packed their essentials into school bags. Their friends Miep and Henk took some bags filled with clothes. Early in the morning each family member put on a number of clothes and giving the impression that they were going to school, they walked to the secret annexe in the building of Anne's father's office. The annexe was hidden behind the office and contained a few rooms with minimum facilities. They were soon joined by the Van Daans and later on by a dentist called Albert Dussel. Thus this group of eight people lived in the confines of the secret annexe for two years.

Anne's relationship with her parents

Anne's relationship with her mother was strained. But she was deeply attached to her father Otto Frank. She had little in common with her mother. She felt that her mother loved her sister Margot more than her. Anne adored her father to whom she was emotionally the closest.

Initially Anne looked forward to the arrival of the Van Daan at the secret annexe since there would be more company. She describes their son, Peter as not yet sixteen and rather 'soft, shy and gawky'. At first she does not like his company but later on they fall in love. Anne does not like the quarrels between Mrs. and Mr. Van Daan who shout at each other. She constantly makes fun of Mrs. Van Daan who is often described as 'unbearable'.

29.6 ANNE FRANK'S DIARY AS A LITERARY WORK

Anne Frank's Diary is a touching and beautifully written commentary on war and its terrible impact on human life. Though a first person narrative which describes individual and personal experiences, one can hear in it the voice of over six million people affected by the Holocaust. As a writer and humanist, she is the spokesperson of an age, while at the same time speaking to future generations about the folly of indifference. Thus, her diary is a social, historical and literary document. Though a diary, one can read it like a good novel because it is able to sustain tension in the reader. Anne portrays the curious mental state of transformation from a child to an adult which is both a universal and personal experience. Her prose style is characterized by precision, confidence and tenseness. But what is most striking is her stunning honesty which makes her diary a valid historical document. Anne is a master in characterization and is able to portray the people around her with great psychological realism. Occasionally, she becomes shrewd and cruel in her character analyses but these can be seen as part of the mood swings of adolescence. But she is most critical and uncompromising in her analysis of herself. The most endearing quality of the diary is Anne's self-introspection. The reader is able to peep into the depths of the mind of a young girl living in great stress under extraordinary conditions. Yet her cheerfulness and optimism, her perseverance and will power, her courage in speaking the truth, make her writing unique in itself. Her prose style is also characterized by warmth and wit, sensitivity and humanity, all combining with vivid picturization and psychological insight. She wrote under the threat of death but her writing has immortalized her. Anne Frank's diary is a fitting memorial to her fine spirit and offers a rich and rewarding experience in reading. Today Anne Frank's diary is considered a classic and has been translated into more than thirty-one languages, including Bengali and Malayalam. It has been published in thirty countries and has sold more than one million copies in hard cover alone. It has been adopted into numerous plays and films. Anne Frank's wish "I want to go on living even after my death", has thus come literally true. She lives on through her diary.

29.9 ANSWERS TO EXERCISES

Check Your Progress 1

- 1) Anne names her diary Kitty. Her reason for starting a diary is that she has no real friend and she feels Kitty is the friend she had been wanting for so long.
- 2) When Anne compares her life with the fate of millions of Jews who are not in hiding and are suffering great persecution at the hands of the Nazi regime, she feels that she is living in paradise.
- 3) Anne wants to be remembered even after her death and so she thanks God for giving her the gift of writing which helps her to develop herself and express all her thoughts. When she writes, her sorrows disappear and she feels courageous enough to face the world again.

30.0 OBJECTIVES

In this unit, we shall read and discuss excerpts from a speech delivered by Margaret Laurence at Trent University. After a careful reading of this unit, you should be able to:

- outline the life and works of Margaret Laurence;
- understand a speech as a form of literary expression;
- consider the commitment of Laurence to the cause of nuclear disarmament; and
- explain the main features of Laurence's speech.

30.1 INTRODUCTION

We have now come to the final unit of this block. In the previous three units, i.e. 27, 28 and 29, we introduced you to three written forms of non-fictional prose, i.e; biography, autobiography and diary, respectively. In this unit, we shall acquaint you with a spoken form of non-fictional prose—a speech. For this, we have selected a speech by Margaret Laurence, "My Final Hour", given at Trent University. You will be reading excerpts from this speech in this unit.

30.2 WHAT IS A SPEECH?

A speech is a "continuous spoken utterance" or a "spoken communication or expression of thought in prose" addressed to an audience. It presents the personal viewpoint of the speaker in a convincing manner, on a subject that is of universal importance. A speech can be spoken from a written draft or be delivered extempore (given on the spur of the moment; without prior preparation; an extempore speech is one that is delivered without the help of any text or notes).

Speeches are generally associated with politicians. But not all political speeches have literary merit. Usually, a political speech becomes a mere vote-catching rhetoric (a showy and declamatory expression), that is designed to elicit superficial public applause. On a slightly lesser scale, it becomes an oration rather than a speech. Is there a difference between an oration and a speech? Only very slight as both terms are generally treated as having interchangeable meanings. But, since we are analyzing a speech as a form of literary expression, we must point out the difference between an oration and a speech, especially with regard to their aim, content and presentation.

Oratory is the art of public speaking. Marcus Tullius Cicero (106-43 B.C.), a great Roman orator who captivated his audience with his stately oration, wrote a textbook on oratory, Treatise de Gratore, in which he laid down the laws of rhetoric. The aim of the orator is to sway multitudes and decide dynastic fortunes, electoral issues, and fates of national and international issues. What differentiates an oration from a speech is the presentation or style. The content of an orator is not as important as its presentation. In other words, oratory is more a matter of style than of substance; more an issue of manner than of matter; less a question of content (subject matter) and more of diction (choice of words). The same ideas may occur to many, but an orator dresses them well, thereby capturing the attention and admiration of the listeners. When we call someone a good orator, it is not because we like the content of his/her speech but because of the manner in which the speech is delivered. Thus, an oration is a skilful speech intended to create an impression, and relies on slogans, catchphrases, epigrams, and, in its extreme form, on rhetorical devices like a high flown and pompous language and a great deal of theatricality. Most, not all, political speeches are rhetorical orations with an inflated, over-decorated and insincere style. In fact, it would not be wrong to call them harangues (loud, pompous and wordy addresses made to a multitude). Some modern-day religious discourses are in the nature of rhetorical orations.

A fine speech, on the other hand, is not delivered with the aim to excite or rouse the audience to tumultuous applause. Rather, it is made to inspire and persuade the hearers to think along the lines the speakers wishes them to. Unlike in an oration, it is the content in a speech that is of primary importance and which lends force to it. A power-packed speech is one that is charged with the sturdy conviction the speaker has in his/her beliefs. This makes his/her speech persuasive and convincing. It comes direct from the heart of the speaker and goes, just as direct, into the hearts and minds of the listeners, bringing a radical change in their way of thinking.

History is witness to many a powerful speech, made by eminent persons like Swami Vivekananda, Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., Winston Churchill, Subhas Chandra Bose, Mahatma Gandhi, Jawaharlal Nehru, to name just a few, that have marked a turning point in the life of people and nations of the world. For instance, Swami Vivekananda won demonstrative recognition abroad for India and Vedantism with his magnetic personality together with the thought-provoking address he gave at Chicago in September 1893, during the World Parliament of Religions, in which he advocated tolerance and universal acceptance and condemned bigotry and fanaticism. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., the most famous black civil rights leader, changed the way America treated its black citizens with his most stirring and fiery extempore speech 'I Have A Dream'. Delivered in 1963 to more than 2,50,000 people in Washington, this speech marked a turning point in American history. Following the speech, the cause of the blacks occupied centre stage, with 'I Have A Dream' as the national mantra, till the 1964 Civil Rights Act made racial discrimination illegal. One still remembers that unforgettable and landmark speech 'Tryst With Destiny' made by Jawaharlal Nehru to the Constituent Assembly, at the midnight hour of Indian independence, August 14, 1947, in which he defined and captured the essence of the triumphant culmination of years of freedom struggle against the British Empire in India.

Both a powerful content and the manner of speaking imbue a speech with literary merit. By manner is meant style or presentation of the subject matter. A judicious and effective use of language and literary devices adds literary value to a speech. Good speakers have a way with words. They are persons of eloquence, that is, they know the art of expressing their strong emotion in correct, appropriate, expressive and fluent language. Since a speech is vocal, voice modulation and intonation (the rise and fall in pitch in the voice) in its delivery are also desirable. Literary devices like humour, pathos, irony, metaphorical expressions, forceful repetitions etc. give additional flavour to a speech.

In a nutshell, an orator speaks for effect, banking on a skilful use of language, while a fine speaker is one who reasons justly and expresses himself/herself elegantly upon a subject he/she passionately believes in. Margaret Laurence's "My Final Hour" included in this unit for a detailed study by you, is a good example of a fine speech.

30.3 MARGARET LAURENCE: LIFE AND WORKS

Margaret Laurence

Margaret Laurence (1926-1987) is universally acclaimed as one of the most compelling voices of Canadian Literature. Although firmly rooted in the Canadian soil, her stories and novels touch the psyche of all developing nations.

Born on July 18, 1926, in Neepawa, Manitoba, as Margaret Wemyss, she began writing at the age of seven, though she took herself seriously as a writer only when she was twenty-three. In 1948, Margaret married a civil engineer, Jack Laurence, with whom she first proceeded, to England and then to Somaliland in East Africa, where they lived for two years. Later the Laurences lived in the Gold Coast (now Ghana) for five years. This seven-year sojourn in Africa, where she had a first-hand experience of the stunting effects that colonization can have over the natives and their cultures, shaped her socio-political commitment as a writer. Here she also saw the bondage and subjection of women and realized their position to be that of victims of a male-centric society—a theme she took up in her African novels and later elaborated in the Canadian novels. In 1957, the Laurences moved to Vancouver. In 1962, Margaret separated from her husband and settled in England where she wrote four out of her five Canadian novels. She finally went back to Canada where she was honoured with various awards and citations for her work. In 1986, she was diagnosed with terminal lung cancer, and, in 1987, unable to bear her illness, she took an overdose of sleeping tablets and ended her life.

A prolific writer, Laurence has seven novels to her credit. This Side Jordan (1969) and The Tomorrow Tamer (1963) constitute her African novels and are set in Ghana. The Stone Angel (1964) is the first of Laurence's Canadian novels and tells the story of ninety-year-old Hagar Shipley and her life-long journey towards self-understanding; A Jest of God (1966) tells the story of Rachel Cameron, a woman struggling to come to terms with herself and her world; The Fire Dwellers (1969) explores the dilemmas of personal identity of the protagonist Stacey MacAindra; A Bird in the House (1970) is a set of eight interconnected stories that constitute the "fictional autobiography" of Laurence; The Diviners (1974) is the last of the Canadian series and is a powerful story of an independent woman, Morag Gunn, who refuses to abandon her search for love.

In addition to the novels, Laurence has also written four books for children. Her autobiography The Prophet's Camel Bell was written in 1963 and a book of translations A Tree for Poverty: Somali Poetry and Prose in 1954. A large number of her essays, articles, interviews and speeches have been published in various anthologies, the more prominent ones being Long Drums and Cannons (1968) and Heart of a Stranger (1976). Her memoir Dance on the Earth was published posthumously in 1989.

30.4 LAURENCE'S SOCIAL CONCERNS

Before you begin to read the speech "My Final Hour" by Margaret Laurence, it will help you to know something about her commitment to social causes, especially the one of nuclear disarmament, so that once the background to the speech is clear to you, you can understand the views expressed by Laurence more clearly. "It is my feeling that as we grow older we should become not less radical but more so," said Margaret Laurence in her speech "My Final Hour". Acting on this belief, Laurence turned from fiction-writing to promoting causes like nuclear disarmament, social justice and environmental protection, through didactic lectures, essays and even direct-mail fund raising campaigns during the final decade of her life. Animated by moral and religious urgency, she even lent her prestigious name to other causes.

On all nuclear questions, Laurence's arguments were the simple observations of a moral, sensitive person. She argued that when it comes to a nuclear war, "there are not two sides," as there will neither be any victors nor any vanquished, but only a handful of survivors, that too if the earth survives the nuclear holocaust. To Laurence, the nuclear issue was most important. If the issue of a nuclear attack was not solved, according to her, there was not going to be anyone around to solve any of the other issues like those of starvation, disease, hardships and sufferings that existed in so many parts of the world. To quote her: "For the price of one Trident nuclear submarine, malaria could be wiped off the face of the earth. That gives me pause. These two issues, the old one of the needless suffering in the world, and the building of nuclear weapons, are very closely tied together."

For Laurence, the problem in the nuclear arms race was due to a "crisis in the imagination" on the part of world leaders, particularly the two great superpowers, who talked about megadeath without realizing, as Laurence put it, "that these are real live human beings, that they're talking about our children, real people, who in a nuclear holocaust would die horribly.....". She further pointed out that while writing a novel she always tried to feel that her characters were as real as she was, that their joys and pains were as real as hers, and declared that , "...the inability to feel the reality of others is what enables people to become so brutalized that they are able to torture and murder their fellow human beings."

Laurence emphasized the importance of the ordinary people who could have an effect in halting the nuclear arms race. If people realized that none of them was ordinary, that they all were unique human beings who mattered, they could get together and force their respective governments to bring about global disarmament of nuclear weapons.

As a writer, too, Laurence was committed to solving the nuclear issue, although she found it hard to address the question or tackle it through her articles, talks, lectures etc. As she summed it : “I cannot write novels that preach, but what I can do is to affirm my whole life-view through the characters in my books. I think that in all my writing, a very strong kind of celebration of life itself comes through.”

This speech expresses Margaret Laurence’s commitment to resolve the nuclear issue. She speaks out against the use of nuclear arms and the expenditure of billions of dollars on their production. She emphatically advocates global nuclear disarmament.

30.5 “MY FINAL HOUR” : EXCERPTS FROM LAURENCE’S SPEECH

Margaret Laurence had a long and close association with Trent University. After her return to Canada in 1969, Margaret finally established permanent residence in Lakefield, a small town ten minutes drive from Trent University. She was awarded an honorary degree by Trent in 1972, and she joined the Editorial Board of the Journal of Canadian Studies in 1973. Her association with Trent University deepened in the years that followed. She became Trent’s first Writer-in-Residence in 1974, participating generously in the life of the university, attending tutorials and seminars, delivering formal and informal talks and counseling young writers. Two most splendid examples of Laurence engaging her friends and community in a direct way are her addresses “Books That Mattered to Me” and “My Final Hour” given at Trent University. “My Final Hour”, is an address first delivered to the Trent University Philosophy Society on 29 March 1983, at the Trent Seminary.

30.5.1 Text

“My Final Hour”

This is the first time I have ever had the privilege of addressing graduating students who are candidates to the ministry of the church. I must admit to a feeling of nervousness, in standing here and making a statement of personal belief. In accepting this invitation, I requested that a solid lectern be provided—something I could lean on. I told a friend about this need, and she said, “Margaret, what you really want is not a lectern but a pulpit”. Well, I don’t think that is the case at all, but it is true that in speaking to you now, I feel the need of something solid to lean on, physically, but also the need—not just now but every day—of something spiritual to lean on. This sustaining force is faith.

First I would like to pass on one piece of advice. If, as you grow older, you feel you are also growing stupider, do not worry. This is normal, and usually occurs around the time when your children, now grown, are discovering the opposite—they now see that you aren’t nearly as stupid as they had believed when they were young teen-agers. Take heart from that. True, your new-found sense of stupidity will no doubt be partly due to the fact that the technology of the age has far outstripped any feeble knowledge of it that you may once have felt you had. It may, however, also be due to the fact that at last you may be learning a little healthy humility—humility in its true and indeed religious sense, which of course has nothing at all to do with self-effacement but with a recognition of your human limitations. I would not claim that I have learned that kind of humility—that struggle to learn which will never cease. But at least I now can accept with some sort of equanimity that many things are beyond my power.

My limitations extend to many fields. I know now that I will never know an enormous amount about music and painting. My knowledge of science is likely to remain minuscule. I will never know as much as I would like to about the planets and their patterned courses. Even in my own area of so-called expertise, I will never read all the novels I would like to read, even though I read great numbers of them yearly. I will also never write a novel with which I am really satisfied.

....Well, an acceptance of limitations does not mean that one is not constantly trying to extend the boundaries of knowledge and accomplishment. And it certainly does not mean an acceptance of defeat, in whatever fields our endeavours take place. It is my feeling that as we grow older we should become not less radical but more so. I do not, of course, mean this in any political-party sense, but in a willingness to struggle for those things in which we passionately believe. Social activism and the struggle for social justice are often thought of as natural activities of the young but not of the middle-aged or elderly. In fact, I don't think this was ever true, and certainly in our own era we are seeing an enormous upsurge of people of all ages who are deeply and committedly concerned about the state of our hurting and endangered world.

We are faced now with an emergency that concerns not only our own personal lives, but the lives of all people and all creatures on earth.

Ours is a terrifying world. Injustice, suffering and fear are everywhere to be found. It is difficult to maintain hope in such a world, and yet I believe there is hope. I want to proclaim and affirm my personal belief in the social gospel. I speak as a Christian, a woman, a writer, a parent, a member of humanity and a sharer in life itself, a life I believe to be informed and infused with the holy spirit. I do not think it is enough to hope and pray that our own lives and soul will know grace, even though my entire life as a writer has been concerned with my belief that all human individuals matter, that no one is ordinary. Our Lord's new commandment speaks very clearly. "Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself."

The social gospel is no easier now than it ever was. My generation was the first in human history to come into young adulthood knowing that the human race now had the dreadful ability to destroy all life on earth and possibly the earth itself. Only later did we realize the full extent of the destruction of life, a continuing destruction passed on to the then-unborn children of survivors, but we did know that after Hiroshima, August 6th, 1945, the world would never be the same again. The annihilation caused by the first atomic bombs was unthinkable, but it had happened. Also, we had taken it for granted that through wars, through disasters, yet would the earth endure for ever. It was clear to many of us in 1945 that this was no longer to be taken for granted. We have lived with that thought ever since, and have yet borne our children, lived our lives, done our work. The will to survive and to pass on important caring to future generations is very strong. But today we have to realize that the bombs used at Hiroshima and Nagasaki were small bombs, compared to today's nuclear weapons.

I ask you to think of the Holocaust in Europe, when the Nazis murdered a very great part of all the Jewish communities. That horror, surely, must never be forgotten. No amount of mourning will ever be enough for those millions of children, women and men whose unique and irreplaceable lives were torn away by the group of dehumanized humans who had taken power in Hitler's Germany. Despite the lessons of Hiroshima and of the Holocaust, today's leaders can speak with apparent complacency of "winning a nuclear war" or of "a limited nuclear war", or—in a jargon that demeans languages itself—of "overkill". Such concepts must be called by their true name, and that name is Evil.

Do the world's leaders really suppose that it is all just an act on TV and that the dead would get up again and take on a different role in another TV series so they might be killed again and again? I fear greatly that many of the world's leaders have so little imagination and so little caring that they cannot visualize at all what a nuclear holocaust would mean. Do they really think that they and their families and executive staffs would survive in deep-buried bunkers? And if, by any unlikely chance they did, what kind of a world do they think they would emerge back into?

Dr. Helen Caldicott who has done so much in the struggle against nuclear arms, says, "If we look behind the headlines and understand the historical perspective, we realize that America is preparing to fight a nuclear war. Now, that should make us all distinctly uncomfortable. In fact, we should be screaming in the streets, if we really care about ourselves, our children, and those people we love, and if we really love this planet". With well-researched figures, Dr. Caldicott also says, "In the event of a nuclear war, we predict that within 30 days after an exchange, 90% of Americans will be dead. So will Canadians, probably Mexicans, certainly Russians, certainly Europeans, the British, and probably the Chinese".

It is precisely this failure of the imagination on the part of militarists and leaders that is so dangerous today, the failure to visualize what a nuclear holocaust would mean, the apparent inability to imagine the scorched and charred bodies of children... our children or children of Russian parents or parents anywhere, and to know, by an extension of imagination that all children are our children. The jargon of the militarists is a distortion and a twisting of language, of our human ability to communicate. Language itself becomes the vehicle of concealment and deception. Such words as "overkill" and "megadeath" do not convey in any sense at all what would really happen—the dead, mutilated, and dying people clogging the ruined cities and towns like so much unvalued discarded rubbish, the suffering humans screaming for help with no medical help available, no water, no relief at all for the unbearable pain of millions of humans except finally the dark relief of death for all. Any shelters that the few might reach would in time turn into tombs. Civil defence plans are a sham. In a nuclear war there would be nowhere to hide, and nowhere except a dead and contaminated world to emerge back into. I profoundly believe that we must proclaim that this must not happen.

Margaret Laurence's :
"My Final Hour"

In Somaliland, many years ago, I saw people, I saw children, who were dying of thirst. I can never forget. Now, in that area, things are much, much worse. The late Dr. Barbara Ward, the great economist, in one of her books put forward the thesis that if the world's economy could be geared less towards arms production and more towards helping people, it would be possible for anyone in the world to have enough fresh water. Dr. Helen Caldicott says that for one third of the cost of trident nuclear submarine, malaria could be eliminated from the world. In East and in West Africa I saw children who were desperately ill with malaria. My own two children had malaria, as babies, in Ghana. They were fortunate. They had medical help, and had previously been given anti-malaria medication, and they recovered. But I remember as though it were yesterday—and it was in fact nearly thirty years ago—my own sense of helplessness and anguish. How many parents in malarial areas, now as then, mourn their children, killed by a disease that could have been eradicated years ago? One third of the cost of a Trident submarine! Here in Canada, native people in such places as Grassy Narrows are slowly and painfully dying of Minamata disease, caused by mercury poisoning in the fish they must eat for lack of other food. These are only a few, a very few, of the tragic issues in this desperately hurting world. These sufferings and deaths could be halted, could be prevented. Yet world-wide spending on instruments designed only for killing goes on and is escalating.

I have to speak about how I feel as a writer. I believe that as a writer, or as an artist, if you will... I have a responsibility, a moral responsibility, to work against the nuclear arms race, to work for a recognition on the part of governments and military leaders that nuclear weapons must never be used and must systematically be reduced. Throughout human history, artists have affirmed and celebrated life. Whether we work in words, in painting, in film, in bronze or stone or whatever our medium may be, the artist affirms the value of life itself and of our only home, the planet Earth. ... Artists have passed on to succeeding generations the tales, the histories, the songs, the sagas, the skills of their trade. Can we conceive of a world in which there would be no succeeding generations? A world in which all the powerful works of the human imagination would be destroyed, and would never again be seen or listened to or experienced? We must conceive that this is now a possibility, and one not too far in our uncertain future, either. We must not, as artists, or so I feel, stand by and passively allow this to happen. The death of the individual is the end which we will all one day meet, but the knowledge that our children and their children will live, that someone's children will go on, that the great works of humankind will endure keeps us going. ... The individual is the leaf on the tree. The leaves fall but the tree endures. New leaves are born. This concept has been the mainstay of our species from time immemorial. Now the tree itself is threatened.

As a writer, therefore, I feel I have a responsibility. Not to write pamphlets; not to write didactic fiction. That would be, in many ways, a betrayal of how I feel about my work. But my responsibility seems to me to be to write as truthfully as I can, about human individuals and their dilemmas, to honour them as living, suffering and sometimes joyful people. My responsibility also must extend into my life as a citizen of my own land and ultimately of the world.

Dr. Helen Caldicott speaks of “psychic numbing”—the temptation to shut out from our minds and hearts all the horrifying things in our world. To think that the problems may just possibly go away if we ignore them. They will not go away. It is not all happening on TV. It is happening on our earth, and we are the custodians of that earth. We cannot afford passivity. We must take on responsibility for our lives and our world and we must be prepared to make our government listen to and hear us. Our aim must be no less than human and caring justice, and peace*for all people that on earth do dwell.*

30.5.2 Glossary

ministry:	office of clergymen; the clerical profession.
lectern:	a reading desk from which the lessons are read.

30.6 DISCUSSION

You have just read Margaret Laurence's speech "My Final Hour". The speech is simple and direct with no ostentation and theatricality to mar its appeal. The ideas expressed follow each other in a connected and systematic manner that leaves no place for ambiguity. We shall now take up a brief summary of the speech to analyse the main points that Laurence is putting across to her audience. At the same time, we shall note Laurence's deep commitment to social causes.

30.6.1 Summary

At the outset, Laurence admits to being nervous in presenting her personal belief before would-be clergymen graduating from Trent University. She feels the need to have a physical prop to lean on. At the same time, she feels she needs a spiritual prop i.e. a strong faith that will sustain her.

In the next paragraph Laurence suggests that as we grow old we should not feel inhibited by our limitations or accept defeat in our endeavours, but we should become more radical and struggle for things we passionately believe in. She feels happy to see that the old and the young alike are feeling concerned about the “state of our hurting and endangered world” and are rising to save it. This quite naturally leads Laurence to list the dangers being faced by the world today, namely, injustice, suffering and fear. Despite these dangers, she feels there is still hope for mankind. She affirms her personal belief in the social gospel and in the Lord’s commandment that says we should love our neighbours like ourselves.

Laurence then comments on two world events that changed the face of the earth. First, the dropping of atom bombs, by America, on the Japanese cities of Hiroshima and Nagasaki in 1945, which caused unbelievable annihilation and established beyond doubt man’s dreadful ability to destroy himself and his earth (though people still hope the earth would endure through all disasters, a hope belied by the appearance of nuclear arms); and second, the Holocaust in Europe when the Nazis exterminated millions of Jews and proved how little human lives mattered to world leaders. (You already know something about this after reading Anne Frank’s diary in the previous unit.) Despite these two catastrophes, world leaders are contemplating fighting a war using nuclear weapons that are far more deadly than the atomic bomb.

To strengthen her case against the use of nuclear weapons, Laurence quotes Dr. Helen Caldicott as saying that America and Russia now have enough nuclear arms to “overkill every person on earth 16 times”, and that it will not only kill 90% of Americans if Russia strikes first or vice-versa, but people in many other countries would also die.

Laurence expresses astonishment at the enormous amounts of money being spent on the production of nuclear arms – amounts which, if properly utilized, could supply enough fresh water to everyone in the world or eradicate malaria from the face of the earth.

In concluding her speech, Laurence makes two points – one, that a person must affirm life and, therefore, we should all actively commit ourselves to saving the world by bringing about nuclear disarmament; and two, that an artist must commit to the generations of the future and, therefore, she as a writer feels it her responsibility to write truthfully about the dilemmas being faced by individuals everywhere and to ensure that the succeeding generations live to inherit the wonderful achievements of the human mind.

30.6.2 Features of Laurence’s Speech

Conversational Tone

The first thing we notice in “My Final Hour” is the conversational style that Laurence has adopted. By admitting at the very beginning that she is nervous in making a statement of her belief before an august audience of graduating candidates who will be priests in the church, Laurence at once takes them into her confidence, while at the same time making it clear that she is going to talk to them, one to one, and not talk down to them. Hence, the tone adopted by her is personal and subjective. She shares with her audience instances from her personal experience in Africa. She recalls how she saw children dying of thirst in Somaliland and of malaria in East and in West Africa. She also discloses before them her commitment as a writer to the cause of nuclear disarmament.

Clarity of Expressions

There is clarity of expression in the speech which reflects the clarity of Laurence's thoughts. She is very clear in her mind what she has to present before her listeners and uses a language that is lucid and simple. There is no disjointedness in her discourse. One idea leads to another very systematically. For instance, she first mentions the catastrophes that have already overtaken man and destroyed large chunks of human life on earth and then proceeds to talk about the imminent catastrophe—a nuclear war—that might finish the earth itself. Thereafter, she makes out a clear case for the necessity of nuclear disarmament by all nations.

A Forceful Style

Without taking recourse to any rhetorical devices, Laurence succeeds in delivering a powerful speech. The power comes from her sturdy conviction in her belief that the nuclear arms race must stop. She quotes facts and figures given by eminent people, like Dr. Helen Caldicott and Dr. Barbara Ward, to convince her audience about the sheer undesirability of using nuclear weapons.

Use of Humour and Pathos

Laurence's speech displays both her sense of humour as well as pathos. There is a touch of humour in her advice to her listeners not to worry if they grow stupid as they grow old. She informs them that this is quite 'normal'. She pokes fun at the parent-child relationship, saying " your children, now grown, are discovering the opposite – they now see that you aren't nearly as stupid as they had believed when they were young teenagers. She also succeeds in creating a pathetic picture of a post-nuclear-war world with graphic descriptions like ".....the dead, mutilated and dying people clogging the ruined cities and towns like so much unvalued discarded rubbish, the suffering humans screaming for help with no medical help available, no water, no relief at all for the unbearable pain of millions of humans except finally the dark relief of death for all." The easily-visualised description leaves a deep impact on the minds and hearts of the listeners. And this is what a good speaker always aims at — to make the audience think and feel.

A speech that is heard leaves a greater impact on the mind than the one that is read because while hearing it you can feel and share the passion with which it is delivered by the speaker. Therefore, it will help you to get a feel of "My Final Hour" if you read it aloud to yourself or before your friends at the study centre. Also note, that some words and phrases are in italics – Laurence would have given greater emphasis to these when delivering her speech.

Similarly, individuals die but new generations take their place to enjoy the earth and the great achievements of the human mind that live on. However, due to the threat of a nuclear war, the tree itself i.e. the earth is in danger of being wiped out of existence.

APPENDIX

What is a Biography?

We know that biography, as a literary form is the written story of the life of an individual. Is this story 'true' or 'fictional'? Should it be written in prose or verse? Are there any special methods by which this story can be written? Before we examine these questions at some length, let us define biography. Broadly, it may be defined as a truthful account of the life of an individual, written in prose. A biography is the life of an individual as opposed to a group. While it may depict several characters, these are depicted only in relation to the individual whose life is being recreated. In short, the focus is always on the individual. A biography must be a truthful account. But while a good biography must be factual it must also be something more. It must have literary value. Now we might well ask: in what does this literary value lie? We may locate it in the writer's use of language. Or in his/her imaginative selection and use of documentary evidence so that the work emerges as a unified whole. Or in the writer's use of literary devices. However, we would like to point out that all these factors contribute to the literary quality of a biography. To sum up, a biography must combine the authenticity of history and the creativity of fiction.

Biography and History

Biography is closely related to history on the one hand and to fiction on the other. It is related to history because like history, it deals with the past and it also makes use of the same resources that a historian needs for research. Does that mean that biography is a branch of history? No. The crucial difference lies in the fact that history is a factual record of individuals and events. In biography, the focus is not on the background but on the individual. The aim of the biographer is not just to convey facts but to probe into the psyche of the individual and to make him/her come alive. This imaginative rendering of personal experience links biography to fiction. But fiction is primarily imaginative whereas biography aims at truthful presentation of detail.

Biography and Fiction

Thus we see that the biographer needs to employ the methods of the historian as well as of the writer of fiction. Biography uses the techniques of research to test whether the material at hand is true or false. The biographer must also make a selection of interesting and relevant incidents. By imposing a certain design on the selected material the writer must transform the lifeless material into a living experience. Thus biography has many aspects. It is historical, psychological and aesthetic. It is historical because it provides a factual account of the life of an individual. It is psychological because it probes into the mind of the individual. And it is aesthetic because the writer imposes a certain design on his/her material and renders it pleasing by his/her use of language and other literary devices. As an art form, it not only aims to delight the reader but also to provide a certain insight into the character of another individual. The reader is made to identify with certain feelings and experiences of the character who seem to come alive.

Biography as an Art Form

Margaret Laurence's :
"My Final Hour"

How can we distinguish between a well-composed and a sub-standard biography? There are several ways in which a biography can be marred. Sometimes there is an undue tendency to celebrate and praise the dead by suppressing unpalatable facts. At other times, the author's personality intrudes unnecessarily into the narrative. At other times a biography suffers if the author starts with a certain thesis or preconceived idea and bends fact to suit it.

On the other hand, a well-written biography, is an honest portrayal of historical facts without suppressing any unpleasant truth. There are no unnecessary digressions impeding the flow of the narrative and the events selected are apt and to the point. A good biography is brief and gripping so that it might seem as if one is reading an interesting novel. As Leon Edel puts it 'The biographer may be as imaginative as he pleases—the more imaginative the better—in the way in which he brings his material together. But he must not imagine the materials. He must read himself into the past: but then he must read the past into our present. (Literary Biography, p. 1) This clearly means that writing a biography involves exhaustive research. But as a creative artist, the biographer must assimilate facts and then present them in the most interesting manner possible.

Use of Time

Does a biography proceed in strict chronological sequence? This is a question that you might well ask! As biography is not history it is not necessary to follow the birth to death sequence. The biographer does not have to begin his/her account of the individual's life from the day s/he was born and conclude the narrative at the death. The biographer can and often does use time in a flexible manner, moving forward and backward in time. Thus an individual life is not portrayed strictly by the clock. This method helps to make the person come alive, as Leon Edel believes (Literary Biography, xvi)

Selection of Details

Lytton Strachey, an extremely successful practitioner of the form, suggests that a biography must have 'a brevity which excludes anything that is redundant and nothing that is significant' (Preface to Eminent Victorians). Does this mean that a biography has to be brief? There are no hard and fast rules about the length of a biography. It may run into hundreds of pages as we find in Boswell's Life of Johnson or it may be as brief as a character sketch. The idea is to make the character come alive and to project an impression of unity in the work. The length then becomes a matter of individual choice.

Why do we Read Biography?

Clearly different persons would have different reasons for selecting specific reading material. Curiosity about the lives of others may be one reason for reading biographies. However, the function of biography is not only to interest and delight but also to stimulate our sympathy so that our understanding of the human condition is enhanced and our sympathies extended. It is for this reason that Lytton Strachey described biography as 'the most delicate and humane of all the branches of the art of writing'. H.W. Longfellow, the American poet has said:

Lives of great men all remind us
We can make our lives sublime
And departing leave behind us
Footprints in the sands of time.

By reading about the lives of others, we can draw some lessons that have a relevance to our own lives. This is didactic aspect of biography.

Reading Biography

When we read a biography critically, we must keep the following aspects in mind:

- there must be no redundant details. Only the relevant details must be carefully selected by the author to advance the narrative;
- a biography must be brief and to the point with no unnecessary explanation, digression and comments;
- it should neither be too complimentary nor too critical but must be an objective and detached presentation of facts;
- the events must be arranged in an interesting manner so that the reader's interest is sustained;
- the language must be used artistically;
- the character portrayed must come alive;
- there must be an impression of unity and the interest must never deflect from the main character

ORIGIN, DEVLOPMENT AND FORMS OF BIOGRAPHY

Earliest Biographical Literature

The initial impulse towards biography can be found in the ancient sagas and epics and elegies written to commemorate dead friends, relatives and public figures. The first biography was written by the fifth century B.C. Greek poet Ion of Chios. He wrote brief sketches of his famous contemporaries such as Pericles and Sophocles. The Church also began to record the lives of its early founders and saints. This branch of biography is called hagiography or commemoration of the lives of saints. At this points, another function was added to biography. At the very beginning only the dead were commemorated, but now it became didactic as well. The lives were recorded in order to provide ethical models of conduct for others. While the history of biography is as old as human history, the word biography was first used only in the seventeenth century to create an identity for this kind of writing.

Development of Biography

Biography, as we now understand the term, began to appear in the sixteen century. Cardinal Morton's Life of Richard III (circa 1513) and Cavendish's Life of Wolsey (1554-7) are two of the first biographies written. The more famous of seventeenth century biographies are Bacon's Life of Henry VIII (1621) and Walton's Lives (1640-78). Among the biographies written in the eighteenth century, also known as the age prose, Johnson's Lives of the Poets (1779-81) and Boswell's Life of Johnson (1791) established the form beyond doubt. Johnson's contribution to the form consists in insisting that only the undiluted truth be told. Boswell broke the stiffness and formality of tone by speaking in his natural voice. In the nineteenth century, primarily an age of the novel, there was a decline in the form but the more famous biographies written are Lockhart's Life of Scott (1837-38) and Gilchrist's Life of Blake (1863). In the Victorian age the decline also occurred because of the undue tendency to eulogize.

Biography in the Twentieth Century

The twentieth century, however, has seen a flowering of the form. Lytton Strachey found himself famous after the publication of Eminent Victorians (1918). This set the trend for 'debunking' or exposing the feet of clay of venerated public figures. There was a change in point of view as well. The author was no longer the admiring, sympathetic underling in the service of the hero/heroine but an equal who may admire or be critical according to his/her understanding of the situation. The impulse to eulogize was replaced by the impulse to reconstruct the life as vividly as possible. Instead of the tendency to praise or hero worship, the twentieth century witnessed an increasing trend of presenting the characters in their human dimension—with all their positive and negative aspects. This Virginia Woolf termed as the 'new biography'. Another prominent example of this is Leon Edel's biography of the famous American novelist Henry James.

Another visible change in twentieth century biography was the reduced length. Biography no longer ran into several volumes but was often the size of a novel. The biographer was no longer a chronicler but an artist. Biography thus acquired an aesthetic dimension. The biographer did not just portray the outer life of work and activity but also the inner life of emotion and thought. There were no fixed standards of morality to which the subject must conform. The interest was in the individual as a human being with all his/her faults and idiosyncrasies. Biography from its status as a hybrid form began to acquire an identity as a distinct genre.

Forms of Biography

There are many kinds of biographies but let us broadly place them in two categories—those compiled by first hand knowledge of the individual and those compiled by research. Boswell's Life of Johnson (1791) belongs to the first category. Boswell was a friend and admirer of the great literary figure of his age, Samuel Johnson. As such Boswell spent a lot of time with him observing him and recording his conversations in his diaries. On the other hand, Lytton Strachey's Queen Victoria (1992) is biography based on research. Also based on research are reference biographies that we find in Encyclopedias and dictionaries or biographies. Their function is to provide factual information. However, we are interested in biography as a literary form and will not discuss biographies used purely for reference purposes.

Some biographies are written subjectively with the author's personality intruding upon the narrative while others are written objectively and with detachment. In such cases, the author does not intrude with comments or explanations but recounts the main events so that we have an effect of a life unfolding itself. This form of biography is known as 'standard' biography. 'Fictionalized' biography is another form in which conversations are imagined and material invented without any consideration for factual information. There is an attempt to fuse the appeal of biography with the charm of the novel. Irving Stone's Lust for Life (1959) is a fictional account of the life of Vincent van Gogh, the famous Dutch painter. Allied to this form is fiction presented as biography—there is no attempt at authenticity. It is simply a novel written as biography or autobiography. Somerset Maugham's Moon and Sixpence (1919) does not attempt to project itself as a life. The attempt is to evoke a life (the painter Gauguin's in this instance) rather than to recreate it.

Answers to Exercises

Check Your Progress 1

- 1) Biography is a truthful account of the life of an individual. It is written in prose. While it is based on facts, a biographer uses his/her imagination to present a lively and interesting picture of the person portrayed.
- 2) History is a factual record of individuals and events while in biography the focus is not on the background but on the individual. Fiction is independent of facts and operates solely in the realm of the imagination. While a biographer must be imaginative, s/he cannot lose sight of facts.
- 3) Curiosity about the lives of others may be one reason. Another may be to draw lessons that may have some relevance to our lives. By reading about the lives of others, our understanding of the human conditions is enhanced and our sympathies extended.

Check Your Progress 2

- 1) In earlier time, there had been a tendency to praise the subject. In the twentieth century, a 'new' biography developed wherein one can find that the biographer is not an admiring subordinate but a critical equal who examines the character from all angles—positive and negative. Biographies also became almost as short as the novel. The interest shifted from a mere depiction of outer events to the states of mind of the character.

PLEASE REMEMBER

Welcome to this revised course on Understanding Poetry (BEGE106). As in the earlier course (EEG06) it has three chunks:

- Blocks 1 to 5 on English Poetry
- Blocks 6 and 7 on American Poetry
- Block 8 on Indian English Poetry

However, we have introduced new material, especially to the sections on American and Indian English poetries. In all now you have 40 units to read. If you read a unit in roughly three days you will take 120 days to read the entire course. Let us add 30 days more for a few holidays and extra reading for some units that have some long poems. Then you can complete the first reading of the course in 150 days. Second revision of the course may take 75 days and the third revision will take still less time. In short, by consistent work you can be fully prepared for your exam well before the end of a year.

Now, let me tell you a few words about the blocks on English poetry. The five blocks divide among them into five broad periods of English poetry. They are as under:

- i) The Renaissance,
- ii) The Augustan and Transition,
- iii) The Romantic,
- iv) The Victorian, and
- v) High and Late Modernist periods

We have left out Old English and Medieval English periods which are now understood as the Postclassical period. I will try to introduce you through my prefatory notes in each block to the broad tendencies of these periods but you must acquaint yourself with the history of English Literature of these periods by reading books – not more than one or two – on History of English Literature. You will get to know about these books as you proceed. Then read the poems in the different blocks to see if you agree with our points of view regarding the general tendencies of the various periods and how they characterize the evolution of the cultural makeup of the English people. ‘Read’ as Francis Bacon said, ‘not to contradict and confute nor to accept and take for granted but to weigh and consider.’

I know that students read not only to learn and discover new ideas and experience novel events and people but also to be successful in exams. So, here are a few tips for you.

This course on poetry in English is an elective course. Some of you will like to go on and do an M.A in English. So you must learn poetry properly. For this you must be able to understand the music of English speech and the role of metre in verse in particular. The second unit thus becomes very important. You need not read it at the outset but you must read it sooner rather than later and drill yourself in scansion. It will enhance your ability to appreciate English poetry. Take help from friends, relatives or teachers to learn prosody and scansion.

Next in importance is the critical terminology of literature such as lyric, sonnet, ode, epic, verse drama, assonance, consonance, alliteration, simile, metaphor, synecdoche, metonymy, imagery, symbolism , euphemism, hyperbole, periphrasis, litotes, terza rima, Spenserian stanza, etc. You as a student of literature are expected to be familiar with them. On these questions you have a good chance of scoring high marks.

Next in importance is your familiarity with the history of the poetries in English, American and Indian English literatures. You will be introduced to these in the introductions to the blocks. Master them as one question of 16 marks you may have to answer (See question no. 3 on p. 33) base on the introductions.

Besides prosody, critical terminology and literary history we will ask you to show your familiarity with the text of the poems in two ways: a) through reference to context questions (four of eight marks each) and, b) two critical questions, each carrying 16 marks. A model question paper is given here for your help but remember that they are meant to give direction to your study for examiners are free to make the question paper in the manner they like and the pattern may change from year to year.

When we were preparing EEG06 – that is Understanding Poetry in its earlier form – we gave portraits of poets. We have not done so in this course because now you have access to the internet where you will get pictures and reading material on poets and their age aplenty. Make use of it if also with discretion. You must visit your study centre and interact with the counsellors and classmates and remain in contact with them. You will then be able to get a lot of help from one another.

We once again welcome you to this course and hope that by regular and methodical study and sometimes in groups you will derive the joy that literature is meant to provide and also do well in exams.

INTRODUCTION TO BLOCK 1

A HISTORICAL BACKGROUND: PERIODIZATION IN HISTORY, THE POSTCLASSICAL ERA AND THE EARLY MODERN PERIOD OF ENGLISH LITERATURE

You are going to study British, American and Indian English poetry in this course. The 'Introductions' to the blocks will provide you with brief historical backgrounds for a proper study of the poets and the poems in the block. Poets and other creative artists are valued owing to their uniqueness but historians and scholars try to see coherence in a period of history and discover certain common features in the various events, political, social, economic, constitutional, or cultural, taking place in that period. For a literary scholar the artistic creations are like events in political, economic or constitutional histories and historians of literature try to understand the spirit of an age by trying to establish certain common features between different works of arts. This is how we will try to bring order to an otherwise diverse productions of the different periods.

Historians divide the entire history of a nation into periods. Traditionally, history of English literature starts with the Anglo-Saxon Period, followed by the Anglo-Norman Period which is also called the Medieval Period, the Renaissance Period, etc. We begin this course with the Renaissance period which is also further subdivided into the Elizabethan, Jacobean, Caroline and Restoration periods. It is now customary to call the medieval period Postclassical Age and the Renaissance Early Modern Period.

You may like to know the reasons for the change in nomenclature. I must tell you about the Annales School (French pronunciation: a'nal) historians in France in the twentieth century who stressed long term social history, also called longue duree. Long duree gives priority to long-term historical structures over events that Francois Simian called histoire evenementielle or 'event history'. In this light the dividing line between the Anglo-Saxon and Medieval eras vanishes and the dominant tendencies can be understood better as early post classical and later postclassical periods.

It has been pointed out that the Ancient European civilization which was born in Greece and flourished under the Roman empire began to decline in the third century of the C E. There were several elements that caused the disruption of the Pax Romana - the peace of the Romans. The Roman empire was plunged into military anarchy, was raided by Germanic tribes and, was burdened by economic dislocation. Besides, eastern religions undermined the Greco-Roman civilization that was based on rational enquiry. The Roman world began to move in a direction in which the quest for the divine was to predominate over all human enterprise.

The political void thus left by the Romans was filled by the Germanic tribes such as the Ostrogoths in Italy, the Visigoths in Hispania, Franks and Burgundians in Gaul and Western Germany and the Angles and Saxons in Britain. We find that the old English epic poem Beowulf narrates, according to Gregory (c 540 –94), Bishop of Tours, the events of the sixth century Merovingian period of French history. The Geatish king Hygelac in Beowulf has been identified with 'Chociliacus' (in Latin), a Scandinavian leader, who conducted a raid in 520 against the Frisian territory of the Franks. While the event that Beowulf narrates took place in the sixth century the poem was actually written in the tenth.

The epic narrates two major events in the life of the Geatish hero Beowulf son of Ecgtheow: the first when in his youth, he fights and kills Grendel who has been attacking Heorot, the hall of the Danish king Hrothgar. Next night Grendel's mother merewif (sea woman) or brymwylf (sea wolf) or grundwyrge (ground monster), etc. as she is called, comes to avenge her son but meets the same fate. Beowulf is suitably feasted and rewarded and returns to his own land. Beowulf later himself becomes king of the Geats and has a prosperous reign of forty years when he slays a dragon which has ravaged his land but in the fight receives a mortal wound. The poem ends with the funeral ceremonies in honour of the dead hero. There is a strong thread of Christian commentary that runs through the poem and scholars are of the view that the poem was written in the eighth century when England was being won over by Christianity, seemingly inappropriate to the date of the historical events it describes.

Two other poems that refer to the pre-Christian age are 'Widsith' (i.e. 'the far traveller') and 'Deor.' The former dates substantially from the seventh century and is thus the earliest poem in the English language. It is constructed around three 'thulas' (i.e. mnemonic name lists) connected by the events in the life of the eponymous minstrel. The first names the great rulers; the second the tribes among whom the minstrel travelled and the third the people the minstrel claimed to have sought out.

'The Lament of Deor' records the effusions of a minstrel who has fallen out of favour and who consoles himself in 42 lines of seven unequal sections with the refrain, 'His sorrow passed away so will mine.' Deor recalls the past misfortunes of Wayland the Smith, Theodoric and Hermanric. 'Deor' unlike other elegies in Old English does not end with a Christian consolation.

'Waldere' or 'Waldhere' consists of two fragments in 63 lines which must have been part of a longer poem. Waldere was the son of a king of Aquitaine. He was given up to Atilla the Hun and became one of his generals. He later eloped with Hiltgund, a Burgundian princess, to whom he had been betrothed as a child. In the course of their flight they were attacked by assailants whom Waldere defeated but received injury as well. Waldere and Hiltgund continued their journey and were finally married.

'[I]t was in their war songs' wrote Emile Legouis that the Anglo-Saxons best retained the vestiges of their wild, primitive mood, especially in those which celebrated their own battles.' Most prominent among such 'songs' are 'The Battle of Brunanburh' and 'The Battle of Maldon'. The former narrates the battle fought between the English under Athelstan, grandson of Alfred (849–99), and the Danes under Anlaf who came from Dublin supported by the Scots and the Welsh. The poem celebrates the victory of Athelstan and his brother and successor Edmund in their defeat of the invaders.

'The Battle of Maldon' deals with the battle fought between the Danes and Byrhtnoth (c. 926–91) who rejects the demand for tribute by the former. The English are defeated partly because some of his men flee but partly also because of Byrhtnoth's 'ofermod', his excessive pride in yielding ground to the Danes as a gesture of magnanimity. The latter half of the 325-line poem concerns itself with the loyalty of the followers of Byrhtnoth to their dead leader who vow to avenge his death.

The poetry of Old English or Early Postclassical period falls into two divisions – the pre-Christian and Christian. The former represents the poetry which the Anglo-Saxons brought with them in the form of oral sagas; the latter represents the poetry developed under the teaching of the monks. The old pagan religion had vanished but it retained its hold on the life and language of the people. I have briefly described the pre-Christian poetry that is vigorous and varied. Let's now turn to the poetry on Christian themes, though large in quantity, as preserved by the clerks - clergymen of the five minor orders as distinct from the higher or 'holy orders' - which are derivative in nature and thus of relatively inferior quality.

One of the salutary influences of the spread of Christianity in England was that it gave the people some relief from the frightful wars that were fought between the petty kingdoms of the Anglo-Saxons. The conversions of the English to Christianity was led by Augustine (d. between 604 -609) from Rome who founded a monastery at Canterbury. He is not the same as St. Augustine (354-430) bishop of Hippo in North Africa and author of City of God (413-27) and the autobiographical Confessions. The former Augustine was prior of Pope Gregory's monastery of St. Andrew in Rome. (A prior is a superior officer at a religious house or order.) Augustine was sent by Gregory with some forty monks, in 596, to preach in England. He was received by King Ethelbert of Kent who was later converted. The Augustinians spread the new religion in the South and center of England, especially in the Kingdom of Essex. They, however, produced no literature of lasting value.

St. Aidan (d. 651) came to Northumbria from Ireland which country had been a center of Christianity and education for all Western Europe. The Northumbrian School was centred mainly at the monasteries and abbeys at Jarrow and Whitby and the three great figures of Anglo-Saxon age produced by them were Bede (673-735), Caedmon (7th c.) and Cynewulf (8th c.).

Venerable Bede, as he is generally called, has been hailed as the father of English learning. He wrote more than forty tracts in Latin. His translation of the gospel of St. John into Anglo-Saxon has been lost. His most frequently cited work is the Ecclesiastical History of the English People. We know of Caedmon the Anglo-Saxon Milton, from Bede's account of Abbess Hilda at the monastery at Whitby where Caedmon was a layman and until maturity never learned any poetry. Once in a dream someone stood by and said, 'Caedmon sing me something' and Caedmon answered 'I cannot sing.' But according to Bede's history the person said to him again, 'Caedmon, sing to me.' And he asked, 'What shall I sing?' and he answered, 'Sing the beginning of created things.' And Caedmon began singing in his sleep. Next morning Caedmon narrated his story to the steward of the monastery who conveyed it to the Abbess Hilda. She called him to her presence and asked him to relate his tale to her. After hearing him she arranged, it is said, to have the Bible explained to him in bits which he then converted into songs in his native tongue. The Paraphrase attributed to him is, however, not entirely his creation. Another important work of the school of Caedmon is Judith based on an apocryphal book of the Old Testament.

The only one of the Anglo-Saxon poets who signed his works was Cynewulf. The name, however, was not written plainly but in runes - characters of the early Teutonic alphabet used extensively by the Scandinavians and Anglo-Saxons. The script dates from the 2nd or 3rd century. It is based on Roman or Greek letters adapted to be inscribed on wood or stone. The only poems signed by Cynewulf are Christ II, Juliana, The Fates of Apostles and, Elene. The poems attributed to him or his school are Andreas, the Phoenix, the Dream of the Rood, the Descent into Hell, Guthlac, the Wanderer and, a few Riddles. Some of the riddles, such as 'The Storm Spirit' and 'The Swan', are of unusual beauty. Below are lines of the 'The Swan' in Brougham's translation:

My robe is noiseless while I tread the earth,
Or tarry 'neath the banks, or stir the shallows,
But when these shining wings, this depth of air,
Bear me aloft above the bending shores
Where men abide, and far the welkin's strength
Over the multitudes conveys me, then
With rushing whirl and clear melodious sound
My raiment sings. And like a wandering spirit
I float unweariedly o'er flood and field.

Of the four of Cynewulf's poems The Christ has been considered the most characteristic of him. It is a poem in three parts: the first celebrates the Nativity or birth of Jesus; the second, 'His Ascension' and the third, 'Doomsday' narrating the torments of the wicked and the endless joy of the redeemed. The poem reflects Cynewulf's love for Christ and his reverence for the Virgin Mary. Elene is the story of St. Helena, the mother of Constantine (274–337), the Roman emperor (306–37) who converted to Christianity and transferred the capital of the empire to Byzantium which he renamed Constantinople. In Elene Cynewulf tells us about Constantine's vision of the Rood or Christ's Cross on the eve of a battle. After his victory he sends his mother Helena to Jerusalem to search for the original cross and the nails. '[I]t is' writes Emile Legouis, 'to see in [Cynewulf] the author of The Dream of the Rood, since such a dream is said to have determined his conversion'. There is an intimation here of the theme of the search for the Holy Grail in the literature of the succeeding period.

This flowering of Northumbrian literature came to an untimely end towards the end of the eighth century by the conquest of the Danes. The few fragments that are preserved are the work of Alfred (849–901) the great Anglo-Saxon king who preserved the poetry of the Northumbrians in the dialect of the West Saxons.

Edward the Confessor (1042–66) died heirless on 5 January, 1066. The Witan, the Assembly of Wise Men, elected Harold, son of Godwin, to the throne. Now Edward was more of a Norman than English. He came to the throne at the age of thirty-five but he had spent twenty-five years of this period continuously in Normandy, France. He was at least as familiar with Norman speech and customs as with English and gave preferment to people of Norman origin in the offices of the Church and government. Godwin was a Saxon but he and his sons often behaved quite irresponsibly and so they were unpopular. Duke William of Normandy had come to see Edward, his cousin, and got an assurance that he would succeed him to the throne. The Norman party at Edward's court supported this move. Before Edward died Godwin had been put to death and so his son gained the throne in January 1066. At this time William of Normandy Conquered Britain and declared himself king.

The Normans were Northmen, the Danes who had settled in the North-West of France and quickly adopted their language, culture and habits. Under Norman influence Anglo-Saxon was simplified to modern English by losing many declensions. Here we are interested in primarily the poetry of the period, i.e. 1066 to 1350. 'Homilies, sermons in prose and in verse, translation of the Psalms or parts of the Bible, rules for a devout life, lives of the saints, and prayers' wrote Emile Legouis, 'fill the pages which form the mass of what may be called English literature until about the middle of the fourteenth century.'

About 1200 an Augustinian canon called Orm in the East Midland wrote a voluminous poem he called after himself The Ormulum. It constitutes of paraphrases of the gospels, around 1105 Moral Odes and Proverbs of Alfred and in the first half of the thirteenth century Orison to our Lady, Genesis and Exodus and Proverbs of Hendyng were composed.

Geoffrey of Monmouth (d. 1155) probably a Benedictine monk of Monmouth at Oxford in his Historia Regum Britanniae (c. 1136) narrates the history of Britain from the time of Brutus, great-grandson of Aeneas to Cadwallader (AD 689) the last of the British Kings of England after whom the British would be called Welsh (foreign). This work influenced Layamon's Brut (c. 1200), the most important of the English rhyming chronicles. It marks the first appearance of the Arthurian legend in English.

Metrical romances with their celebration of courtly love, Chivalry and religion distinguishes the century and a half before Chaucer from other periods. However, the most outstanding work of the genre in English was Sir Thomas Malory's (d 1471) Le Morte D' Arthur (1470) published by William Caxton (c. 1422–91) in 1485.

Metrical romance was brought to England by the Normans. It soon became so popular that it overshadowed all other forms of literary expression. Romances are long poems or series of poems treating of love or knightly adventure or both. Its characters are ladies in distress, warriors in armour, giants, dragons, enchanters and enemies of the Church and State. The enormous number of these verse romances are divided, according to subject, into the so called matter of France, Rome and, Britain.

The matter of France centres largely around Charlemagne (742–814) king of the Franks (768). He and his Paladins are the subject of several chasons de geste, or epic poems in old French, of which Chason de Roland is the most famous. The Paladins were the twelve peers of Charlemagne. The Paladins were brave warriors under the leadership of Roland and Oliver. All of them perish in Roncesvalles. Roland was the most famous of the Paladins of Charlemagne. Einhard (?770–? 840), a Frankish noble in the service of Charlemagne, who wrote the famous biography of the emperor, Vita Caroli Magni narrates the event of August 778.

The rearguard of the French army of the emperor was returning through the Pyrenees from a successful expedition in the north of Spain when it was surprised in the valley of Roncesvalles by the Basque inhabitants of the mountains. The baggage was looted and the rearguard killed.

In later retelling of the story - chanson de geste or 'song of heroic deeds' - beginning in the late eleventh and early twelfth centuries the Basques were replaced by the Muslims or the Saracen, as they were called by the Europeans, in the La Chanson de Roland or The Song of Roland (1040–1115).

Roland, the commander of the rearguard, is appointed at the behest of the traitor Ganelon, who is in league with Marsile the Saracen King. Now Oliver is introduced as Roland's companion in arms. He is brother of Aude, Roland's betrothed. Oliver thrice calls upon Roland to summon aid by blowing his horn but Roland from excess of pride defers doing so until it is too late. However, Charlemagne returns and destroys the Saracen army. Ganelon is tried and executed.

Jean Boedel a late twelfth-century romance writer divided the vast literature of the genre into three categories, i.e. the Matter of France, Rome and Britain.

While the literature on the theme of Charlemagne and his circle was ‘The Matter of France’ that on King Arthur and his Knights of the Round Table was called ‘The Matter of Britain’. The interesting thing about the legend of Arthur, Gawain, Launcelot, Merlin, the quest of the Holy Grail, etc. are Celtic in origin, their literary form is due to French poets who originated the metrical romances. The English romances are their copies or translations of the French. This is true not only of the matter of France or of Britain as pointed out above but also of Rome, i.e. cycles of romances dealing with the deeds of Alexander and the siege of Troy with which the Britons thought they had some connection. In the twentieth century English scholars, diverging from Jean Boedel’s classification of the metrical romances, called romances concerned with English heroes such as King Horn (c. 1225), or Havelok the Dane (before 1272) Matter of England.

The English author of Cursor Mundi (c. 1320), a poetical work of pseudo–history and hagiography covering mankind’s spiritual history from the Creation to the Last Judgment, divided into seven ages, testified to the popularity of these romances in his work:

Men yernen jestis for to here
And romances rede in diverse manere

The author then went on to summarize the great cycles of romances in his own work.

The romances came into existence in England owing to the French and were thus an upper class phenomenon but here and there were singers who made ballads for the common people. Next to the romances these ballads are the most significant of the works of the Norman period. The ballads alone give us an insight into the lives and aspiration, fears and hopes of the common people. However, on account of its obscure origin and oral transmission the ballads are the most difficult of literary topics to discuss. Some of these, such as ‘Merrie greenwood men’ got assimilated into the Geste of Robin Hood. ‘All literature’ wrote William Long, ‘is but a dream expressed, and “Robin Hood” is the dream of an ignorant and oppressed but essentially noble people, struggling and determined to be free.’

Older than Havelok and Horn was The Owl and the Nightingale written in imitation of the disputoisons or tensons of the poets of Provence. Tensons or Tenzons were contests in verse making by the troubadours, i.e. the epic poets in northern France. The poem in 1794 lines is a debate between the grave owl and the gay nightingale who represent the religious and the love poets respectively. It is a learned poem touching on scholastic legalism on issues of contemporary interests such as foreknowledge, music, confession, papal missions, etc. Contrary to the serious tone of The Owl and the Nightingale Medieval lyrics of the age of Edward I (1272–1307) such as ‘Alysoun’, ‘Springtime’ (c. 1300) and ‘Cuckoo Song’, though still inspired by French models, are more interesting than the romances and the ballads. The graceful ‘Alysoun’ has stanzas of mixed three and four-accented lines that have rhymes repeated even five times:

Bytuene Mersh and Averil,
When spray biginneth to springe,
The lutel foul¹ hath hire wyl
On hyre lud² to synge.
Iche libbe³ in love loginge
For semlokest⁴ of all thinge.
She may me blisse bringe;
Icham⁵ in hire baundoun⁶.

An hendy hap ichabbe yhent⁷,
Ichot⁸ from hevene it is me sent,
From alle wymmen mi love is lent⁹
And lyht¹⁰ on Alysoun.

[Glossary: ¹Little bird. ²in her language. ³I live. ⁴fairest. ⁵I am. ⁶power, bondage ⁷a pleasant fate I have attained. ⁸I know. ⁹gone. ¹⁰lit, alighted.]

These lines herald the coming of Geoffrey Chaucer as also does the felicitous ‘Cuckoo Song’ with its yet freer and native rhythms:

Sumer is icumen in,
Lhude sing cuccu,
Groweth sed and bloweth med,
And springth the wde nu,
Sing Cuccu.

Awe bleteth after lomb,
Lhouth after calve cu.
Bullucsterleth, buckeverteth,
Murie sing cuccu.
Cuccu, cuccu.
Wel singes thu, cuccu
Ne swikethunaver nu.

The poet observes in the first stanza that summer has come in and so he beckons the cuckoo to sing loudly. The poet again observes the seeds sprouting and the meadows blossoming and the wood springing with its new foliage and the poet summons the cuckoo to sing.

In the second stanza the poet describes the ewe bleating after the lamb and the cow lowing after the calf, the bullock receiving new sensation in its body and the deer breaking wind and so the poet makes a mute signal to the cuckoo to never ‘swike’ or cease to sing ‘now’ (nu).

Political songs began to appear from the middle of the thirteenth century. At first they were written in Latin and French by the clerks (or clergymen) and meant for the ruling class but very soon the minstrels began to compose them for the people and therefore in English. These songs, such as Song of the Husbandman sided with the people and against their governors.

During the reign of Edward III (1327-77) these lays burst into songs of triumph. Laurence Minot, probably a soldier, came forward as an official bard to Edward to sing his victories in Scotland and France. ‘The great victories of Edward III’ wrote Emile Legouis, ‘were being sung in London, and Minot’s poems were current in the country side when Chaucer was born and when his mind received its first impressions.’ The historians of English literature went on,

Glory in the field of battle was followed by literary achievement as brilliant. The long period of dependence was about to end. The English language, which had hitherto coned what others said, often stammering the while, now had faith in its destiny. Nothing is more striking than the number, the originality, and the worth of the works which made the latter half of the fourteenth century a flowering season in English literature.

The reference is to the dependence of the English on French literature which was now on its way out just as on the battlefield Edward's forces won victories at Crecy (1346) and Poitiers (1356) against France. At the treaty of Bretigny (1360) France admitted the English claim to the South-West of France. 'To con' is to 'peruse', 'scrutinize' and 'learn (by heart)'. Legouis has admirably summed up the end of a period and advent of the age of Chaucer.

Geoffrey Chaucer (1340?–1400) is definitely the most prominent poet of the latter half of fourteenth century and among the greatest poets in English poetry but there were other prominent figures round about him. Among them were William Langland (c 1332–c 1386) the author of Piers Plowman, the anonymous author of the Cotton Nero A x manuscript, popularly known as the Pearl Poet, John Gower (? 1330–1408) and, John Barbour (c. 1320–95).

Chaucer was son of John Chaucer (c. 1312–'68) a London vintner. In 1359 he was in France with Edward III's invading army, taken prisoner but ransomed by the king. He married Philippa sister of John of Gaunt's third wife. Philippa died in 1387 but Chaucer enjoyed Gaunt's patronage throughout his life. He made a journey to Genoa and Florence in 1372–3 in the course of which he could have met Boccaccio (1313–75) and Petrarch (1304–74). In 1378 he was sent to France and Lombardy.

Chaucer's writings develop through his career from a period of French influence in the late 1360s of which the culmination was The Book of The Duchess (1369?). The 'middle period' of Chaucer's poetry is dominated by the Italian influence as reflected in The Hous of Fame and Troilus and Criseyde. The Canterbury Tales (1307) Chaucer's most celebrated work in 17000 lines is a product of his 'English period', the last phase. 'Alone among his contemporaries' wrote Legouis, 'Chaucer put art first'. They went on, 'He did not seek to direct men, to judge events, to reform morals, or to present a philosophy. Poetry was his only object'.

Quite unlike Chaucer was William Langland whose Piers Plowman which first appeared in 1362 as a poem in 1800 lines, is a clarion call to every man, king, priest, noble or labourer to do his Christian duty. Piers Plowman is an allegory. In the first vision of the 'Field Full of Folk' we see Piers lying down on the Malvern Hills when a vision comes to him in sleep. He sees a crowd expressing the varied life of the world. The genius of the throng is Lady Bribery who stands for the corruption in her society. Langland's narration has force and vigour:

In a somer sesun, whon softe was the sonne,
I schop¹ me into a shroud, as I a scheep were,
In habite as an hermite, unholy of werkes,
Went wyde in this world, wonders to here,
Bote in a Mayes mornynge, on Malverne hulle,
Me byfel a ferly², of fairie me thought,
I was wery, forwanddred, and went me to reste
Undur a brod banke, bi a bourne³ side;
And as I lay and lened, and loked on the waters,
I slumbred in slepyng – hit swyed⁴ so murie...

John Gower was a friend of Chaucer and a dedicatee along with Ralph Strode, fellow of Merton College, Oxford of the latter's Troilus and Criseyde. Gower wrote in three languages, French, Latin and, English. He wrote Cinkante Balades and his first large scale work Mirour de l' Omme (Speculum Meditantis in c. 1376–8) in Anglo-Norman. His second major work, even more ambitious than the previous one, was Vox Clamantis (c. 1379–81) in Latin. Confessio Amantis (1390s) his principal work was in English. It is a collection of 141 stories in over 33000 octosyllabic couplets. The frame story is the confession of a lover, Amans, to Genius, a priest of Venus. The confessor helps to examine the lover's conscience by telling him exemplary stories of behaviour and fortune in love. However, Gower's stories lack the development and scope of Chaucer's. 'Gower' wrote Legouis, 'learned, industrious, and copious, is the typical average poet of his century. His writings are what Chaucer's might have been without Chaucer's genius.'

John Barbour was a Scottish poet and Archdeacon of Aberdeen in 1357. The only poem ascribed to him with certainty is The Bruce or The Actes and Life of the Most Victorious Conquerour, Robert Bruce King of Scotland (1376) a long poem in 13000 lines. It is the national poem of Scotland just as Chason de Roland is of France. The poem is animated by the spirit of freedom, independence and patriotism that Bruce stood for. Like Maharana Pratap and Shivaji Maharaj in India Bruce led the life of a hunted beast, hiding in the mountains and forestalling the traps laid for him until in 1314 he completely routed the English under Edward II at Bannockburn, near Stirling and secured the independence of Scotland. However, The Bruce was written at a time when the glory of Bannockburn had been tarnished by sanguinary defeats. Barbour's message to his nation was that freedom is of greater value 'than all the gold in world that is' and that 'He levys at es that frely levys' (He lives at ease who freely lives.)

There is no indication of the authorship of four remarkably beautiful poems – Sir Gawayne and the Grene Knyght, Pearl, Purity and Patience – preserved in a manuscript (Cotton Nero A x) in the British Library (formerly British Museum). They are written in West Midland dialect spoken in Lancashire. Historians date it in the third quarter of the fourteenth century. Sir Gawayne and the Grene Knyght is in Edward Albert's view 'without doubt the finest of all the Middle English romances, for its mastery of plot handling, its realism, characterization, descriptive powers and use of the alliterative long line.' It is the only secular work in the collection. It owes much to the Arthurian romances, and especially to the Perceval or Le Conte du Graal (1181–90) of Chrestien de Troyes (fl. 1170-90).

Pearl was the author's daughter who died when she was two years old and the poem in her memory is a vision of paradise. Purity deals with three topics from the Scriptures: the Flood, the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah and, the fall of Belshazzar. Patience recounts the story of Jonah a bit humorously. Both Purity and Patience are in alliterative verse but without rhyme or stanzas.

England produced no poet worthy to rank with Chaucer for two centuries. In this period, i.e. 1400 – 1550, 'Miserly Nature', as Emile Legouis pointed out, 'created only imitators and reiterators of outworn themes.' 'The sense of the beautiful' Legouis went on, 'seems to have died with the sense of life and of reality.' Chaucer's successors in the fifteenth century were his disciples but they were aware how far below him they were in poetic inspiration and execution. Thomas Hoccleve or Hoccleve admitted,

Fader Chaucer fayne wold han me taught,
But I was dul, and learned lite or nought

The sentiment was repeated by John Lydgate who held that no poet in his time was left 'that worthy was his ynkehorne for to hold'.

Very little is known, except what can be gathered from his writings, about

Thomas Occleve (1370?–1454?). He led a life of debauchery in his youth and none was known better to the tavern keepers and cook-shops in Westminster. He became a clerk in Privy Seal office, from which he retired on a pension to Hampshire in 1424. Occleve was the author of Letter of Cupid, long ascribed to Chaucer. La Male Regle de T. Occleve is a sort of confession of his debauched life. His principal work De Regimine Principum was written in 1411-12 to win the favours of the Prince of Wales, later Henry V. It is a series of lessons on conduct. It is an imitation of the work of Roman Aegidius of the same title written for Philip the Fair.

The dates of John Lydgate (1370–1451) are only approximately fixed. Lydgate was a friend of Chaucer. He became a monk at Bury St Edmunds where he rose to become a priest in 1397. He had a wide reputation in his time both as a scholar and poet but the enormous mass of his poems enhance their futility. About 1,40,000 lines of verse, authentically his, are extant. The Fall of Princes, full of platitudes, is 7000 verses long. The Temple of Glas is shorter and so is Story of Thebes a supposed addition to The Canterbury Tales. The authorship of London Lick penny the most popular of the poems ascribed to him is uncertain. The Complaint of the Black Knight has a few pleasant descriptions of nature but this Benedictine monk could hardly lift his eyes from books and these pictures have been, as pointed out by E. Legouis, lifted from them.

John Skelton, Alexander Barclay and Stephen Hawes come rather late in this period but they represent variously rather the last stirrings of the dying Medieval period than the early signs of life of the Renaissance. John Skelton (1406?–1529) earned praise from Erasmus as a learned humanist. He was tutor to the future Henry VIII and rector of Diss in Norfolk. Skelton found heroic verse of his time debased and instead of reforming it wrote loose octosyllabic couplets rhyming more than a dozen times. Skelton was aware of his faults but his aim was to strike hard and straight:

Though my rime be ragged,
Tatter'd and jagged,
Rudely raine-beaten,
Rusty and moth-eaten;
If ye take wel therewith,
It hath in it some pith,

Skelton's pith is mostly satire. In an age of dull repetitions Skelton's pleases owing to his brutality and coarseness. Some of his most interesting poems are The Bowge of Court, The Boke of Colin Clout and, Why Come ye not to Court?

The Bowge of Court (1509?) reminds us of The Ship of Fools. It is an allegory. The poet is on board a magnificent ship which is to take him to the land of favour. However, the voyage is troubled by Fortune's friends, Flattery, Suspicion, Disdain and Dissimulation, who conspire against him and he is about to throw himself into the waters when he wakes up.

In Colin Clout (1519) reminiscent of Piers Plowman, Skelton chastises the vices of the clergy.

Why come ye not to Court? (1522) is an indictment of cardinal Wolsey the all-powerful minister of Henry VIII:

He ruleth all at will,
Without reason or skill;
Howbeit the primordial,

Of his wretched original
And his base progeny,
And his greasy genealogy,
He came of the sank royal
That was cast out of a butcher's stall.

Skelton did not hesitate to castigate Wolsey's 'sank' or 'blood' royal.

Alexander Barclay (1474-1552) a Dominican and a Latinist was more a translator than a poet. He in 1509 translated the Strasbourg poet Sebastian Brant's Ship of Fools not directly but through his Latin and French translations. It is a fiction of a ship in which all fools are invited to embark. This gives the poet an opportunity to review diverse kinds of eccentricities and follies of mankind. Barclay added some peculiarly English types to the crew. Certayne Ecloges (1541) another of Barclay's works is the earliest English collection of pastorals. Barclay's language is rude and his verse is unrhythmical.

Stephen Hawes (1457-1523) is the most uninspired of the poets of this period. He lived mainly by his Example of Vertue (1503-4) and the better known The Pastime of Pleasure, or Histories of Graunde Amoure and La Belle Pucel (1505-6). Both works are allegorical in character with the then-obsolete spirit of romance. 'In general' wrote Legouis, 'Hawe's style, sometimes aggrandized by Latinized words, sometimes entangled by awkward constructions, is the worst known to English poetry'.

Chaucer's personal influence was dominant as much in Scotland in this period, i.e. 1400-1550, as it was in England but the Scot, as Legouis has pointed out, 'had a vitality which contrasted happily with English languor.' 'This' Legouis goes on, 'is the most glorious period of all their old poetry.'

If we look for the patriotic impulse in the manner of Barbour in The Bruce we can find it only in the Wallace (c. 1416) of Blind Harry, a minstrel. The fabulous element is much larger in the latter poem than in the former, for Blind Harry was writing about a hero who lived hundred and fifty years before him but both poets tell their tales in naked simplicity and monotonously. Blind Harry, however, heightens by contrast, the ornate and brilliant character of the verse of this period.

Chronologically the first Scottish poet to be influenced by Chaucer was King James I (1394-1436). He was taken prisoner by the English for nineteen years at the age of eleven along with his ship that was carrying him to France. However, he was honourably treated and properly educated by them. During his captivity James fell in love with Lady Jane Beaufort, niece to Henry IV, whom he married in 1424. The Kingis Quair (quire or book) written during his captivity describes his first sight of the lady who was destined to be his wife, who had in James's words, 'Beautee eneuch to mak a world to dote.'

The Dunfermline schoolmaster Robert Henryson (1452-1500) read and admired Chaucer's Troilus and Criseyde but was shocked by the conclusion of the story. How could the faithful Troilus be killed and the fickle Criseyde be happy with Diomedes? he wondered, 'Quha wait gif all that Chaucer wrait was trew?' (Who knows if all that Chaucer wrote was true?) So Henryson decided to recast the conclusion of the story and wrote The Testament of Cresseid.

Henryson's Diomedes soon deserts Cresseid and she is afflicted by Heaven with leprosy. She goes begging from door to door begging with her 'cop and clapper'. One day Troilus, who is returning from a glorious expedition, passes near the place where she sits and gives her a generous alms in memory of his 'fair Cresseid'. When she learns from the other leper folk about the giver of the alms she falls to the ground. She writes her testament before her death in which she bequeaths her body to the worms and toads and all her goods to the lepers, save her ring set with a ruby, which is to be carried to Troylus after her death. When he receives it and hears her story his heart bleeds for his Cresseid and he has 'ane tomb of merbell gray', to be raised above her grave. While Henryson was a moralist and wished to set the horrible chastisement for the Cresseids of this world his morality was penetrated with sympathy and humanity.

Henryson was a prolific poet. The longest of his poems is the Moral Fabillis of Esope. Orpheus and Eurydice is an adaptation from Boethius. 'Robene and Makyne' and 'Garmond of Gude Ladies' are two better known of his thirteen lyrics.

William Dunbar (1406?–1520?) is considered the chief of the Scottish Chaucerian poets. He did not have Chaucer's or Henryson's gift of observation but he had virtuosity of style and versification. In Legouis' words, 'He dazzles the eyes and ravishes the ears.' The Thrissil and the Rois is meant to commemorate the marriage of Margaret Tudor daughter of Henry VII to James IV of Scotland in 1503. The Golden Targe is an allegory in which the poet is accused by Dame Beauty and defended by Reason who shields him with a golden targe or Shield. His Dance of the Sevin Deadly Synnis does not offer 'either propriety of details or religious horror of vice'. 'It has' in Legouis' words, 'instead the marks of a strange coarseness, and is fuller of buffoonery than of edification.'

Dunbar began as a Franciscan friar who was unfrocked. He was at one time a wandering preacher, sent by James IV on embassies to London and Paris. In 'How Dunbar was desired to be ane freir' he sees a demon in the guise of saint Francis who brings him the habit of his order to whom he explains why it does not please him to resume it. Dunbar sharpens his barbs against the Franciscans in 'The Tournament' which is in the form of an apology to the guild of traitors who have complained of his ridicule.

In Lament for the Makaris he names the poets of his country and of England who have died.

Dunbar was a commoner but Gavin Douglas (1475?–1522?) was a member of the famous Douglas family, his father being the fifth Earl of Angus, Archibald 'Bell the Cat'. Gavin Douglas became a priest and, rose to be Bishop of Dunkeld. He participated in the high politics of his time, but after the disaster of Flodden in 1513, lost his bishopric, was expelled to England and quietly passed away in London. His Palice of Honour (1501) was written when Douglas was twentysix. It was an imitation of Chaucer's Hous of Fame. King Hart exhibits a cunning mingling of humour and melancholy in which King Hart or Heart is made captive by Dame Pleasance, and delivered by Dame Pietie. However Hart marries Pleasance but after seven years when Age knocks at the palace of Pleasance all the courtiers flee and are at last followed by the dame herself. Reason and wit then advise the king to return to his own castle where before long he is assailed by an army of Decrepitude. Heart makes an ironic testament before his death.

Douglas has a greater claim to fame for his translation of Virgil (1512–13) into verse. Chaucer did indeed translate a few fragments but they are a poor performance. Caxton had published a prose version of Virgil but it was really a medieval romance and Douglas opined,

It has nathing ado tharwith, god wait,
Ne an mair than the devil and Sanct Austyne,

The most curious parts of Douglas's Virgil are the prologues to the various books. Description of winter begins the seventh book and one of spring opens the twelfth. Douglas's poetic abilities are evident in his faithfulness to nature and prodigality of detail.

Sir David Lyndsay (1490–1555) is the last of the Scottish poets of the fifteenth century. On the one hand he was an associate of John Knox (1505–72), the Protestant religious reformer and, on the other also a companion of James V who gave him the heraldic office of Lyon King of Arms.

His Ane Pleasant Satyre of the three Estaitis is a morality play. In The Dreame (1528) Lyndsay descends into Hell where he sees popes, kings, cardinals and archbishops being chastised for their ambition which kept them from succouring the poor. The Monarchie, or Ane Dialog of the Miserable Estait of this World (1552) was Lyndsay's most considerable poem. 'Lyndsay' according to Legouis, 'has nothing of the poet except metre, but his brutal satire strikes hard and multiplies blows without flinching.'

The years 1400 – 1550 appears to be a sterile period in terms of literary productions as most of the poets appeared to be poor imitators of Chaucer. However, this era has also sometimes been called a period of preparation for the Renaissance. The work that would most eminently fall under that rubric is Richard Tottel (c. 1519–c. 1562) and Nicholas Grimald's compilation Songes and Sonnettes (1557) better known as Tottel's Miscellany. Its popularity can be gaged from the fact that Slender in The Merry Wives of Windsor by Shakespeare would have Tottel's 'book of songs and sonnets' with him while courting Anne Page than forty shillings and the grave digger in Hamlet mumbles Vaux's song from the same collection. Tottel's Miscellany contains the chief works of Wyatt and Surrey.

Sir Thomas Wyatt (1503–42) held several diplomatic positions in the service of Henry VIII, in France, Italy, Spain and, the Netherlands. It is probable that during his visit in 1527 to Italy he got the idea of translating and imitating Petrarch in his works, especially his sonnets. The sonnet in English became the principal vehicle for the direct expression of personal feeling without recourse to fiction or allegory. Of Wyatt's ninety-six love poems in the Miscellany the most noteworthy are the thirty-one sonnets, the first in English. Ten of these were translations from Petrarch while all were written in the Petrarchan form, apart from the concluding couplet which Wyatt introduced.

Henry Howard, (by courtesy) Earl of Surrey (1517–47) also like Wyatt studied Italian models, especially Petrarch, but his sonnets were predominantly in the 'English' form (abab cdcd efef gg) which was later used by Shakespeare. Forty of his poems were published in Tottel's Miscellany, ten years after his death. A still more durable innovation of Surrey was his use of 'blank verse' in his Certain Bokes of Virgiles Aeneis turned into English Meter (1557), a translation of the second and fourth books of the Aeneid.

The two poets, Wyatt and Surrey, were much in advance of their times and a whole generation passed before their lead was followed. The two poets of their time who deserve mention are Thomas Sackville (1536– 1608) and George Gascoigne (1525?–77). Sackville's only contribution to poetry was his 'Induction' to be followed by 'The Complaint of the Duke of Buckingham' written in 1563 for A Mirror for Magistrates a work planned originally by George Ferrers and William Baldwin. George Gascoigne was a soldier in the Netherlands, from 1572 to 74 spending four months as a prisoner of the Spanish. His poems and plays were published during his absence, as A Hundreth Sundrie Flowers (1573). This was supposedly without his authority. On his return he brought out a corrected and enhanced version under the title The Poesie of George Gascoigne. His Certayne notes of Instruction concerning the making of verse or ryme in English is a pioneering account of English versification. His The Steele Glas (1576) is a satire in verse, Gascoigne's only work still read with interest.

Baldassare Castiglione (1478–1529) the Italian humanist – known chiefly for his prose dialogues Il libro del cortegian (1528), translated into English as The Courtier (1561), discusses the qualities of the ideal courtier. It had much influence on English literature, namely on Wyatt, Surrey, Sidney, Spenser, Shakespeare and W.B. Yeats. Yeats laments the 'soldier, scholar, horseman' in his 'In Memory of Major Robert Gregory' who was to Yeats 'our Sidney and our perfect man'.

Sir Philip Sidney (1554–86) was the most commanding literary figure before Spenser and Shakespeare. He took a brilliant part in the military, courtly and literary life of his time. However, all his writings were published after his decease at the early age of 32 at Zutphen on the battlefield while assisting the Dutch against the Spaniards.

His finest achievement was his 108 love sonnets, the Astrophel and Stella (1591) addressed to Penelope Devereux daughter of the Earl of Essex. She is his 'Stella' or 'star' while he is the 'astrophel' or 'lover of the star'. These sonnets owe much to Petrarch (1304–74) and Ronsard (1524–85), the French poet, leader of the Pleiade. Sidney dedicated Astrophel and Stella to his wife Frances (daughter of Sir Francis Walsingham). These made Sidney the greatest Elizabethan sonneteer except Shakespeare.

Sidney's Apologie for Poetrie (1595) has taken its place among the most memorable critical essays in English. In it Sidney defends poetry as greater than history or philosophy. While assessing Sidney we must remember that he wrote before most of the great poets and any of the Elizabethan dramatists had published their works.

Since Sir Philip Sidney's works were published after his death, Edmund Spenser (1552–99) took precedence over him in revealing poetic beauty to his generation. Edmund Spenser (c. 1552–99) was born at East Smithfield, near the Tower of London and was educated at Merchant Taylors' school founded in 1561 to which the dramatist Thomas Kyd (or kid 1558–94), Lancelot Andrewes (1555–1626) one of the divines appointed to translate the Bible, known as the Authorized Version of 1611 and, Thomas Lodge (1558–1625) traveller, explorer and author of Rosalynde (1590) his best known romance, also went. Richard Mulcaster (c. 1530–1611) was its first eminent headmaster who later became high master of St. Paul's.

Spenser studied also at Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, as poor sizar and fag for wealthy students. At Cambridge he read the great Italian and French poets and wrote several poems of his own. His sonnets in imitation of the Italian Petrarch (1304–74) and the French Joachim Du Bellay (1522–60) author in 1549–50 of the first sonnet sequence L' Olive in French, he contributed to van der Noodt's Theatre for Worldlings (1569). Spenser's The Vision of Bellay later also appeared in the Complaints of 1591. Chaucer whom Spenser called 'well of English undefyled' here became his beloved master, but his ambition was to express the dream of English chivalry as Ariosto (1474–1535) had done for Italy in Orlando Furioso (1532).

Spenser left Cambridge in 1576 and went to the north of England on what occupation or quest it is not known. It is not improbable that there, in his youth he fell in love and began to record his melancholy over the lost Rosalind in The Shepheardes Calender. In 1578 he became secretary to John Young, Bishop of Rochester. In 1579 on the invitation of his college friend Gabriel Harvey (c. 1550–1631) he went to London with his poems. Harvey introduced him to the Earl of Leicester who invited him to live in his house. At Leicester House Spenser came in contact with Sir Philip Sidney to whom he dedicated his Shepheardes Calender (1579). 'For the England of 1579' wrote Emile Legouis,

'lagging behind the continent, seeing the Renaissance flower there while she remained sterile, the appearance of the Shepheardes Calender inaugurated a period of self-confidence and vast hopes.' Legouis went on,

Spenser was the master of the language whose 'numbers flowe as fast as spring doth ryse'. He seemed able to tune English verse, which had been so long rebellious, to the tones of his voice. For him the language ceased to be refractory.

1579 was propitious year for him for he married Machabyas Chylde in that year and began to write The Faerie Queene as well.

The Elizabethan court was full of intrigue, lying and flattery and Spenser was ill at ease there. His suffering is evident from the following lines of 'Mother Hubberd's Tale':

Full little knowest thou, that has not tried,
What hell it is, in suing long to bide:
To lose good days, that might be better spent;
To waste long night in pensive discontent;
.....
To fret thy soul with crosses and with cares;
To eat thy heart through comfortless despairs,
To fawn, to crouch, to wait, to ride, to run,
To spend, to give, to want, to be undone,

Through Leicester's influence Spenser, who was utterly weary of his dependent position, became in 1580 secretary to Lord Grey of Wilton, the queen's deputy in Ireland. This way the third phase of his life began, the first two being those at Cambridge and London.

Spenser accompanied Grey through a campaign of savage brutality in putting down an Irish rebellion in Munster. In reward he was given an immense estate of 3000 acres acquired from Earl Desmond and the Kilcolman Castle near Limerick. Here he settled and occupied himself with his writing – an elegy, Astrophel, for Sidney and, preparing The Faerie Queene for the press. Sir Walter Raleigh (?1554–1618) was in Ireland in 1580 and got acquainted with Spenser. Spenser approved of Raleigh's commanding role in the massacre of Smerwic, in which 600 Spanish mercenaries were killed. At one of his visits in 1589 Raleigh heard The Faerie Queene with enthusiasm, hurried the poet to London and presented him to the queen. The first three books met with instant success on its publication and was declared the greatest work in the English language. An annual pension of fifty pounds was conferred by the queen on him but it was rarely paid. Spenser returned unwillingly to Ireland which he regarded as lonely exile:

My luckless lot,
That banished had myself, like wight forlore,
Into that waste, where I was quite forgot.

In 1596, after more than fifteen years residence there he wrote his only prose work View of the State of Ireland, not published until 1633. In it he submitted a plan for 'pacifying the oppressed and rebellious people'. His suggestion was to send a huge force of cavalry and infantry into Ireland, give them a short period to submit and then hunt them down like wild beasts. He reckoned that cold, famine and pestilence would assist the sword and after they had been hounded for two winters the following summer peace would descend upon Ireland. Strange as it might appear, Spenser's views were excellently well received in England as most statesman like.

Spenser returned to Ireland after nearly two years residence in London. This time he fell in love with an Irish girl called Elizabeth Boyle whom he had wooed in his Amoretti, a series of 88 sonnets. His marriage to her was celebrated in Epithalamion. Both were printed together in 1595. The same year he visited London again and stayed at Leicester House, now occupied by the new favourite of the Queen, Essex. There Spenser also met other luminaries, Shakespeare among them. In 1596 he published Books IV to VI of The Faerie Queene and his Fowre Hymnes while he stayed at the house of the earl of Essex. There he wrote the Prothalamion and also his View of the State of Ireland.

Spenser once again returned to Ireland in 1596 or '97. His castle at Kilcolman was burnt in 1598 in a sudden insurrection of the O'Neills under the earl of Desmond. Spenser was forced to flee to Cork with his wife and three children. Some of his manuscripts got burnt. Spenser's last days were spent at an inn in king street at Westminster, according to Ben Jonson 'for want of bread'. Spenser was buried near his favourite, Chaucer, in Westminster Abbey, the earl of Essex paying his funeral expenses. Twenty years later a monument was erected to him by Lady Anne Clifford which describes him as 'THE PRINCE OF POETS IN HIS TYME'. There have been few periods in English literary history in which Spenser's name has not been taken in the highest esteem.

I hope that this historical background will help you in reading this block with understanding.

1.0 OBJECTIVES

After going through this unit you will be able to,

- explain the purpose of a formal study of poetry,
- appreciate the importance of poetry in life,
- understand the range of topics, poets and poems covered in this course, gauge our expectations from you and thus
- give direction to your study of this course.

1.1 INTRODUCTION

Did you ask yourself why you decided to read this course on poetry? Reading of poetry does not enable a person to do anything such as repair a watch, a mobile phone, an AC or a car. It does not lead to any application in technology as physics, chemistry, mathematics, biology and geology would do. Political science, sociology and economics have social relevance. People also seek the help of psychiatrists and lawyers but poets are of no “practical” use, apparently. I will try to make a few suggestions in the next section; read it and then discuss it in your study group. Just by doing so you will make your study of this course meaningful.

Passive education is no education. The T.V. has been called an ‘idiot box’. People who watch the t v for long hours are passive learners. They actually learn nothing. Education should make us wise. ‘Read’ wrote Francis Bacon, ‘not to contradict and confute; nor to believe and take for granted; nor to find talk and discourse; but to weigh and consider.’ Weighing and considering will indeed make you wiser. Study of literature is part of liberal culture or education. Will reading poetry give more meaning to your life? It is akin to history and philosophy. It is ‘for delight, for ornament, and for ability.’

Answering the question ‘What is a Poem?’

Well, a poem is an instance of ‘poetry’ and ‘poetry is a variety of literature; the other varieties being non fictional prose, fiction - the short story and the novel - drama and literary criticism. We treat the essay - in both its forms, the long ones, or treatises, such as David Hume’s (1711 - 76) An Enquiry Concerning Human Understanding (1748) and Treatise of Human Nature (1739 - 40) and the shorter performances such as Charles Lamb’s (1775-1834) The Essays of Elia (1820-23) or Francis Bacon’s (1561 - 1626) The Essays, or Counsels, Civil and Morall (1597, 1612, 1623) – memoirs, biographies, autobiographies, letters, etc. as nonfiction and literary criticism as a major separate variety of it.

We have said that a ‘poem’ is an example of poetic expression. The Oxford English Dictionary calls poetry ‘expression of beautiful or elevated thought, imagination or feeling in appropriate language and usually in metrical form’. Notice the word ‘usually’ since poetry need not always be in verse. We have prose poems such as ‘The Book of Job’ in the Old Testament, ‘Dream Children’ of Lamb, 'The Vision of Mirza' of Joseph Addison, The Waves of Virginia Woolf and passages in Jawaharlal Nehru's autobiography that are pure poetry. Nehru describes the cremation of his father on the banks of the Ganga in the following words in his autobiography:

As evening fell on the river bank on that winter day, the great flames leapt up and consumed that body which had meant so much to us who were close to him as well as to millions in India. Gandhiji said a few moving words to the multitude, and then all of us crept silently home. The stars were out and shining brightly when we returned lonely and desolate. (Page 247)

This can be called a piece of prose poem; it has all the qualities of poetry except metre.

Plays have been written in prose as by George Bernard Shaw (1856 - 1950) and in verse as by T.S.Eliot (1888 – 1965) and William Shakespeare (1564 - 1616). The success of a literary artist rests on many factors but most of all on his imagination, thought and feeling couched in a language that felicitously conveys them to us. Let's take an example from the fifth act of Macbeth (1605). Macbeth has just heard about his wife's death and befitting the situation he bursts out thus:

To-morrow, and to-morrow, and to-morrow,
Creeps in this petty pace from day to day,
To the last syllable of recorded time;
And all our yesterdays are lighted fools
The way to dusty death. Out, out, brief candle!
Life's but a walking shadow, a poor player
That struts and frets his hour upon the stage,
And then is heard no more; it is a tale
Told by an idiot, full of sound and fury
Signifying nothing. (Act V, Sc. V)

You may ask if Shakespeare was not indiscreet in embellishing a murderer of his friend Banquo and his monarch Duncan with the grand poetry that he has been endowed with? The personification of 'day' creeping at a 'petty pace' the congerie of metaphors of 'brief candle', 'walking shadow', 'poor player' and 'a tale told by an idiot' for life demonstrate the profundity of Macbeth's imagination. How could a man who was capable of such deep philosophical meditation commit crimes of such ghastly proportions? These are debatable points but we can immediately feel the power of Shakespeare's poetry. 'A poem' wrote Wallace Stevens, 'must resist the intelligence almost successfully.' Shakespeare will be read as long as English will be read and understood.

Poets don't read philosophical treatises before writing their poems but philosophers, scientists, and artists, and people in all walks of life are influenced by the spirit of the age which impacts their work. A student of poetry would do well to explore the political, social and cultural history of the society and the life of the poet whose poem they are going to study. A poem is a product of the man, the milieu and, the moment. Just think of some of W.B. Yeats's poems: 'September 1913', 'Easter 1916', 'Nineteen Hundred Nineteen' and above all 'Among School Children'. They were influenced by Irish history but Yeats did not give us the details of events in his poems as a historian does. The poems are simultaneously public and private documents, thoughtful and emotional accounts of experiences at the same time, that Yeats wanted to share with his readers. 'Poetry' wrote Aristotle, 'is finer and more philosophical than history; for poetry expresses the universal, and history only the particular'.

'Reality' wrote Wallace Stevens, 'is a cliché from which we escape by metaphors'. 'A poet' Stevens went on, 'looks at the world as a man looks at a woman.' Philip Larkin's 'Church Going' is a strange poem about the poet, a disbeliever's visit to a church. He writes:

Hatless, I take off

My cycle-clips in awkward reverence,

The poet seems to have reverence for the "house of god" notwithstanding his lack of faith. The poem ends with a confessions:

A serious house on serious earth it is,
In whose blent air all our compulsions meet,
Are recognized, and robed as destinies.
And that much never can be obsolete,
Since someone will forever be surprising
A hunger in himself to be more serious,
And gravitating with it to this ground,
Which, he once heard, was proper to grow wise in,
If only that so many dead lie round.

At the end of the nineteenth century Matthew Arnold (1822 - 88) the great Victorian poet wrote in his preface to the Hundred Greatest Men:

The future of poetry is immense, because in poetry, where it is worthy of its high destinies, our race, as time goes on, will find an ever surer and surer stay. There is not a creed which is not shaken, not an accredited dogma which is not shown to be questionable, not a received tradition which does not threaten to dissolve.

'Theories in politics and science change; one dogma in religion founders and a new one arises in its place but poetry stays'. Arnold went on,

Our religion has materialized itself in the fact, in the supposed fact; it has attached its emotion to the fact, and now the fact is failing it... The strongest part of our religion today is its unconscious poetry.

Is Philip Larkin's 'Church Going' not about the poetry latent in religion? Poetry 'is the breath and finer spirit of all knowledge' as William Wordsworth pointed out.

How does poetry stand with respect to science? Francis Bacon has been called the first martyr of science because he caught cold while stuffing dead birds with snow and died. 'Poesy' he wrote 'is part of learning in measure of words for the most part restrained, but in all other points extremely licensed, and doth, truly refer to the imagination, which, being not tied to the laws of matter, may at pleasure join that which nature hath severed, and sever that which nature hath joined, and so make unlawful matches' (The Advancement of Learning, BK II, 1605). He also pointed out that poesy offers 'magnanimity, morality, and ... delectation' but it is reason which 'buckle[s] and bow[s] the mind unto the nature of things.' So reason according to him is superior to poetry.

Another major figure of the age of Scientific Revolution and of Reason was John Locke (1632 - 1704) whose Essay Concerning Human Understanding (1690) offers a study of the human mind and the mechanism of understanding. He rejected the doctrine of 'innate ideas' and pointed out that the source of ideas is experience. Locke believed that sensation is always of a quality and qualities are either primary, i.e. extensions, figure, motion and number or secondary which do not really belong but are imputed to them. Colour, for instance is a secondary quality which is a subjective perception. We are also ignorant of spiritual entities.

John Dryden (1631-1700) a contemporary of Locke seems to have been influenced even more by the scientific ethos of his age. Charles Sedley, Lord Buckhurst as Eugenius in Dryden's Essay of Dramatick Poesy holds the view that his age was superior to the ancients because 'natural causes [are] more known than in the time of Aristotle.' So it follows from it that 'poesy and other arts may with the same pains, arrive still nearer to perfection'. Eugenius wants the method of science to serve as a model for poets. Crites (Sir Robert Howard) shares with Eugenius the euphoria on science. He asks,

Is it not evident in these last hundred years, when the study of philosophy has been the business of all the virtuosi in Christendom, that almost a new nature has been revealed to us? That more errors of the School have been detected, more useful experiments in philosophy have been made, more noble secrets in optics, medicine, anatomy, astronomy discovered, than in all those credulous and doting ages from Aristotle to us? – so true it is, that nothing spreads more fast than science, when rightly and generally cultivated.

Eugenius points his finger at the new discoveries such as those of Galileo (1564 - 1650) and Descartes (1596 - 1650) in optics and physics and Andreas Vesalius (1515 -64) and William Harvey (1578 - 1657) in anatomy and physiology took European science ahead of those of Aristotle, a constant butt of Galileo's jibes, Galen, the Arabs such as Al Farabi, Avicenna and Averroes and the Schoolmen such as St. Thomas Aquinas, Albertus Magnus, Duns Scotus and Abelard.

Dryden, as Neander, compares the sub-plots which he calls 'under-plots or by-concernments' in drama with phenomenon in Ptolemaic astronomy:

Our plays, besides the main design, have under-plots or by-concernments, of less considerable persons and intrigues, which are carried on with the motion of the main plot: as they say the orb of the fixed stars and those of the planets, though they have motions of their own, are whirled about by the motion of the primum mobile, in which they are contained.

Dryden or Neander, whose role in the essay is to defend English drama against the French stage goes on:

That similitude expresses much of the English stage; for if contrary motions may be found in nature to agree, if a planet can go east and west at the same time – one way by virtue of his motion, the other by the force of the first mover – it will not be difficult to imagine how the under-plot, which is only different, not contrary to the great design, may naturally be conducted along with it.

In the literature of a nation production of works of art are dialogical in nature and also there is a progression in the appearance of literary pieces. Alexander Pope (1688 - 1744) came at the cusp of the neoclassical era in Western Europe: the two strands of neo-classicism and science meet in poets and critics such as Alexander Pope and Samuel Johnson. By reading An Essay of Criticism (1711) against the background of Locke's ideas on primary and secondary qualities we can appreciate it better. 'True Wit' wrote Pope, 'is Nature to advantage dress'd, / What oft was thought, but ne'er so well express'd;'. The office of the poet was to provide felicitous expression to truth, to 'Nature'. Pope recommends classical plainness such as we find in the Parthenon on the Acropolis at Athens on the one hand and in the ideas of Sir Isaac Newton (1642 - 1727) in the ground breaking Philosophia Naturalis Principia Mathematica (1687) on the other. Pope's euphoria can be gaged from his couplet on Sir Isaac Newton:

Nature and Nature's laws lay hid in Night:
God said, Let Newton be; and all was Light.

Ignorant of India's achievements in astronomy and mathematics, Pope in his An Essay on Man (1732 - 4) scoffed at us,

Lo, the poor Indian! Whose untutor'd mind
Sees God in clouds, or hears him in the wind:
His soul, proud science never taught to stray
Far as the solar walk, or milky way;

He did not know about the scientific ideas of the Buddhists, the Sankhya philosophy of Kapil, the theory of the atom of Kanad, the medical ideas of Charak or Sushrut. He also derided, the Persian dervishes for imitating the circular movements of the planets in the hope of knowing god.

As Eastern priests in giddy circles run
And turn their heads to imitate the Sun,

Against the 'irrational' Asians Pope pitted the scientific mind of the English:

Superior beings when of late they saw
A mortal man unfold all Nature's law,
Admir'd such wisdom in an earthly shape,
And shew'd a NEWTON as we shew an Ape.

Alexander Pope's poet plays the second fiddle to a scientist.

When Samuel Johnson, that last of the Romans, tried to define the function of the poet, in The History of Rasselas, Prince of Abyssinia (1759) he apparently compared a poet to a scientist. 'He', i.e. the poet, Johnson opined, 'must write as the interpreter of nature, and the legislator of mankind, and consider himself as presiding over the thoughts and manners of future generations, as a being superior to time and place.'

British conquest of India in the eighteenth century changed all this. Sir William Jones translated Kalidas's Shakuntala into English and in course of time a Wordsworth could say,

The Man of science seeks truth as a remote and unknown benefactor; he cherishes and loves it in his solitude: the Poet, singing a song in which all human beings join with him, rejoices in the presence of truth as our visible friend and hourly companion.

Wordsworth went on to pronounce his most famous words,

Poetry is the breath and finer spirit of all knowledge; it is the impassioned expression which is in the countenance of all Science.

We read poetry as the 'finer spirit of all knowledge' and so a proper study of poetry is important.

1.3 THE SCOPE OF THIS COURSE: THE SYLLABUS

Let's at the outset find out what you have to study in this course. Read the syllabus properly and prepare a good strategy for studying it. In other words you must plan your study of the course.

Understanding Poetry (Revised) BEGE106

This course has eight blocks comprising of 40 units as under:

Block I

Early Modern Period

- 1) Introductory Unit
- 2) On metre and poetic devices
- 3) Shakespeare and his sonnets (29 and 30)
- 4) John Milton : 'L' Allegro' and 'Il Penseroso' 'On the Late Massacre' and 'When the Assault'
- 5) John Donne: 'The Sun Rising', 'The Anniversary' and, 'The Relic'
- 6) Andrew Marvell: 'Thoughts in a Garden', 'To his Coy Mistress'

Block II

The Long Eighteenth Century

- 7) John Dryden: Mac Flecknoe
- 8) Alexander Pope: An Essay on Man
- 9) Samuel Johnson: The Vanity of Human Wishes
- 10) Thomas Gray: Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard

Block III

The Romantic Poets

- 11) William Wordsworth: 'Intimations of Immortality', 'Tintern Abbey'
- 12) S.T. Coleridge: 'Kubla Khan'
- 13) Lord Byron: 'Roll on Thou Deep and Dark Blue Ocean', 'George the Third'
- 14) P.B. Shelley: 'Ode to the West Wind', 'To a Skylark'
- 15) John Keats: 'Ode on a Grecian Urn', 'Ode to a Nightingale'

Block IV

The Great Victorian Poets

- 16) Alfred, Lord Tennyson: 'The Splendour Falls', 'Tears, Idle Tears', 'Ulysses'

- 38) A.K. Ramanujan: 'Self-Portrait', 'Chicago Zen', 'On the Death of a Poem' JayantMahapatra: 'Hunger', 'A Rain of Rites'
- 39) Arun Kolatkar: 'Suicide of Rama', 'Chaitanya', 'Ajamil and the Tigers'
Agha Shahid Ali: 'Postcard from Kashmir'
- 40) Dilip Chitre: 'The Light of Birds Breaks the Lunatic's Sleep'
Keki N. Daruwalla: 'Hawk', 'Chinar'

1.4 ASSIGNMENTS AND TERM-END- EXAMINATION

As in the conventional universities we ask our students to do some homework and also hold public examinations. Let's discuss them here one by one.

1.4.1 Assignments

IGNOU earlier had a policy of 3 assignments per eight-credit course. I think it was a good policy for that way we could monitor students' study better and promote active reading as they could learn from their teachers and discover the finer points as they progressed. Assignments should not only be a ritual, or university requirement.

1.4.2 Why Examinations?

Examinations, tests and assessments are not a necessary evil. They play an important part in our study and mental growth. They tell us where we stand with respect to our peer-group. They also help employers select the right type of employees. Employers often also conduct their own test. Do you know that imperial examinations were held for the first time in ancient China by the Sui Dynasty (581-618 C.E.) in 605. It was abolished by the Qing Dynasty (1644 - 1912) in 1905, i.e. 1300 years later. Thomas Taylor Meadows, Britain's Counsel in Guangzhou (or Canton), China observed in his Desultory Notes on the Government and People of China (1847) that 'the long duration of the Chinese empire is solely ... owing to the good government which consists in the advancement of men of talent and merit only'. He advised against the system of preferment, patronage or purchase and making the civil service a meritocratic institution. The East India Company College had been founded in 1806 to train 'writers' (administrators) of the age of 16 to 18, for the EIC. (The officers for the army were trained at Addiscombe Military Seminary, Surrey.) William Gladstone, then Chancellor of the Exchequer, set up a commission under Stafford Northcote (1818-87) and Charles Trevelyan (1807-86) to look into the operation and organisation of the Civil Service. Influenced by the Chinese imperial examination they made their recommendation for recruitment based on merit through standardized written examination. Standardized testing was adopted by the British Universities in the 1850's.

1.4.3 A Model Term-end-Examination Question Paper

You can take the final examination after studying this course for a year. If you don't feel sufficiently prepared you can sit for the exam in June or December. Read the handbook and follow the instructions properly.

Now let me give you a few tips for the final examination. These will give direction to your study.

- All good students will learn scansion, taught in the following unit. ('Here you have a few sections of Block-I, Unit 2 of British Poetry (MEG 01). You can get a copy of it from senior students/Study Centre/ Book Shop.)
- Remember that the more you drill yourself the more confident you will become in scanning units of verse. You must also develop familiarity with poetic devices, genres and various types of metrical compositions.

Early Modern English Poets

- A close reading of the texts of poems is done through ‘reference to context questions. You will be required to explain 4 passages from the texts of poems prescribed for you. This question would carry 32 marks. Each answer may be in 150 to 200 words only. Avoid long answers.
- The introductions to the various blocks deal with literary history. They will give your study of the major poets and their poems in their proper perspectives. You may be required to answer one question of 16 marks based on the introductions as in question no 3 on the next page.
- Now we move to general questions that carry a total of 32 marks. They will be on the poets, poems, and their age. You may have to write two essays, each in about 750 words.

Finally you must remember that a good question paper is one that covers all segments of the course adequately, i.e. there should be more questions from the largest segment of the course, such as British poetry (Blocks I to V). However, no section should remain unrepresented on the question paper. The purpose of the examinations is not to find out what the student does not know but to find out how well she/he knows what she/he knows. This can be done by giving the student sufficient choice. Below you have a model term-end-examination question paper. Remember that examiners may change the pattern of the question paper but it is advisable not to do so as the course has been planned and executed with certain goals that get reflected in the question paper given here. Moreover students must be told before hand if the pattern of the question paper is to change which is rather difficult in a distance education scenario.

Model Term End Question Paper

Understanding Poetry (Revised)

Full Marks – 100

Time 3 Hours

Answer questions 1 and 2 and 3 and any two of the remaining questions.

- 1) a) Scan one of the following passages and comment on its prosodic features:
Scansion 5 + Comments 5
 - i) The way was long, the wind was cold,
The minstrel was infirm and old;
The harp, his sole remaining joy,
Was carried by an orphan boy,
 - ii) One more unfortunate
Weary of breath
Rashly importunate
Gone to her death!
 - b) Write short notes on any two of the following:
 - (i) Caesura (ii) Epic (iii) Synecdoche $5 \times 2 = 10$
 - (iv) Spenserian stanza (v) Aposiopesis
- 2) Explain any four of the following passages with reference to their context supplying brief critical comments where necessary: $8 \times 4 = 32$
 - a) Let the bird of loudest lay
On the sole Arabian tree
Herald sad and trumpet be,
To whose sound chaste wings obey,

- b) Say first, of god above, man below,
what can we reason, but from what we know?
Of man what see we, but his station refer?
- c) Five years have past, five summers, with the length of five long winter! And again I hear
These waters, rolling from their mountain-springs
With a soft inland murmur.
- d) No wonder of it : sheer plod makes plough down sillion
Shine, and blue-buak embers, ah my dear,

Fale gall themselves, and gas Gold-vermillion
- e) There will be time to murder and create,
And time for all the works and days of hands
That lift and drop a question on your plate;
- f) we paused before a house that seemed
A swelling of the ground –
The roof was scarcely visible –
The cornice – in the ground –
- g) I feel that I would like to go there
and fall into those flowers and sink into the marsh near them,
- h) I don't know politics but I know the names of those in power, and can repeat them like Days of week, or names of months, beginning with Nehru,
- i) I always loved neatness. Now I hold the half inch Himalayas in my hand.

- 3) Critically comment on Emile Legouis' words, 'The great victories of Edward III were being sung in London, and Minot's poems were current in the countryside when Chaucer was born and when his mind received its first impressions.'

Or

Write short notes on any four of the following:

A) Venerable Bede B) Sir Philip Sidney C) The Augustan Age D) The Symbolist Movement E) Phillis Wheatley F) Black Mountain Poets G) Henry Derozio

16

- 4) Attempt an evaluation of any one of the following poets, with special reference to the poems prescribed for you:
- a) Andrew Marvell
b) P.B. Shelley
c) Allen Ginsberg
d) Arun Kolatkar

1.5 LET US SUM UP

This unit was concerned with giving direction to your study of this course. We did this by enabling you to think about poetry and its purpose in our life.

All formal education is an efficient way of acquiring knowledge in a short period of time and that is utilizable. We want to give you a fair understanding of British, American and Indian poetries in English methodically so that you may be able to make the best use of your time.

You should try to meet your counsellor every week and form a study circle in which you can help one another clarify the points in this and other units.

We hope you will enjoy reading this course.

1.6 ANSWERS TO SELF-CHECK EXERCISES

Self-check Exercise I

Answers to the three questions will be unique to each student but don't ignore them. Think over them and discuss them in your study circle.

Self-check Exercise II

1) Your answer may be somewhat as below:

- Start with the reading of unit 2 and master scansion.
- Prepare British Poetry in 5 months, one block every month
 - a) Poets' lives
 - b) Poems

- 2) • Master scansion and secure 10 marks. 10 days – half-an-hour / day, - revision every week for 3 months, then once a month.
- Draw up a list of literary terms and prepare my notes with the help of a dictionary of literary terms and a search engine on the internet
 - For rhetorical terms such as quesitio, percontatio, epanadiplosis, prosopopeia, aposiopesis, etc. take help of The Growth and Evolution of Classical Rhetoric by Amiya Bhushan Sharma
 - Master the topics for notes and secure 10 marks. 10 days – half-an-hour / day - revision every week for 3 months, then once a month
 - Master the introductions to either 1,2 and 3 or 6,7 and 8 first which will help me attempt question no. 3
 - Read blocks 1 to 5 thoroughly in 5 months and attempt at least 20 reference to context questions from them.

UNIT 2 ON METRE, SCANSION AND, PROSODY

Structure

- 2.0 Objectives
- 2.1 Introduction
- 2.2 Versification: The Grammar of Poetry
 - 2.2.1 Prosody, Metre, Scansion
 - a) Prosody
 - b) Metre and Metrics
 - c) Scansion
- 2.3 Types of Metres
 - 2.3.1 Syllable-stress or Accented Syllabic Metres
 - i) The Iambic Metre
 - ii) The Trochaic Metre
 - iii) The Anapaestic Metre
 - iv) The Dactylic Metre
 - v) The Amphibrachic Metre
 - 2.3.2 Strong-stress Metres
 - 2.3.3 Syllabic Metres
 - 2.3.4 Quantitative Metres
- 2.4 Rhyme and Rhythm in Poetry
 - 2.4.1 Rhyme and Rhyme Schemes
 - 2.4.2 Rhythm
- 2.5 Analysis of a Poem
- 2.6 Let Us Sum Up
- 2.7 A Brief Annotated Bibliography
- 2.8 Answers to Self-check Exercises

2.0 OBJECTIVES

After going through this unit you will be able to appreciate any work of literary art better, specially a poem. To split it into more concrete terms:

- You will be able to speak about the abstract entity that is a poem – in other words the ontology of a poem;
- Speak on the acoustic aspects of poems such as metre, rhyme, and rhythm. And finally;
- You will complete the task of appreciation by bringing together the capacities developed in the successive sections of this unit.

With this theoretical background you will be better equipped to study this course.

2.1 INTRODUCTION

The function of this unit is, in a way to complete the task we had set for ourselves in the previous unit, i.e. preparing you for a study this course on poetry.

This course on literature, perhaps like any other course on literature, seeks to educate you effectively, improve your ability for appreciation, give you better insights into the ways literary artists, especially the poets, communicate.

There is a still more subtle and deep level which is the rhythm. This is a product of metre and rhyme and of many other effects which perhaps even the poets are not always conscious of. The entire sound effect or prosody of a poem is a common ground of the society, the individual and the language. We will examine some of the fundamental ideas in prosody in the third, fourth and fifth sections. These sections of this unit would require drilling as you do in mathematics.

The last major section i.e. 2.5 shows how all your study can be employed in “deciphering” the text of a poem.

Don't break off at any of the subsections within a section as that may interrupt the discussion in your mind. Then you may feel muddled.

We have not discussed the poetic forms such as the lyric, epic, allegory or fable or the various aspects of figurative language such as simile, metaphors, irony, hyperbole, or terms of art such as fancy, imagination, gothic, classic, neo-classic, romantic, pastoral, elegy, Satire, pathos, bathos, myth, romance, sensibility, wit and humour, etc. We expect you to prepare your notes from books suggested at 2.7.

Although a little time consuming, this unit will enhance your ability to study poetry properly. You may study this unit for an hour or two daily over a week or two.

2.2 VERSIFICATION: THE GRAMMAR OF POETRY

In one his last poems written in 1938 called ‘The Statues’ the Irish poet W.B. Yeats (1865 - 1939) marvelled at ‘The Lineaments of a plummet measured face’. As you know masons work with plummets which is a plumb or ball of lead attached to a string for testing perpendicularity of wall, etc. And yet the ‘plummet measured face’ has its distinctive features of lineaments. Earlier on in the poem Yeats had written:

... for the men
That with a mallet or a chisel modelled these Calculations that look but casual flesh, put down
All Asiatic vague immensities,
And not banks of oars that swam upon
The many-headed foam at Salamis.
Europe put off that foam when Phidias.
Gave women dreams and dreams their looking-glass.

Salamis, which you may locate on a map of Greece, was the site of the rout in 480 B.C. of Xerxes (485 – 465 B.C.) the son of Darius, the Persian King (521 – 485 B.C.) - by the Greeks. According to Herodotus (5th B.C.) the Greek historian who had participated in the war and left an account of it, the armies of the Persians were fantastic, their might unchallenged. However they were defeated by the cooperation of Athens and Sparta. Salamis is seen here as a symbol of the victory of mathematics, calculation, number over ‘vague immensities’ and the proverbial Asiatic grandeur. We are reminded of the sea battle at Salamis by the 'many headed foam' in the sixth line of the quotation above. In the same line Yeats cunningly slips in the name of Phidias, who was perhaps the greatest artist of ancient Europe. His colossal statue of Zeus at Olympia in the south-east of Acropolis wrought in ivory and gold over a core of wood was the most famous statue of antiquity. He had also contributed three statues of Athene on Acropolis. One of them was wrought in ivory and gold. He had also probably designed and certainly supervised the construction of the frieze of Parthenon. Yeats perhaps wants to tell us that it was Phidias' artistry, his life-like creations, products of calculation and measurement nonetheless that set high standards for the society of Pericles(492 – 429 B.C.).

We may, may not or only partially agree with Yeats' observations above on 'Asiatic vague immensities' but we cannot deny that pieces of art, or any work in politics or warfare for that matter, are human contrivances of planning with the help of cold concrete facts – be they words, or colours or rocks and mortar or people and locations.

A student who wishes to learn poetry properly must learn the basics of metre, especially if s/he wishes to appreciate the poetry in a foreign language. With reference to the study of ancient Greek and Latin literature by English students Eliot opined:

We have to learn a dead language by an artificial method, and our methods of teaching have to be applied to pupils most of whom have only a moderate gift for language.

While delivering his W.P. Ker Memorial Lecture (1942) at Glasgow Eliot went even further and emphasised the study of English metre even for the native English speaker:

Even in approaching the poetry of our own language, we may find the classification of metres, of lines with different numbers of syllables and stresses in different places, useful at a preliminary stage, as a simplified map of a complicated territory: but it is only the study not of poetry but of poems, that can train our ear.

What Eliot says after the colon gives the impression that if you know the technique some day inspiration would descend and give your verse the life that is poetry. The 'soul of rhythm' Sri Aurobindo (whose writings you are going to read in another course) wrote 'can only be found by listening in to what is behind the music of words and sound and things'. He admitted, that the 'intellectual knowledge of technique helps... provided one does not make of it a mere device or a rigid fetter' Aurobindo appears to be in agreement with Eliot but they appear on the surface to place their emphases a little differently. Aurobindo points out:

Attentions to technique harms only when a writer is so busy with it that the becomes indifferent to substance. But if the substance is adequate, the attention to technique can only give it greater beauty.

'It is in my view' Aurobindo went on, a serious error to regard meter or rhyme as artificial elements, mere external and superfluous equipment restraining the movement and sincerity of poetic form. Metre, on the contrary, is the most natural mould of expression for certain states of creative emotion and vision; it is much more natural and spontaneous than a non-metrical form; the emotion expresses itself best and most powerfully in a balanced rather than in a loose and shapeless rhythm.

The search for techniques is simply the search for the best and most appropriate form for expressing what has to be said and once it is found, the inspiration can flow quite naturally and fluently into it.

In different words though, Eliot and Aurobindo appear to be in agreement about the place and utility of the knowledge of versification in the writing and, by extension for us, the study of poetry in English.

2.2.1 Prosody, Metre, Scansion

- a) Prosody : That part of grammar which deals with laws governing the structure of verse is called prosody. It encompasses the study of all the elements of language that contribute towards acoustic or rhythmic effects, chiefly in poetry but also in prose. Ezra Pound called Prosody “the articulation of the total sound of a poem”. However, we know that alliteration (the rhythmic repetition of consonants) and assonance (repetition of vowel sounds) occur as much in prose as in poetry. Besides assonance and alliteration rhythmic effects are produced in poetry as well as in prose by the repetition of syntactical and grammatical patterns. However, compared with even the simplest verse, the “prosodic” structure of prose would appear haphazard and unconsidered.
- b) Metre and Metrics :Metre measures the rhythm of a line of verse. The word metre derives from the Greek word metron which means ‘measure’. Traditionally metre refers to the regular, recurrence of feet. According to the Hungarian-American linguist John Lotz (b. 1913), ‘In some language there are texts in which the phonetic material within certain syntactic frames, such as sentence, phrase, word, is numerically regulated. Metrics is the study of meter. A nonmetric text is called prose.’ In the words of Seymour Chatman (b. 1928) ‘Meter might be defined as a systematic convention whereby certain aspects of phonology are organised for aesthetic purposes. In order to find out where the accent falls we scan a line.’ ‘Like any convention’ Chatman goes on, ‘it is susceptible of individual variation which could be called stylistic, taking “style” in the common meaning of “idiosyncratic way of doing something”’.
- c) Scansion : In general parlance, to scan is to look intently at all parts successively. Radars cause particular regions to be traversed by a controlled beam. In prosody scansion refers to metrical scanning of verse. When a unit of verse – a foot, a line or a stanza – is scanned with the help of symbols the metre can be seen as well as heard.

We make use of a few symbols in order to scan a passage in verse (and sometimes also in the case of prose). The symbols are shown below:

Symbol	Name of the symbol	Purpose
/	The acute accent	Metrically stressed syllable
∪	The grave	Metrically weak syllable
	A single line	Division between feet
	A double line	Caesura or pause in the line
^	A rest	A syllable metrically expected but not actually present.

2.3 TYPES OF METRES

There are basically four types of metres. They are:

- i) Syllable–stress or accented syllabic metres
- ii) Strong–stress metres
- iii) Syllabic metres
- iv) Quantitative metres

We will now discuss each one of them one by one.

2.3.1 Syllable-stress or Accented Syllabic Metres

The smallest unit of metre in poetry is a foot. A foot in prosody is a pattern of phonetically stressed and unstressed syllables. The four principal feet found in English verse are illustrated below:

- | | | |
|----|----------|--|
| a) | iambic | U / U / U / U / |
| | | appear, behold, attack, supply |

Besides, the four major feet the spondee(//) and the Pyrrhus (UU) also occur as substitutions in a passage of verse. Some theorists also admit the amphibrach (U/U), amphimacer(/U/) and tribrach (UUU) into their scansion. However, these are rather uncommon in English poetry.

Syllable stress metres got established in English in the poetry of Geoffrey Chaucer (1340? - 1400). After him, for about two centuries the syllable-stress metre fell into disuse or was misunderstood. It was only towards the end of the 16th century that the syllable-stress metres got re-established.

Now we will scan a passage of each major metrical type and then leave a few stanzas unscanned for you to scan. After having scanned them with a pencil you may compare your scansion with those scanned at the end of the unit.

i) The Iambic metre:

U / U /
With rav/ished ears

U / U /
The mon/arch hears

U / U /
Assumes / the God

U / U /
Affects / to nod

U / U / U /
And seems / to shake / the spheres.

Dryden.

Comments: the five line stanza above is in iambic dimeter (two feet). However, the concluding line is in iambic trimeter. The rhyme scheme is a a b b a.

Self-Check Exercise 1

Now you may scan the following passages and comment briefly on the metrical features:

Passage 1: In woods a ranger
To joy a stranger

Comments:

2: Thy way not mine, O Lord
However dark it be;
Lead me with thine own hand
Choose out the path for me.

Comments:

3: The way was long, the wind was cold,
The minstrel was infirm and old;
The harp' his sole remaining joy,
Was carried by an orphan boy,

Comments:

4: Confusion shame remorse despair,
At once his bosom swell
The damps of death bedewed his brow,
He shook, he groaned, he fell.

Comments:

5: I put my hat upon my head
And walked into the Strand,
And there I met another man
Whose hat was in his hand.

Comments:

The passages above, you must have noticed, are clumsily regular. They may qualify as passable verse but don't have the power to move us as poetry does.

By far the most common measure of English poetry is the iambic pentameter. It is generally found in two distinct kinds – the unrhymed variety called blank verse and the rhymed variety heroic couplet.

As epics concentrated on a typical hero such as an Achilles or an Aeneas they were generally called heroic poems. Dryden and Pope translated Virgil (70-19 B.C.) and Homer (9th Century B.C.) respectively in the rhyming couplet. It became the dominant metre of late seventeenth and eighteenth century poetry. Hence the metre began to get called “heroic”. The Restoration playwrights in trying to transfer epic grandeur to their stage made their characters speak in heroic couplet. The effect, however, was grandiose rather than grand. The heroic couplet reached perfection in the hands of Alexander Pope. Below we scan four lines from his Essay on Criticism (1711):

 ∪ / ∪ / ∪ / ∪ / ∪ /
When A/jax strives/ some rock's/ vast weight/ to throw,

 ∪ / ∪ / ∪ / ∪ / ∪ /
The line/ too lab/ours, and// the words/ move slow;

 ∪ / ∪ / ∪ / ∪ / ∪ /
Not so,// when swift/ camil/la scours/ the plain

 ∪ / ∪ / ∪ / ∪ / ∪ / ∪ /
Files o'er/ the unbend/ ing corn/ and skims/ along/ the main.

The lines above are in regular iambic pentameter except the sixth which is an hexameter. An iambic hexameter line is also called an alexandrine. In the second foot of the fourth line we notice an elision, i.e. omission of a syllable in pronunciation. Thomas Norton (1532 - 84) and Thomas Sackville used blank verse for the first time in their play Gorboduc (1561). Below is a specimen from the play:

The royal king and eke his sons are slain;
No ruler rests within the regal seat;
The heir, to whom the scepter 'longs, unknown
Lo, Britain's realm is left an open prey,
A present spoil for conquest to ensue

The regimented uniformity of the iambic pentameter lines above communicates monotony and as poetry it is lifeless.

Christopher Marlowe (1564 - 93), a poet and playwright, changed all this by varying the accents, introducing the medial pause (called caesura) and allowing the sense to flow into a freer sentence structure. Here is an example from Doctor Faustus (1604) :

 ∪ / ∪ / ∪ / ∪ / ∪ /
Was this/ the face/ that launched/ a thous/ and ships,

 ∪ / ∪ / ∪ / ∪ / ∪ /
And burnt/ the top/less tower/ of iill/ ium?

/ / u / u / u u /
Sweet Helen,/ make me/ immortal/ with a kiss,

u / u / u / u / u /
Her lips/ suck forth/ my soul;/ see where/ it flies!

/ u / u / u / u /
Come; Helen,/ come, give me/ my soul/ again.

u / u / u / u u u u /
Here will/ I dwell/ for hea/ven is/in these lips,

u / u / u / u / u /
And all/ is dross/ that is/ not Hel/ena.

You would notice that the passage above is dominated by blank verse, i.e. unrhymed iambic pentameter. However, the third and fifth lines are tetrameter lines. Whereas the first foot of the third line is a spondee, there is an anapaestic variation in the last foot. With the help of an extra unstressed syllable before “Kiss” Marlowe succeeds in communicating, as it were, Faustus’s longing for Helen.

Marlowe introduces the fifth line with a trochaic inversion. This is succeeded by an amphimacer. However, you would notice that while there are metrical variations in the two lines, the number of accented syllables remain uniformly five in each line of the passage. Marlowe thus achieves a felicity of expression by adopting a unique rhythm apposite for the character and his situation in the play but without contravening the natural rhythm of the English language.

Even more flexibility was introduced into English poetry by Shakespeare. You may scan one of his sonnets or some of the passages you like in his plays you may have read on the Understanding Drama course.

Self-Check Exercise III

Now you may scan a couple of passages from Shakespeare and Keats and write your comments on them in the space provided:

- a) Two truths are told,
As happy prologues to the swell/ing act
Of the imperial theme. I thank you, gentlemen.
This supernatural soliciting
Cannot be ill, cannot be good; if ill,
Why hath it given me earnest of success,
Commencing in a truth? I am Thane of Cawdor.
If good, why do I yield to that suggestion
Whose horrid image doth unfix my hair.
And make my seated heart knock at my ribs Shakespeare: Macbeth

On First Looking into Chapman’s Homer

Much have I travelled in the realms of gold,
 And many goodly states and Kingdoms seen;
 Round many western islands have I been
 Which bard in fealty to Apollo hold.
 Oft of one wide expanse had I been told,
 That deep browed Homer ruled as his demesne
 Yet did I never breathe its pure serene
 Till I heard Chapman speak out loud and bold:
 Then felt I like some watcher of the skies
 When a new planet swims into his ken;
 Or like about Cortez when with eagle eyes
 He stared at the Pacific, and all his men
 Looked at each other with a wild surmise
 Silent upon a peak in Darien.

In the examples above you noticed that two measurements are involved in metre: we have to speak about the kind of foot and the number of feet. You scanned passages in the iambic metre in two feet or dimeter, three feet or trimeter, four feet or tetrameter, five feet or pentameter, six feet or hexameter and seven feet or septameter. You noticed that the septameter verse often divided into lines of tetrameter alternating with trimeter. It has been estimated that ninety per cent of English poetry is in the iambic pentameter. Now we will examine a few examples of the trochee, anapaest and dactyl also.

ii) The Trochaic Metre

Below we scan a stanza in trochaic tetrameter:

/ ˘ / ˘ / ˘ / ˘
May thou/ month of/ rosy/ beauty,

/ ˘ / ˘ / ˘ / ˘
Month when/ pleasure/ is a/ duty,

/ ˘ / ˘ / ˘ / ˘
Month of/bees and/ month of/ flowers,

/ ˘ / ˘ / ˘ / ˘
Month of/ blossom/ laden/ bowers.

Do the drill below in order to find how well you have understood the trochaic metre.

Self-Check Exercise IV

- a) Dreadful gleams,
Dismal screams,
Fires that glow,
Shrieks of woe,
Sullen moans,
Hollow groans.

A. Pope

- b) Rich the treasure,
Sweet the pleasure.

J Dryden

- c) When the British warrior queen
Bleeding from the Roman rods,
Sought with an indignant mien
Counsel of her country's gods.

- d) Tell me not in mournful numbers
Life is but an empty dream;
For the soul is dead that slumbers,
And things are not what they seem

.A.W. Longfellow

- e) All that walk on foot or ride in chariots
All that dwell in palaces or garrets

- f) On a mountain stretched beneath a hoary willow
Lay a shepherd swain and viewed the rolling billow.

Above you scanned passages of trochaic mono-, di-, tri-, tetra-, penta-, and hexameters. However, I may remind you that in good poetry you do not find long stretches in the trochaic metre. The iambus and trochee are bisyllabic feet. Now let us examine the anapaest and dactyl which are trisyllabic feet, i.e. they are made of three syllables.

iii) The Anapaestic Metre

Below is scanned a passage in anapaestic trimeter:

U U / U U / U U /
I am mon/arch of all/ I survey,

U / U U / U U /
My right/ there is none/ to dispute;

U U / U U / U U /
From the cen/tre all round/ to the sea

U U / U U / U U /
I am lord/ of the bird/ and the brute

You will notice above that the first foot of the second line is an iambus. Verses in the anapaestic metre often have iambic substitution. Now you may do the following self- check exercise.

Self-Check Exercise V

- a) How fleet is the glance of the mind
Compared with the speed of its flight!
The tempest itself lags behind
And the swift winged arrows of light

- b) The Assyrian came down like a wolf on the fold
And his cohorts were gleaming in purple and gold;
And the sheen of their spears was like stars on the sea,
When the blue wave rolls nightly on deep Galilee.

- c) Not a drum was heard, not a funeral note,
As his corpse to the ramparts we hurried;
Not a soldier discharged his farewell shot,
O'er the grave where our hero we buried.

- d) I am out of humanity's reach, Prelude of the Study
I must finish my journey alone.

The couple of lines are in anapaestic trimeter. However, the first foot is an iambic substitution.

iv) The Dactylic Metre

It helps to recall a trochee as the converse of an iambus, and the dactyl as the opposite of an anapaest. Below we scan a passage in dactylic dimeter.

/ u u / u u
Touch her not scornfully

/ u u / u u
Think of her mournfully.

/ u u / u u
Gently and humanly;

/ u u / u u /
Not of the remains of her

/ u u / u u
Now is pure womanly.

The passage above is in dactylic dimeter. The rhyme scheme is a a a b a.
Now do the following exercise.

Self-Check Exercise VI

Scan the following and then briefly comment on the scansion.

- a) One more unfortunate
Weary of breath
Rashly importunate
Gone to her death!
Take her up tenderly;
Lift her with care;
Fashion'd so slenderly young and so fair!

- b) Merrily merrily shall I live now
Under the blossom that hangs on the bough.

Above you have learnt to scan passages in the four dominant feet of English i.e. the iambus, trochee, anapaest and dactyl.

v) The Amphibrachic Metre

In a word such as eternal you notice that the emphasis falls on the middle syllable. 'Eternal' thus is in the amphibrachic foot. Let's scan a line in the amphibrachic metre.

 u / u u / u u / u u /
 O hush thee,/ my babie/ thy sire was/ a knight

You may have noticed that the last foot is an iambus.

Self-Check Exercise VII

Scan the following passage and then comment on your scansion:

- a) Most friendship is feigning
 Most friendship mere folly.

Compare your scansion with the passage scanned for you under 2.9.

Above you have an outline of the "traditional" English metres. These were established by the Renaissance theorists who tried to subject the vernacular English forms to the rules of classical prosody. Let us now turn to examine three other forms of metres.

2.3.2 Strong-stress Metres

Antecedent to the syllable – stress metres was the strong – stress metre of Old and Middle English poetry. The strong-stress metres for that reason are often called the "native" metres and they are indigenous to the Germanic languages (such as German, English, Dutch, Swedish, etc.). In strong-stress verse there are a fixed number of stresses in each line. The unstressed syllables may, however, vary considerably. The use of strong-stress metre can be seen in the Old English epic poem Beowulf (C. 1000) and in William Langland's vision poem, Piers Plowman. Below you have the opening four lines from the latter:

 / / / /
 In a somer sesun // whon softe, was the sonne

 / / / /
 I schop me in-to a schroud // a scheep as I were;

 / / / /
 In habite of an hermite // un-holy of werkes

/ / / /
Wende I wydene in this world // wondres to here.

You would notice in the four lines above that each line divides into a medial pause (II) or caesura. On both sides of the caesura there are two stressed syllables. The passage is also marked by alliteration.

With the rise of French literature in England in the 12th and 13th centuries rhyme replaced alliteration and stanzaic forms replaced the four-stress line. However, the strong-stress rhythm was too strong to be abandoned completely and it can be felt in the love lyrics and popular ballads of the 14th and 15th centuries. If you scan ‘Lord Randall’ you will find a mixture of the iambus and the anapaest of the “traditional” metre along with the four stresses divided equally on two sides of the caesura.

/ / / /
O where ha you been // Lord Randall, my son?

/ / / /
And where ha you been // my handsome young man?

/ / / /
I ha been at the greenwood; // mother, mak my bed soon

/ / / /
For I’am wearied wihuntin, // and fain wad lie down.

Today the strong-stress survives in nursery rhymes and songs:

/ / / /
Jack and Jill // went up the hill,

/ / / /
To fetch a pail // of water,

/ / / /
Jack, fell down, and // broke his crown

/ / / /
And Jill // came tumbling after.

Above there is an alternation of four and three stresses in alternate lines. However, there is more regularity in most of the nursery rhymes:

/ / / /
One, two // buckle my shoe;

/ / / /
Three, four // knock at the door;

/ / / /
Five, six // pick up sticks;

/ / / /
Seven, eight // lay them straight;

The middle of the nineteenth century saw the revival of interest in the strong-stress metres due to the innovations of Walt Whitman (1819 - 92) in America and Gerard Manley Hopkins (1844 - 89) in England. In the 20th century a number of poets, including Ezra Pound (1885 - 1972), T.S. Eliot (1888 - 1965) and W.H. Auden (1907 - 73) revived the strong – stress metre. Pound’s Pisan Cantos (1948) and Eliot’s Four Quartets (1943) testify to the energy of the strong – stress metre.

2.3.3 Syllabic Metres

In syllabic metres stresses and pauses vary. The number of syllables in each line, however, remains fixed. Poetry in Romance languages (languages that have grown out of Latin, the language of ancient Rome, such as French, Italian and Spanish) is dominated by the syllabic metres. In English, however, to most ears, the syllable-count alone does not produce any rhythmic interest.

2.3.4 Quantitative Metres

Quantity in the present context refers to the time we take to pronounce a syllable. It is a product of the duration for which we pronounce the vowel at the nucleus of the syllable. For instance you can pronounce “sweet rose” in various ways shortening and lengthening the vowel sound as you please. This variability, however, would hinder communication between the poet and you as the reader. Now if you compare Sanskrit, or Hindi for the matter, with English you find that you cannot exercise your discretion in lengthening or shortening the vowel sound or the quantity of the syllable in the two Indian languages. They are predetermined by the linguistic system of Sanskrit and Hindi.

The quantitative metres dominated Greek and Latin poetry because they are highly inflected. (To inflect a word is to change its form at the end according to its peculiar, case, mood, tense and number. For instance we can say that “child” and “boy” inflect differently in the plural.) The inflection promoted the construction of long, slow - paced lines because those languages supported the alternation of the long vowels in the roots and the short ones in the inflections. English which lost most of its inflections in the 15th century, unlike German, is less hospitable to the quantitative metres.

2.4 RHYME AND RHYTHM IN POETRY

You know that verse is generally distinguished from prose as a more compressed and regularly rhythmic form of statement. One of the most important constituents of rhythm in metre about which you know already. There are, however, other factors such as alliteration (the use of several nearby words or stressed syllables beginning with the same consonant), assonance (the repetition of the same or similar vowel sounds usually in accented syllables), consonance (the repetition of a pattern of consonants with changes in the intervening vowels such as in linger, longer, languor) and onomatopoeia (which is direct verbal imitation of natural sounds) that also contribute to rhythm. Besides metre on the one hand and alliteration, assonance, consonance and onomatopoeia on the other, rhyme helps to create rhythm and define units of verse in subtle ways. Let’s now examine rhyme and what it does, however, after you’ve done a short exercise.

Self-Check Exercise VIII

Don't scan the following passages. However, identify the use of alliteration, assonance, or consonance in them and then supply your comments in the space provided. Having done so compare your answers with those supplied at the end of the unit.

- a) Ruin hath taught we thus to ruminare
 That Time will come and take my love away.
 Shakespeare : Sonnet 64

- b) In pious times, ere priestcraft did begin,
 Before polygamy was made a sin,
 Dryden : 'Absalom and Achitophel'

- c) For shade to shade will come too drowsily,
 And drown the wakeful anguish of the soul.
 Keats : 'Ode or melancholy'

- d) Not the twilight of the gods but a precise dawn
 If sallow and grey bricks, and the newsboys crying war
 Louis MacNeice.

- e) It seemed that out of battle I escaped
 Down some profound dull tunnel, long since scooped
 Through granites which titanic wars had groined.
 Yet also there encumbered sleepers groaned
 Wilfred Owen : 'Strange Meeting'

2.4.1 Rhyme and Rhyme Schemes

Rhyme consists generally of identity of sounds at the end of lines of verse.

Now let's read the following lines:

Faith is not built on disquisitions vain;
The things we must believe are few or plain

John Dryden : Religio Laici

Above 'vain' and 'plain' are rhyming words. You will notice that both are accented monosyllabic words. Such a rhyme is called masculine.

When the accented syllable is followed by an unaccented syllable (as in 'hounding' and 'bounding') the rhyme is called feminine. An example is given below:

Then to come, in spite of sorrow,
And at my window bid good-morrow.

You notice above that 'sorrow' and 'morrow' are bisyllabic words and the accent falls on the first syllables. You will notice also that there is doubled rhyme above.

In English triple rhyme is used for comic or satiric purposes, as Byron does in Don Juan:

...oh!, ye lords of ladies intellectual
Inform us truly, have they not henpecked you all?

Above the last three syllables that have been underlined rhyme.

Sometimes syllables within the same line may rhyme as in the last stanza of Browning's 'Confessions' :

Alas,
We loved, sir – used to meet;
How sad and bad and mad it was –
But then how it was sweet!

The words 'sad', 'bad' and 'mad' in the passage above rhyme though within the same line. This is an example of internal rhyme.

When rhymes are only rhymes in appearance and not in sound as in the case of 'alone' and 'done' or 'remove' and 'love' we have eye rhyme.

Above (SCE VIII,e) you read a few lines from Wilfred Owen's 'Strange Meeting'. The poem furnishes examples of assonance. However, Owen called it pararhyme. Such rhymes are now used for special effects but it was earlier understood as a sign of pressing exigency or lack of skill. It was thus called off rhyme (or partial, imperfect or slant rhyme).

You have read above that Old English and Old Germanic heroic poetry as well as the lyrics in O.E. were written in strong-stress metre. With the ascendancy of the influence of French on English rhymes replaced alliteration and stanzaic forms gave way to four stress lines of the so called "native" or strong –stress metres.

However, blank verse is unrhymed verse and until the advent of free verse it alone achieved wide popularity in English. Although used by the Earl of Surrey in translating Vegil's Aeneid blank verse was employed primarily in drama. Milton's Paradise Lost (1667), however, was one of the first epic poems in English to use it. In the nineteenth century Wordsworth's the Prelude (1868 - 1869), Tennyson's Idylls of the King (1833) and Browning's the Ring and the Book (1868 - 1869) were written in blank verse.

Sometimes stanzaic forms do not exist in poetry in blank verse as in the case of Milton's 'Lycidas' (1637) and Paradise Lost this is true also of rhymed verse as in Samuel Johnson's 'London' (1738 and 'The Vanity of Human Wishes' (1749). The texts are divided into units of sense as in prose paragraphs and are thus called verse paragraph.

The recurring feature of English poetry is, however, a stanza which consists of a fixed number of lines and a well defined rhyme scheme. However, it is not so in the case of Dryden's 'Alexander's Feast' (which you will read in Block 5) which has lines of varying lengths as well as number of lines. Similarly Spenser's Epithalamion is in the stanzaic form but the stanzas are constituted of lines of varying lengths and rhymes. In this case stanzaic form is reinforced by a refrain i.e. a line repeated at the end of each stanza.

The simplest form of a stanza is the couplet; that is two lines rhyming together. A single couplet in isolation is called a distich. When a couplet expresses a complete thought and ends in a terminal punctuation sign we call it a closed couplet. You have already read about the heroic couplet.

A traditional form of the couplet is the tetrameter, or four beat couplet:
Milton's

'L' Allegro' and Marvell's 'To His Coy Mistress' are admirable examples of great poetry in the octosyllabic couplet.

A three rhymed pattern is called a triplet or tercet. Below is an example of it from Dryden's poetry:

Warm'd with more particles of Heav'nly Flame
He wing'd his upward flight, and soar'd to fame:
The rest remained below, a Tribe without a Name

Three lines with one set of rhyming words can be found also in Tennyson's 'The Eagle'. This is, however, not very common in English and generally used to give variety to a poem in the rhyming couplet. However, the rhymes are sometimes linked from verse to verse and may run as aba – bcb – cdc – ded- and so on. This form of triplet is called terzarima. It is borrowed from Italian and was employed by Dante (1265 - 1321) in his Divine Comedy. The finest example of it in English is Shelley's "Ode to the West Wind" which, however, ends on a couplet.

Quatrains are stanzas of four lines. Above you read about the ballad stanza in which tetrameter and trimeter lines alternate. A variety of rhyme schemes have been observed in quatrains: a b a b (in which lines rhyme alternately); a b c b (in which the second and fourth lines only rhyme).

Dryden (in Annus Mirabilis) and Gray (Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard) in the eighteenth century employed five stress iambic lines that rhyme alternately. In the nineteenth century Tennyson used tetrameter quatrains rhyming a b b a in In Memoriam and FitzGerald used pentameter quatrains that rhyme a a b a in his translation of The Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam.

There are, however, stanzas of five six, seven and eight lines which are too numerous to be differentiated. Here we will discuss some of the "named varieties".

- a) Rhyme royal was used by Chaucer for the first time in English in Troilus and Criseide (c. 1385/88) and then by Shakespeare in The Rape of Lucrece (1594). The rhyme scheme of a seven line stanza in rhyme royal is a b a b b c c. It looks as if a quatrain has been dovetailed onto two couplets.

- b) Ottavarima was introduced in England by Wyatt in the sixteenth century. The premier example of this verse form is Byron's Don Juan. The rhyme scheme of the eight lines stanza is a b aa b a b c c. You will notice that an extra a rhyme has been introduced in the rhyme royal scheme. The people couplet at the end of the stanza gives a witty verbal snap to the foregoing section.
- c) The Spenserian stanza like the preceding two stanza forms discussed above has iambic pentameter lines. However, the last line is an Alexandrine. Edmund Spenser devised it for The Faerie Queene. In the nineteenth century Keats employed it brilliantly for Eve of St. Agnes and Shelley for Adonais. The nine lines rhyme a b a b b c b c c. You notice that the b sound recurs 4 times and c three. The pattern is intricate and poems in this stanza form are slow-moving.
- d) The Sonnet was originally a stanza used by the Sicilyanschool of court poets in the thirteenth century. From there it went to Tuscany where it reached its highest expression in the poetry of Petrarch (1304 - 74). He wrote 314 sonnets idealizing his beloved Laura.

In England it was Henry Howard, Earl of Surrey (1517 - 47) and Sir Thomas Wyatt (1503 - 42) who experimented with the sonnet form and gave it the structure that Shakespeare used and made famous. Since then the sonnet has proved itself to be one of the most versatile of the poetic forms. It was used in recent years by Vikram Seth in his novel The Golden Gate. Long poems composed of a series of sonnets are called sonnet sequence. Poets such as Edmund Spenser, Sir Philip Sidney, Michael Drayton, Conrad Aiken and Rainer Maria Rilke have grouped together sonnets dealing with a particular lady of situation. However, the degree in which they are autobiographical or tell a coherent story is a matter on which opinions diverge.

The sonnet today is defined as a lyric of fourteen lines in the iambic pentameter form. However, originally it was a stanza in the Italian. There have been sonnets in the hexameter as for instance the first of Sidney's Astrophil and Stella and Milton's 'On the New Forces of Conscience', which is in twenty lines. Most of the sonnets, however, fall into two or three categories – the Petrarchan, Shakespearean and Spenserian.

The Petrarchan sonnet is divided into two parts of eight and six lines each called the octave and the sestet. Originally the sonneteer set forth a problem in the octave and resolved it in the sestet. However, Milton did not follow the convention nor did he use it as a medium for the expressions of his amorous inclinations as Petrarch had done before him. Wordsworth and Keats both wrote Petrarchan sonnets. a Petrarchan rhymes may be employed such as cdccdc or cdecde.

The Shakespearean sonnet is usually divided into three quatrains to be followed by a rhyming couplet. The rhyme scheme of a Shakespearean sonnet: is abab cd cdefef gg.

A Spenserian sonnet is also divided into three quatrains and a rhyming couplet. However, there are fewer rhymes in a Spenserian sonnet than in the Shakespearean. The former follows rhyme scheme:

Ababbcbccdcdee.

Above we have discussed rhymes and the various types of rhyme schemes employed by poets writing in English. Now let us examine the function of rhythm in poetry.

2.4.2 Rhythm

Rhythm is to borrow Plato's words, 'an order of movement' in time. We generally speak of rhythm in connection with poetry or music. However, you must have heard people talking of the rhythms of nature of even biological rhythm. Perhaps periodic repetition of a certain pattern is the sine qua non of rhythm. All the arts – painting, sculpture, and architecture – have their rhythm. Here, however, we will talk of rhythm in the context of poetry only. Above you studied about a variety of acoustic effects in poetry such as metre, rhyme, alliteration, onomatopoeia, etc. They contribute to the rhythm of a poem. Prosody which takes into account the historical period to which poem belongs, the poetic genre and the specificities of a poet's style goes closer to the rhythmic aspect of a poem.

For instance, quantity (or vowel length) is a rhythmic but not a metrical feature of English poetry. This is because English does not impose any strict regularity in quantity as it does with respect to stress. For example in 'sweet rose' the vowel sounds can be lengthened or shortened at will. This cannot be done in many Indian languages. However, the lengthening and shortening of the vowel sound does affect the rhythm of the poem. Similarly, the rise and fall in the human voice, especially in reading poetry which is called cadence is a rhythmic not a metrical feature. Many other factors contribute to the rhythm of a piece of verse or prose. Grammatical features are some of these.

Roman Jakobson drew our attention to grammatical features in poetry. He compared the role of pure grammatical parallelism in poetry to geometrical features in painting 'For the figurative art' he wrote, 'geometrical principles represent a "beautiful necessity"...' and went on to add, 'It is the same necessity that in language marks out the grammatical meanings.' In his 'Yeats' "Sorrow of Love" through the Years' written along with Stephen Rudy they drew attention to Yeats's predilection for "art that is not mere story – telling". They went on:

According to Yeats, "the arts have already become full of pattern and rhythm. Subject pictures no longer interest us. "In this context he refers precisely to Degas, in Yeats' opinion an artist whose excessive and obstinate desire to 'picture' life – "and life at its most vivid and vigorous" – had harmed his work. Jakobson and Rudy go further and point out,

The poet's emphasis on pattern reminds one of Benjamin Lee Whorf, the penetrating linguist who realized that 'the patternment' aspect of language always overrides and controls the 'lexation' or name – giving aspect, "and an inquiry into the role of "pattern" in Yeats' own poetry becomes particularly attractive, especially when one is confronted with its constant and careful modification of his own works.

The two authors go on and draw attention to Yeats' epigraph to his Collected works in Verse and Prose which reads:

The friends that have it I do wrong
When ever I remake a song.
Should know what issue is a stake:
It is myself that I remake.

In the course of his revisions, the patternings, Yeats claimed not just to be improving his poems lexationally but pattern-wise, rhythm-wise which he equated with remaking himself under the influence of some much more deep and subtle truth which we can apprehend if at all only transiently.

If we scan a couple of sonnets of Shakespeare and compare their rhythm we can appreciate its role in poet's style. Let's first scan two sonnet of Shakespeare – sonnets 71 and 116. They are given below:

U / U / U / U / U /
 No long/er mourn/ for me/ when I /am dead
 U / U / U / U / U /

You may have noticed above that in sonnet 71 Shakespeare's theme is death, his own death, not death in the abstract as in the case of Donne. Shakespeare is addressing his beloved, the dark lady and asking her to forget all about him. The legacies of time are suffering and despair and Shakespeare conveys his slow progress towards them with the help of the solemn regularity of the iambic pentameter. It is, however, gently disturbed as the narrative progresses. A caesura divides the third foot of the sixth line. There are parentheses in lines 9 and 10. In the last line of the third quatrain Shakespeare asks his beloved to forget him (after having written the sonnet to perpetuate his memory) nay more, let her love decay along with decay of the lover's body. The irony of this audacious request finds echo in a spondaic third foot of the twelfth line. Shakespeare's resigned irony soon finds voice in the thirteenth line where the pyrrhic first foot is succeeded by a spondee in the next.

Rhythm derives from the Greek rhythmos which in turn derives from rhein which means to flow. Rhythm is generally understood as an ordered alternation of contrasting elements. However, you noticed above that Shakespeare gave expression to his personal feelings in sonnet 71 by wrenching the metre. Mutability, death and decay were a recurrent theme in the poetry of the Elizabethan age and the ground rhythm of iambic pentameter adequately expresses it. However, if Shakespeare had made periodicity of accent the sine qua non of his rhythm it would have been only at the cost of his expressive range.

Unlike sonnet 71 sonnet 116 is, to use Gerard Manley Hopkins's term, metrically "counter-pointed". Trochaic reversal in the first foot is not unusual in an iambic pentameterline .however, Shakespeare makes use of a trochaic foot even in the second. In fact the only iambic foot is the third foot which is succeeded by a pyrrhic-spondaic combination. The first line is enjambed i.e., it runs over to the second line with its three iambic feet and a caesura and a reversed fourth foot. The sudden violence of the poet's felling is checked with the help of two pyrrhic feet alternating with the iambic ones in the last line of the first quatrain. The iambic ground rhythm is fully established only in the second quatrain.

The third quatrain, however, begins with a reversal and a spondaic substitution. In the last line of the quatrain the rhetorical emphasis on the third foot is supported acoustically with the use of a spondee. These deviations help the poet in lifting the theme above mundane realities and communicating his “meaning” better.

We had a glimpse of Shakespeare’s manipulation of meter in two of his sonnets. Even with the help of just two samples we can say that Shakespeare has a powerful and distinctive style. The prosody of every poet of genius is unique and his rhythm is perhaps the most personal of the expressive equipments. However, we cannot forget that a language has a metrical pattern peculiar to itself. There is also a historical determinant of the choice of metre. Complex factors contribute towards the determination of rhythm. Nature herself said Aristotle, ‘teaches the choice of the proper measure’. However, it is the poet’s task to hear her voice with sincerity and humility if s/he is to discover her/himself.

2.5 ANALYSIS OF A POEM

In the foregoing sections you read about the various elements of poetry. A knowledge of some of the theoretical aspects of poetry would help you in reading poems. Below you will read an analysis of Keats's 'On First Looking into Chapman's Homer.' Did you scan the poem and write your observations in SCE III (b) ? If you did not you should now do so in order to benefit from in section. Let's now analyse the poem.

'On First Looking into Chapman's Homer'

John Keats (1795 - 1821) was the youngest of the Romantic poets. He was the son of manager of a livery stables in Moorfields. He died when Keats was eight. His mother remarried but died of tuberculosis when he was fourteen. John the eldest child, had two brothers – George and Tom – and a sister, Fanny. Keats was apprenticed to an apothecary-surgeon at the age of fifteen. Before the apprenticeship he had received his early education at Clarke's school an Enfield.

On evening in October 1816 Keats read the works of Homer in the translation of the Elizabethan poet George Chapman. He did this in the company of Charles Cowden Clarke, son of his former master and his life long friend. That Keats had a monumental experience is clear from "On First Looking into Chapman's Homer".

Somewhat like a true Petrarchan sonnet this poem also clearly divides the treatment of the theme between the octave and the sestet. In the octave Keats sets the background while the sestet describes the effect on him of his experience.

In the first half of the octave Keats speaks of his wide of Western literature – which he characterizes as "realms of gold". Keats's metaphor gives us an insight into his attitude towards literature. The 'goodly states' and 'Kingdoms' are the poet's territories they have marked out as their own in the infinite area of the English or Western languages. However, these territories are held by poets not insolently as Kingdoms are held but as a sign of their loyalty towards Apollo, the ancient classical god of poetry. This is a sign of Keat's literary piety for we know that Keats like Shelley was not a Christian poet.

The second half of the octave extends the metaphor of the kingdom of poetry to tell us that Keats had heard about Homer's epics although he had never read them. Homer is traditionally recognized as the first epic poet of Europe just like Valmiki and Vyasa were of India. They can be considered pure and original because they did not borrow their images from other poets. Homer knew and understood human nature dispassionately. His understanding was clear and unclouded by doubts, distractions and fears. Besides, Homer was the monarch of poets deserving the exalted title of 'serene'. It is at the end of the octave that Keats tells us about the cause of his exaltation i.e. his reading (with Charles Cowden Clarke) of Homer in Chapman's translation. The octave structurally is not divided from the sestet as it ends in a colon.

Having told us about the background of his poem in the octave Keats turns to communicate his enjoyment of Homer to us in the sestet. This is done through two unforgettable images. The first of these is that of a professional astronomer into whose sight a new planet has moved in. the second is that of a discoverer such as Hernan Cortez who conquered Mexico for Spain and became the first western adventurer to enter Mexico city. Historically, however, it was Vasco Nunez de Balbao who was the first European in 1513 to stand upon the peak of Darien in Panama. It is significant that Keats does not name any astronomer such as Galileo who had discovered new satellites of the planet Jupiter. It would be in keeping with Keats's piety to infer that in referring to 'some watcher of the skies' he is making use of the primitive figure of speech of periphrasis. If the images help Keats in communicating his peculiar felling or flavor of the sense or meaning the rhythm of his verse gives further density by suggesting the right tone and unfolding the intention while reemphasizing his meaning or sense, and feeling.

As pointed out earlier, 'On First Looking' is a Petrarchan sonnet that makes use of four rhymes in the following scheme: abbaabba cdcddc. Perhaps it would be apposite to point out that because of such few rhymes, i.e. 4, the intensity of feeling is communicated better than it could have been done with the help of a Shakespearean sonnet with its seven rhymes and relatively loose structure more suitable for a meditative and philosophical tone.

Although European in appeal thematically, Keats's sonnet is typically English with its ground rhythm of iambic pentameter. There are only two variations in the first quatrain. There is a pyrrhic foot in the first and another in the fourth line. The second quatrain begins with a trochaic reversal and it announces the turn in the subject matter. From literature in general, Keats narrows down to Homer in the second half of the octave.

The sestet which describes Keats's state of exaltation conveys it at the acoustic level through variations from the blank verse ground rhythm. Lines 10, 11, 12 and 13 have pyrrhic substitutions. In case we elided the unstressed first foot to include the article 'a' in the first foot of the tenth line we could read it as an anapaestic foot. However, in that case the line would have only four feet. It would become brief and fast suggesting the swimming of a planet into the range of vision of the astronomer with astronomical speed. There is another anapaestic substitution in the fourth foot of the twelfth line. However, the line retains the five feet notwithstanding the trisyllabic foot. The last four lines are given to the explorers in the new world and the crescendo comes in the last line which begins with a trochaic reversal. The importance of the theme for the poet is suggested by the spondaic second foot of the eleventh line which begins the new comparison.

Keats has been called a poet of the senses. The abstract idea of the discovery of a new planet gives joy is cerebral but the sight of the seascape from the peak in Darien is more sensual and akin to Keats's character. The choice of Keats's imagery in this sonnet and marrying it to the appropriate rhythm clinches the success of the poem. 'On First Looking into Chapman's Homer' has, no wonder, become a felicitous record of one of Keats's unforgettable personal experiences of an encounter with the father of European poetry that was Homer.

Above we have tried to show how the various aspects of the poem can be knit together into an account of your appreciation of it especially with respect to your observations or rhythm. If you were in a class with your friends we might have analysed a few poems and seen how our responses varied. If possible try it out from time to time, at the Study Centre or at a privately formed Study Group.

2.6 LET'S SUM UP

In the previous unit we examined in the first place the thing called poetry in somewhat abstract terms. In this unit we examined the prosodic aspect of poetry. Finally we showed how the various aspects can be put together in our critical appreciation of a poem. This is what we expect you to be able to do on this course. Critics say that the evolution of the rhythm of a language tells us about the cultural evolution of the people, their changing and evolving consciousness. If this is a tall claim I leave you to decide for yourself.

Hereafter the units will tell you either about an age or a poet or about some poems. We will expect you to be able to respond to all the three – the man, the milieu and the moment that gave birth to the poem – in your comments on passages set from poems prescribed for detailed study and printed in these blocks.

This is a long unit. You must not have expected it to be longer. You should prepare your own notes on lyric, epic, ode, etc. or figures of speech such as simile, metaphor, synecdoche, metonymy, etc. You should consult a dictionary of literature in order to discover the terms of art as and when you feel the need to do so.

2.7 A BRIEF ANNOTATED BIBLIOGRAPHY

This unit does not tell you about literary terms, figures of speech, etc. However, as a student of literature you will be required to understand and use them in various contexts including your essays and answers. Below are recommended a few dictionaries and encyclopedias for your use.

The new edition of The Oxford Companion to English Literature (1985) edited by Margaret Drabble is intended to serve, as its predecessor Sir Paul Harvey's (1932), as a 'useful companion to ordinary everyday readers of English literature'. It gives brief notes on authors of books, literary trends such as Neoclassicism and Romanticism, (Postmodernism is alas missing), figures of speech such as oxymoron and litotes, literary movements such as the Oxford, or Pre-Raphaelite and Aesthetic movements and many other facts that a student of English literature would wish to know from time to time. It is possible that the new edition has not reached the shelves of the library you have access to. That should not disturb you. I found Sir Paul's work very delightful and in the beginning Drabble's work with its shorter notes was a bit of a disappointment to me. Besides the Companion you may consult, Dictionary of Literary Terms by Harry Shaw published by McGraw Hill Book Co. (New Delhi, 1972) and The Concise Oxford Dictionary of Literary Terms by Chris Baldick (Delhi, 1990). The Oxford Companion to Twentieth-century Poetry edited by Ian Hamilton (Delhi, 1994) has a much broader coverage on poetry in English.

Literary criticism today more than ever before has been under the influence of disciplines such as rhetoric and Linguistics. You would find Amiya Bhushan Sharma's The Growth and Evolution of Classical Rhetoric (Ajanta: New Delhi, 1991, '92) at the Study and Regional Centres. It is meant to introduce classical rhetoric to distant learners in India like yourself. For a quick reference to terms such as felicity conditions of lexie consult A Dictionary of Stylistics by Katie Wales published by Logman (London, 1989). Encyclopedia of Literature and Criticism edited by Martin Coyle et.al. (Routledge: London, 1990) has long articles written by experts on various aspects of literature including an article on 'Postmodernism' by Robert B. Ray (pp. 131 - 147).

In case you wish to study some thought provoking essays on poetry and its 'meaning' I should recommend just two: the first one is by Roman Jakobson called 'What is Poetry?' (pp. 368 - 378) in Language and Literature edited by Krystyan Pomorska and Stephen Ruddy (Harvard University Press: Cambridge,

2.8 ANSWERS TO SELF-CHECK EXERCISES

Exercise I :

 u / u / u
1. In woods/ a ran/ger

 u / u / u
 To joy/ a stran/ger

The two lines above are in iambic dimeter. However, they are hypermetrical which means that an unaccented rhyming syllable is at the end of each line.

 u / u / u /
2. Thy way/ not mine, / o Lord,

 u / u / u /
 Howev/er dark/ it be;

 u / u / u /
 Lead me / with thine / own hand,

 u / u / u /
 Choose out/ the path/ for me.

The quatrain above is in regular iambic trimeter.

 u / u / u / u /
3. The way/ was long/ the wind/ was cold,

 u / u / u / u /
 The min/strel was/ infirm/ and old;

 u / u / u / u /
 The harp, / his sole/ remain/ ing joy,

 u / u / u / u /
 Was car/ ried by /an or/ phan boy.

Above there are two couplets in regular iambic tetrameter.

 u / u / u / u /
4. Confu /sion, shame,/ remorse/ despair,

 u / u / u /
 At once/ his bos/ om swell

 u / u / u /
 The damps/ of death/ bedewed/ his brow;

 u / u / u / u /
 The damps/ of death/ bedewed/ his brow;

 u / u / u /
 He shook,/ he groaned,/ he fell.

In the stanza above iambic trimeter lines alternate with iambic tetrameter lines. We also notice that 'swell' and 'fell' rhyme but the first and third lines don't. We thus get the impression that the stanza could also be written as iambic heptameter couplets.

U / U / U / U /
 5. I put /my hat/ upon /my head
 U / U / U /
 And walked/ into/ the strand
 U / U / U U /
 And there/ I met ano/ ther man
 U / U / U /
 Whose hat /was in/ his hand.

The poem above is iambic in rhythm alternating tetrameter and trimeter in verse length.

Self-Check Exercise II

Now you may scan a couple of passages from Shakespeare and Keats and write your comments on them in the space provided:

a) / / U /

Shakespeare: Macbeth

If you read Shakespeare's Macbeth in Understanding Drama you must have recognized the words of the eponymous hero, in the play. Macbeth met the three witches on his way back from the battlefield who had addressed him successively as duke of Glamis, thane of Cawdor and finally as king of Scotland. Impressed by his display of courage Duncan has honoured him by giving him the dukedom of Glamis and thaneship of Cawdor. However, Macbeth is not yet King of Scotland which he cannot be, unless, he thinks, he murders Duncan, his king and benefactor. The idea of regicide and ingratitude has shaken him and he admits of having his 'functions' being 'smothered in surmise'. The given extract is the opening part of his introspection (for us) and soliloquy for the audience in the theatre.

The ground rhythm of the extract is iambic pentameter. However, he does not follow it slavishly. There are interesting variations. They are as below:

- the first line is iambic dimeter;
- the first foot is a spondee;
- there are at least three pyrrhuses in passage of ten lines i.e. in the 3rd, 6th and 7th;
- seventh and eight lines are hypermetrical;
- there are two caesuras – in the third and seventh lines;
- the third foot of the sixth and the fourth foot of the seventh lines have an elision.

With the help of these variations Shakespeare imparts colloquial ease and informality to the soliloquy. We notice here, to use Coleridge’s words, as we did not in the case of Sackville and Norton, metre being used as a pattern of expectation, fulfilment and surprise. As Macbeth makes his progress from confusion to clarity in the course of the soliloquy we notice the ground rhythm becoming more and more natural. According to Harvey Gross, the function of prosody is ‘to image life in a rich and complex way’. We notice here for ourselves how prosody has succeeded in articulating the movement of the mind of Macbeth.

b) On first Looking into Chapman’s Homer

U / U / U U U / U /
 Much have/ I tra/velled in/ the realms/ of gold,
 U / U / U / U / U /
 And ma/ny good/ly states/ and King/doms seen;
 U / U / U / U / U /
 Round ma/ny west/ren is/lands have/ I been
 U / U / U U U / U /
 Which bards/ in feal/ty to Appol/o hold
 / U U / U / U / U /
 Oft of/ one wide/ expanse/ had I /been told,
 U / U / U / U / U /
 That deep/ browed Ho/mer ruled/ as his/ demesne
 U / U U / U / U /
 Yet did/ I ne/ver breathe/its pure/ serence
 U / U / U / U / U /
 Till I/ heard Chap/man speak /out loud /and bold:
 U / U / U / U / U /
 Then felt/ I like /some watch/er of /the skies
 U U U / U / U U /
 When a /new pla/net swims/ into/ his ken;
 U / U U U U / U /
 Or like/ stout Cort/ez when/ with eag/le eyes
 U / U U U / U U / U /
 He stared/at the Paci/fic, and all/ his men

/ / / / / / /
 Looked at/each oth/er with/ a wild/ surmise
 / / / / / / /
 Silent/ upon/ a peak/ in Da/rien.

For comments on the prosodic features of this sonnet read section 2.6.

Self-Check Exercise IV

- a) / /
 Dreadful gleams,
 Dismal screams,
 Fires that glow,
 Shrieks of woe,
 Sullen moans,
 Hollow groans,

You could say that above there are three couplets in trochaic monometer. However it would be more appropriate to call it a passage in trochaic dimeter with the second foot being catalectic in each case. Perhaps the best idea would be to call it a passage in the amphimacer foot. The passage can be scanned in any of the three ways.

- b) / / /
 Rich the/ treasure,
 Sweet the/ pleasure.

J. Dryden

The two lines are in trochaic dimeter.

- c) / / / / / / / /
 When the/ British/ warrior/ queen ^
 / / / / / / / /
 Bleeding/ from the/ Roman/ rods, ^
 / / / / / / / /
 Sought with/ an in/dignant/mien ^
 / / / / / / / /
 Counsel/ of her /country's/gods. ^

The stanza is in trochaic tetrameter. However, the last foot of every line is catalectic. We call a foot catalectic that has just an accented syllable.

- d) / / / / / / / /
 Tell me/ not in /mournful/ numbers
 / / / / / / / /
 Life is /but an /empty /dream; ^

/ u / u / u / u
 For the/ soul is /dead that/ slumbers,
 / u / u / u /
 And things/ are not /what they/ seem. ^ A.W. Longfellow

The stanza is in trochaic tetrameter. However, the last foot of the second and fourth lines are catalectic. The rhyme scheme of the passage above is: a b a b.

/ u / u / u / u / u
 e) All that/ walk on/ foot or/ ride in/ chariots
 / u / u / u / u / u
 All that/ dwell in/ palac/es or /garrets

The stanza is in trochaic pentameter.

/ u / u / u / u / u / u
 f) On a /mountain/ stretched be/neath a/ hoary/ willow
 / u / u / u / u / u / u
 Lay a /shepherd/ swain and/ viewed the/ rolling/ billow.

The couplet is in trochaic hexameter.

Self-Check Exercise V

u / uu / uu /
 b) How fleet /is the glance/ of the mind
 u / uu / uu /
 Compared /with the speed/ of its flight!
 u / uu / uu /
 The tem/pest itself/ lags behind
 uu / uu / uu /
 And the swift /winged ar/rows of light

The ground rhythm of the passage above is anapestic trimeter. However, the first foot of each of the first three lines is an iambus. Iambic substitutions in lines in the anapestic meter is quite common.

u u / u u / u u / u u /
 b) The Assyr/ ian came down/ like a wolf/ on the fold
 uu / uu / u / uu /
 And his co/horts were gleam/ing in pur/ple and gold;
 uu / uu / uu / uu /
 And the sheen/ of their spears/ was like stars/ on the sea,
 uu / uu / uu / uu
 When the blue/ wave rolls night/ly on deep/ Galilee.

The passage is without any variation in anapaestic tetrameter.

uu / u / uu /uu /
 c) Not a drum was heard, not a funeral note,
 uu / uu / u / u /
 As his corpse to the ramparts we hurried;

U U / U U / U U / U /
 Not a soldier discharged his farewell shot,
 U U / U U / U / U /
 O'er the grave where our hero we buried.

If repetition of a pattern is the sine qua non of rhythm, the passage is uniformly in tetrameter. However, out of sixteen feet only ten are in the anapaest. The remaining feet are in the iambic.

U / U U / U U /
 d) I am out/ of human/ity's reach,
 U U / U U / U U /
 I must fin/ish my jou/rney alone.

The couple of lines are in anapaestic trimeter. However, the first foot is an iambic substitution.

Self-Check Exercise VI

Scan the following and then briefly comment on the scansion.

/ U U / U U
 b) One more un/fortunate
 / U U /
 Weary of /breath ^ ^
 / U U / U
 Rashly im/portunate
 / U U /
 Gone to her /death! ^ ^
 / U U / U U
 Take her up/ tender ly;
 / U U /
 Lift her with/ care; ^ ^
 / U U / U U / U U /
 Fashion'd so slenderly /young and so/ fair! ^ ^

The two stanzas above are in dactylic dimeter. They rhyme alternately i.e. a b a b c d c d. the second, fourth, sixth and eight lines are catalectic.

/ U U / U U / U U /
 a) Merrily/ merrily/ shall I live/ now
 / U U / U U / U U /
 Under the/ blossom that/ hangs on the/ bough.

The couplet/ distich above is in dactylic trimeter.

Self-Check Exercise VII

U / U U / U
 a) Most friendship/ is feigning,
 U / U U / U
 Most friendship/ mere folly.

Both the lines are in amphibrachic dimeter.

Self-Check Exercise VIII

- a) There is alliteration in ‘ruin’ and ‘numinate’ on the one hand and ‘taught’, ‘time’ and ‘take’ on the other.
- (b) Dryden by employing ‘pious’, ‘priestcraft’ and ‘polygamy’ on the one hand and ‘begin’ and ‘before’ on the other in his distich makes use of the figure of sound of alliteration.
- c) The repetition of the sibilants i.e. ‘shade’ and ‘soul’ on the one hand and ‘drowsily’ and ‘drown’ on the other create an acoustic effect that is daily experience. This particular type of effect is called alliteration.
- d) In the two lines the consonants in ‘dawn’ and ‘war’ are different. However, there is an identity of vowel sounds. This is an example of assonance.
- e) It seemed that out of betel I escaped
Down some profound dull tunnel, long since scooped
Through granites which titanic wars had groined.
Yet also there encumbered sleepers groaned.

Wilfred Owen : ‘Strange Meeting’

In the passage above we have underlined four words. ‘Escaped’ and ‘scooped’ have an identity of consonants while the vowels differ just as in ‘groin’ and ‘groan’ also. These are two examples of consonance.

Self-Check Exercise IX

- 1) Rhyme refers to the agreement in terminal sounds of two or more words of lines in verse such as rich and which; increase and peace; descend and extend. Rhythm indicates measured flow of words and phrases in prose or verse or movement suggested by the succession of strong or weak elements or of different conditions in a given time span.
- 2) Rhythm is one of the factors of style. It indicates flow or progression in time. Certain units get repeated in rhythm – a foot in English poetry when repeated contributes to the rhythm of that poem. Poets often achieve effects not by regularity but through breaks in the order, the established ground rhythm of the poem.
- 3) Every poet, for that matter any artist, has a distinctive style and his/her rhythm contributes to words it. We talk about Milton’s grand style and contrast it with the gentle art of Shakespeare. Milton writes about Heaven and Hell, God and satan; Shakespeare about ordinary men and women involved in their common love and hate, ambition and defeat, pride and humility such as we experience ourselves. Their choice of words, rhythm of their language are thus poles apart just as are their themes. All these tell us something about the persons the Milton and Shakespeare must have been in their inner lives.

3.0 OBJECTIVES

You have already read some of Shakespeare's sonnets and learnt to scan them. After reading this unit you will be able to think, speak and write on William Shakespeare and his sonnets in general and two sonnets, 29 and 30 in particular.

This will lay the foundation for an appreciation, in the long run not only of Shakespeare's sonnets but also other sonnet sequences and long poems of Elizabethan poets such as Edmund Spenser (1552 – '99), Sir Philip Sidney (1554 – '86), Christopher Marlowe (1564 – '93), Samuel Daniel (1563 - 1619) and, quite a few others.

3.1 INTRODUCTION

In this unit you will read a brief life sketch of William Shakespeare (1564 - 1616) and two of his sonnets. Read this unit section by section in the order presented here giving yourself a short break from time to time. Don't try to read both sonnets in quick succession. It may be a good idea to read them several times day after day till you have committed them to memory.

There is plenty of material on the internet on Shakespeare and other Elizabethan poets and poems; you may read them also if you like and if you have time.

3.2 WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE: THE NATIONAL POET OF ENGLAND

3.2.1 Introduction

Shakespeare is certainly the most famous of literary artists of the English Speaking world. He has been compared with Johann Wolfgang Von Goethe (1749 - 1832) in Germany, Victor Hugo (1802-85) in France, Miguel de Cervantes (1547-1616) in Spain, Alighieri Dante (1265 -1321) in Italy, Leo Tolstoy (1828-1910) in Russia and Tulsidas (1532? - 1623) in India. Ben Jonson (1574-1637) one of Shakespeare's great contemporaries called him the greatest European writer:

Of all, that insolent Greece, or haughtie Rome
Sent forth, or since did from their ashes come
Triumph, my Braitainne, thou hast one to showe,
To whom all scenes of Europe homage owe,

Shakespeare has retained his place in the Western literature as the artist par excellence.

3.2.2 Early Life

William was the eldest son of John Shakespeare as glover and dealer in other commodities such as barley, timber and wood. John's father Richard Shakespeare was a yeoman farmer of Snitterfield. He farmed in two manors one of which belonged to Robert Arden maternal grandfather of William. Richard, William Shakespeare's grandfather died in 1561. John married Mary Arden around 1557 and William was born on 23 April, 1564 as he was according to local Church records baptized at the Holy Trinity Church Stratford-upon-Avon on 26 April, 1564, three days after his birth following the local tradition. Mary Arden and John Shakespeare had eight children of whom four sons and a daughter survived childhood. For a time John Shakespeare was very successful. He was the burgess of the borough and chosen and alderman in 1565 and bailiff in 1568.

William may have gone to the grammar school at Stratford run by the borough where he may have learnt to read, write and speak Latin and some of the classical poets. William Shakespeare certainly did not go to the University. Instead at the age of 18, in November or December 1582 he married Anne Hathway of Shottery only two miles away from Stratford. She was eight years his senior and three months pregnant by William. Their daughter Susanna was baptized on 26 May, 1583. Anne gave birth to their son Hamnet and daughter Judith on 2 February, 1585. We employment at this time except from the antiquary and biographer John Aubrey's (1626-97) account of Shakespeare as a school master in the country.

3.2.3 In the Theatre

Shakespeare probably entered the world of theatre in 1587 when the Queen's Men came to Stratford to stage a play. One of their men had been murdered and William Shakespeare filled the vacancy. The first recorded reference to his drama is by Robert Greene (1558-92) in his Greenes groats-worth of wittee (1592) in which he called Shakespeare 'an upstart crow, beautified with our feathers. Greene had been educated at St. John's College and Clare Hall, Cambridge from 1575 until 1583 and had been incorporated at Oxford in 1588. Greene was a University Wit – a name coined by George Saintsbury (1845 -1933) the chair, since 1895 of rhetoric and English literature at Edinburgh for twenty years. The other Elizabethan playwrights who had been to Oxford or Cambridge were Thomas Nashe (1567-1601). John Lyly (1554-1606) and Thomas Lodge (?1558-1625) Greene or his editor Henry Chettle (c. 1560-? 1607) printer and playwright of sorts also called Shakespeare un absolute Johannes Factotums in his own conceit the only Shake scene in a country. As 'Johannes Factotum' or 'Jack of all trade' Shakespeare was criticized for being a second-rate tinkerer with the works of others.

Greene's attack is the earliest surviving mention of Shakespeare's career in the theatre. Apart from Henry VI in 3 parts Shakespeare had also published Titus Andronicus and King John by 1592. Shakespeare began his writing career by adapting existing scripts, altering and modifying them which accounts for the variability in these early pieces.

3.2.4 The Poet

Shakespeare finds mention for the first time in the Stationer's List in 1593 for Venus and Adonis. This was followed by The Rape of Lucrece in 1594. Both were dedicated to young Henny Wriothesley (pronounced Risley, Riesley or Rosely) the third Earl of Southampton. Both were a literary and commercial success. The warmth and ardour of the dedication to Southampton of The Rape matches the fire and enthusiasm of the sonnets addressed to the 'Fair Youth' and it is quite certain that they were getting written about this time. The sonnets were not meant for the general public but only for the eyes of one or two lovers mentioned in the poems. They were published by Thomas Thorpe, without Shakespeare's agency, in 1609. The volume includes the poem 'A Lover's Complaint'. In the meantime Robert Chester had published Shakespeare's 'The Phoenix and the Turtle' in his Loves Martyr (1601) a collection of poems by various hands.

Poetry appears to have been Shakespeare's pastime during the plague years in 1592 and '93. When the theatres opened in 1594 Shakespeare received a sum of hundred pounds, a great sum in those days, from Southampton with which he became a shaver in Lord Chamberlain's Men, one of the most important acting companies then in London. As a sharer he was part owner of the stocks of the company and shared also in its expenses and profits. In 1596 John Shakespeare at Stratford applied for and got a coat of arms which established his gentility. Next year William bought New Place, the second largest house in Stratford. In 1598 Richard Burbage, the famous actor died and his two sons invited Shakespeare and four other of the principal actors in the Lord Chamberlain's men to invest for a half share in the new globe theatre which they built on the Thames using timber from the old theatre for the foundations. The venture was a success and in 1602 Shakespeare could buy 107 acres of land and 20 acres of pasture from a local magnate John Combe. In 1603, at the accession of James I the company was renamed King's Men.

3.2.5 Achievements

Shakespeare wrote some of his greatest tragedies such as Hamlet (1601), King Lear (1605), Othello (1604) and Macbeth (1606), Antony and Cleopatra (1607) and Coriolanus (1608) by 1608. His last plays, perhaps his most perfect, were romances: Pericles (1607), Cymbeline (1609), The Winter's Tale (1611) and The Tempest (1611). Shakespeare returned to Stratford in 1613 where he died on 23

April, 1616. Tow of his colleagues in the theatre, namely John Heminges (1556-1630) and Henry Condell (d. 1627) together edited the first folio (1623) of his plays and Ben Jonson (1572/3-1637) wrote his memorial verses for the in which he proudly proclaimed:

He was not of an age, but for all time
And all the Muses still were in their prime
When like Apollo he came forth to warme
Our eares, or like a Mercury to charme!
Nature her selfe was proud of his designes
And joy'd to were the dressing of his lines
Which were so richly spun, and woven so fit,
As, since, she will vouchsafe no other wit.

Shakespeare has attracted the greatest number of scholars engaged in the study of English Literature in each generation and in every land. Shakespeare has found admirers not only in literature but also in cinema.

3.3 SHAKESPEARE'S SONNETS

3.3.1 Background

Sonnets are fourteen-line poems in two or three rhyme schemes. One of them is named after the Italian humanist and poet Petrarch (Francesco Petrarca) (1304-74) who used the sonnet sequence to praise Laura whom he first met in 1327. His odes and sonnets in praise of Laura were later included in conzoniere of Rime (1360). His sonnets structurally and also in thought process are divided into octaves and sestet, i.e. eight-and six-line stanzas. The octaves follow the rhyme scheme abba, abba but the rhyme scheme of the sestet vary:

Ccd ccd or cdcdcd or cdecde. Petrarch had profound influence on European literature as he showed the way for the revival of interest in ancient Greek and Latin literatures. The most well known name in English for the immediate influence of Petrarch is that of Sir Thomas Wyatt (1503-42) who held many diplomatic assignments in France, Italy, Spain and the Netherlands in the service of the Tudor monarch Henry VIII(1509-47).

Sir Thomas visited Italy for the first time in 1527 when he got inspired by Petrarch's poems and essays and translated them into English. The most accomplished writers of Petrarchan sonnets in English are Milton and Wordsworth.

Henry Howard, (by courtesy) Earl of Surrey (? 1517 - 47) was in the English army in France (1544-6). However, his sonnets were predominantly in the 'English' form, i.e. abab, cdcd, efef, gg which was later used by Shakespeare. A third variety of the sonnets is that invented by Spenser. The rhyme scheme of a Spenserian sonnets is:

abab bcbc cdcd ee

3.3.2 The Themes of Shakespeare's Sonnets

Shakespeare did not write his sonnets for publication. Thomas Thorpe published them in 1609 without his permission. He got the manuscript from someone whose name bears the initials W.H. A.L. Rowse opines that Shakespeare must have given his sonnets to Henry Wriothesley ten years younger than himself to whom he had dedicated his Venus and Adonis and the Rape of Lucrece and who was the 'fair youth' to whom the first 127 sonnets were addressed along with the 25 addressed to the dark lady from some lewd background and the last two to cupid the god of Love, thus making in all 154 in the sequence. These sonnets are amatory in character but it was in these sonnets that Shakespeare bared his soul and must have found their publication quite embarrassing.

Scholars are of the view that a large number of the sonnets were written in the years 1592-94 when the theatres were closed in London due to plague and Shakespeare was in the country. Young Henry Wriothesley, Earl of Southampton about 19 was young and beautiful and Shakespeare 29. Marlowe described Southampton in his portrait of Leander in Hero and Leander with liveliness and precision

His dangling tresses that were never shorn,
His body was as straight as Circes wand,
Jove might have sipped out Nectar from his hand,
Even as delicious meat is to the taste,
So was his neck in touching, and surpassed,
The white of Pelop's shoulder.

In Greek mythology Pelops was grandson of Zeus. His father Tantalus, cooked and served Pelops to the gods at a banquet but only Demeter, mourning the loss of her daughter Persephone, was distracted enough to eat from the dish. The gods ordered the body restored but the shoulder. Demeter's portion, was missing, and Pelops was given a replacement of ivory. The body of Pelops, says Marlowe, was whiter than ivory.

Marlowe's description of Southampton in the person of Leander would have been approved by his contemporaries:

Some swore he was a maid in man's attire
For in his looks were all that men desire.....
And such as knew he was a man would say,
Leander, thou are made for amorous play:
Why are thou not in love, and loved of all?
Though thou be fair, yet be not thine own thrall.

Marlowe advised Leander, i.e. Southampton, to avoid narcissistic tendencies in himself and open himself to others' affections.

Shakespeare's expressions of love in the 'fair youth' sonnets are more platonic than sexual. Let's read sonnet 18:

Shall I compare thee to a summer's day.
Rough winds do shake the darling buds of May,
And summer's lease hath all too short a date
Sometime too hot the eye of heaven shines,
And often is his gold complexion dimm'd;
And every fair from fair some time declines,
By chance, or nature's changing course, untrimm'd

In the first two quatrains we get a picture of the impact Southampton has made on Shakespeare's mind, the portrait draws its power and force by comparison with nature. There is 'twon' or 'Volta opening of the third quatrain. The mood of the poem shifts and the poet expresses a revelation:

But thy eternal summer shall not fade
Nor lose possession of that fair thou ow'st;
Nor shall Death brag thou wand'rst in his shade,
When in eternal lines to time thou grow'st.

Shakespeare's epiphany is in actual fact condescension in the garb of true esteem which ceases to remain muffled in the last two lines of the sonnet:

So long as men can breathe or eyes can see,
So long lives this, and this gives life to thee.

Compared with the spiritual love for the 'fair youth' in sonnet 18 Shakespeare's sonnets for the Dark Lady are overtly sexual in appeal. It is evident from the poems that the lady has dun coloured skin and black hair. Shakespeare scholars have named Lucy Negro a London prostitute, Mary Fitton and Emilia Lanier as likely candidates for the dubious distinction of being Shakespeare's partner in the acts of love.

3.4 SONNETS 29 AND 30: A STUDY IN COMPARISON

3.4.1 The Texts

Sonnet XXIX

*When in disgrace with fortune and men's eyes
I all alone bewep my outcast state,
And trouble deaf heaven with my bootless cries,
And look upon myself, and curse my fate,
Wishing me like to one more rich in hope,
Featured like him, like him with friends possessed,
Desiring this man's art, and that man's scope,
With what I most enjoy contented least;
Yet in these thoughts my self almost despising,
Haply I think on thee, and then my state,
Like to the lark at break of day arising
From sullen earth, sings hymns at heaven's gate;
For thy sweet love remembered such wealth brings
That then I scorn to change my state with kings.*

Sonnet XXIX

*When to the sessions of sweet silent thought
I summon up remembrance of things past,
I sigh the lack of many a thing I sought,
And with old woes new wail my dear time's waste:
Then can I drown an eye, unused to flow,
For precious friends hid in death's dateless night,
And weep afresh love's long since cancelled woe,
And moan the expense of many a vanished sight:
Then can I grieve at grievances foregone,
And heavily from woe to woe tell o'er
The sad account of fore-bemoaned moan,
Which I new pay as if not paid before.
But if the while I think on thee, dear friend,
All losses are restor'd and sorrows end.*

3.4.2 An Analysis

'When to the sessions' and the preceding sonnet 29 – 'When in disgrace with fortune and men's eyes' – are companion pieces. In 29 the poet bewails certain retrogression in his fortune and in 30 the loss of friends and many things he sought in life which he could not get. In both poems Shakespeare cheers up when he remembers his friend. Then he overcomes the hurt caused by his outcast state or depression inflicted by his lack of achievements or loss of friends. However, for a lyric (sonnet 30) that tells us about the intimate experiences of the poet, its language couched in formal court vocabulary may appear wooden on cogitation is seamless in offering the contradictory aesthetic experience of pain and happiness.

In both sonnets i.e. 29 and 30 Shakespeare recounts common losses, unfulfilled ambitions, decease of friends, etc. In sonnet 29 Shakespeare seems to bemoan certain qualities and influence he could not acquire: 'Desiring this man's art, and that man's scope'. In sonnet 30 he sighs the lack of many a thing he sought. The immediate reason for the downcast state in which he finds himself is fall from the favour of goddess Fortuna as well as people around him. Nothing precipitous accounts for the dip in happiness in sonnet 30 but idle memory: 'sessions of sweet silent thought'. So while in sonnet 29 the poet like Job in the Old Testament troubles deaf heaven with his bootless cries' in sonnet 30 he wastes his 'dear' time summoning old thoughts to the court of his mind. A setback in his career forces the poet to take recourse to the reassurance of religion in sonnet 29; in sonnet 30, the relaxed indulgence in past memories makes him somewhat distant, aloof and offish. So while in sonnet 30 he is conscious of the wastage of his time, in sonnet 29 the experience is more intense and the poet like Job curses his fate.

Shakespeare wrote the sonnets when he was in his late twenties and early thirties. It appears somewhat strange that he should be overcome by grief for 'precious friends hid in death's dateless night.' We recall that Marlowe, born in the same year as Shakespeare himself and the only contemporary poet Shakespeare alluded to in his plays died in 1593 and his only son Hamnet passed away in August 1596 and Spenser in 1599. Their decease could bring tears to his eyes. The overarching self-possession in sonnet 30 is expressed by the poet's assertion that his eyes are 'unused to flow.' Still the loss remembered in sonnet 30 is so personal in nature and affecting his person that he cannot help crying:

And weep afresh love's long since cancelled woe,
And moan the expense of many a vanished sight:

The memory of his son Hamnet must have been profound and moving. Did Shakespeare use Hamnet to buttress some scene or character in some of his early plays which comes to him with a sense of guilt? The poet bemoans 'The expense of' some of his 'vanished sight.'

Sonnets 29 and 30 may be called complementary: the former is full of tear and cries and in the latter Shakespeare seems to have gained self-control and authority even compensating for the loss in the former sonnet. The second quatrain of sonnet 29 exposes Shakespeare's innermost desire. He was a commoner, unlike Henry and Robert i.e. Southampton and Essex. However, he was conscious of his gifts. And still, he must have felt that he was inferior even as a playwright, to Christopher Marlowe of his own age. He must have desired the art of Marlowe and Spenser and the scope of earls of Southampton and Essex to whose circle he belonged. Marlowe was University educated; Shakespeare had to give up his education owing to some catastrophic decline in his father's fortune. The latter's status in the late 16th century was that of a hanger on and an ordinary actor and at best an insignificant playwright. He lacked many things: the skills of Marlowe as well his scope as one of Walsingham's circle and of course the 'influence' of Essex who was very dear to Queen Elizabeth. But more than all these Shakespeare sought the company of Henry Wriothsley, Earl of Southampton 'the world's fresh ornament' of which he never felt he had his full.

Let's now turn to the third quatrains in the two sonnets. It is typical of Shakespeare to turn around the train of thought. Sonnet 30 is a more formal, public conscious utterance, so Shakespeare introduces the idea of now grieving over his grievances mentioned in the preceding quatrains. In a way, the melancholic strain is strengthened in the third stanza which gives an epiphanic character to the concluding lines of the poem:

But if the while I think on thee, dear friend,
All losses are restored and sorrows end.

This revival of spirit comes faster in sonnet 29. The third quatrain reverses the melancholic atmosphere of the foregoing quatrains. Here Shakespeare tells his reader that while he is despising himself on several counts he remembers his friend, i.e. Southampton, his 'state' or body begins to sing,

Like to the lark at break of day arising
From sullen earth, sings hymns at heaven's gate;

Shakespeare has used an epic simile in a lyric and an extremely fresh and rejuvenating one. The poet's gloom was like the darkness of night, like the solidness, sullenness and miserableness of the dark earth but the lark symbolizes joy and light just like the 'break of day' and it rises from the sullen earth carrying with it earth's music in the form of 'hymns', 'at heaven's gate.' Shakespeare has offered a scintillating image of light in the lark in sonnet 29 which reminds us of 'the main of light' in sonnet 60 where 'nativity' the birth of an infant is compared, by suggestion to dust particles in a shaft of light in an otherwise dark room.

The end of sonnet 29 is as luminescent as the image of the 'lark at break of day arising':

For thy sweet love remembered such wealth brings,
That then I scorn to change my state with kings.

Sonnets 29 and 30 are on the theme of memory but while the former is rich in passion the latter is restrained in emotion. The poetic devices never stand out for their own sake; they unobtrusively enrich the texture of the poem and enrich our aesthetic experience.

4.0 OBJECTIVES

After having read the unit you will be able to:

- Talk about Milton, the poet
- Discuss and appreciate ‘L’ Allegro’ & ‘Il Penseroso’
- Examine ‘On the Late Massacre in Piedmont’
- Appreciate ‘When the Assault was Intended on the City’

4.1 INTRODUCTION

As a student of literature you might have heard the name of John Milton. Who was he? Why is he famous for? What is his contribution to English poetry? Most of you might be well familiar with these issues. This unit is an attempt to extend your knowledge of Milton still further and make you very intimate with the poet who wrote the first great epic in English. We shall first try to know Milton both as a person and litterateur. You will agree that knowing the person will give us greater insight into his poems. Then we shall take up four of his poems – two pastoral poems and two sonnets.

4.2 JOHN MILTON (1608 - 1674)

John Milton was born in London on 9 December 1608 in a well-to-do family. He was the second child of John and Sara (née Jeffrey). Milton's father, John Milton Sr., was a man of culture, a classical scholar and a musician of no mean ability. He supported the reformers against his father's will. We can very well guess the consequences when one goes against the will of one's parents. Milton Sr., too, was disinherited by his parents for casting his lot with the Reformers. This forced him to work for his living in different capacities - as a scrivener, legal secretary as well as a person dealing in real estate transactions and money lending. He also served as a composer of church music. Perhaps it was because of this that his son (Milton, the poet) too experienced a lifelong delight in music. Our Milton (the poet) took lessons in classical languages, first by private tutors at home and then at St. Paul's School in 1620. Milton himself spoke of his childhood:

“My father destined me from my infancy to the study of polite literature, which I embraced with such avidity, that from the age of twelve, I hardly ever retired from my books before midnight. This proved the first source of injury to my eyes, whose natural weakness was attended with frequent pains in the head; but as all these disadvantages could not repress my ardour for learning, my father took care to have me instructed by various preceptors, both at home and at school.” (Quoted from Crompton-Rickett)

In 1625, Milton was admitted to Christ's College, Cambridge. He was a hardworking student; but he was also argumentative and could not easily accept injustice. Naturally, only a year later, in 1626, he got suspended after a dispute with his tutor, William Chappell. The suspension, however, also proved a blessing in disguise, as it was during his temporary return to London that he attended plays, and perhaps began his first forays into poetry.

At his return to Cambridge, Milton was assigned a new tutor, Nathaniel Tovey. Life at Cambridge was still not easy on Milton. On the one hand, he was dissatisfied with the curriculum and on the other hand, many of his fellow students disliked him and Milton knew this very well. It was at Cambridge that he composed 'On the Morning of Christ's Nativity' on December 25, 1629. Crompton- Rickett gives a very good picture of Milton's life: "Proud and austere even at college, Milton conceived as lofty a view of the poet's calling as did Wordsworth two centuries later, and like Wordsworth, felt himself to be a consecrated spirit. In age of considerable licence and loose manners, Milton set a fine example by his sobriety of life."

In 1642, after receiving his M.A. cum laude at Cambridge, Milton returned to the family homes in London and Horton, Buckinghamshire. Here, for several years he devoted his time to private study and literary composition. It was during this period that Milton wrote poems such as 'On Shakespeare', 'L'Allegro' and 'IL Penseroso'. His Comus, a masque, was performed at Ludlow Castle in 1644. This masque was first published anonymously in 1647 with music from Henry Lawes, the well known court composer.

For Milton, 1647 was the year of misfortune and losses. In April 1647, his mother died and only a few months later, in August, his friend Edward King died by drowning. In November, upon his memory, Milton composed the beautiful elegy, 'Lycidas'. Thus, the loss became a gain in terms of literary achievement. This elegy was published in a memorial volume at Cambridge in 1648.

Milton set out for a tour of Europe in the spring of 1648 and met several eminent persons. These persons included Hugo Grotius and Giovanni Batista (biographer of Torquato Tasso). Milton wrote 'Mansus' in the latter's honour. Upon reaching Geneva, Milton found out about the death of his childhood friend, Charles Diodati in London. Milton's tour of Europe was cut short with rumours of impending civil war in England. He returned home in July 1649 and shortly thereafter composed 'Epitaphium Damonis', a Latin poem in the memory of his dearest friend.

During the Civil War, Milton emerged as a prolific pamphlet writer. He wrote pamphlets on political and religious matters. His 'Of Reformation', 'Animadversions', and 'Of Prelatical Episcopacy' were published in 1641 and 'The Reason for Church Government' in February, 1642.

In the spring of 1642, at the age of 44, Milton married Mary Powell who was half his age (17 years old). The marriage, however, was an unhappy one. Shortly after their marriage, Mary left him to visit her family and did not return. The political interests of the two families also came in the way of their marriage. The Powells sided with the King in the Civil War and this further worsened the matter. However, his bitter experiences in marriage motivated Milton to write his so-called Divorce Tracts in which he spoke for divorce on the grounds of incompatibility. In 1644, Milton published the Doctrine and Discipline of Divorce, which had its second, longer edition in early 1644. In 1644, Milton also published The Judgement of Martin Bucer Concerning Divorce. His Divorce Tracts caused such an uproar all around - in parliament, amidst the clergy, and general populace - that he was nicknamed "Milton the Divorcer."

The attempted censorship of the Divorce Tracts by the Stationers' Company provoked Milton to publish his eloquent Areopagitica in late 1644. It was an oration advocating freedom of the press. Milton also had time to write a treatise Of Education, which prescribed a rigorous course of study for English youth. In 1645, Milton published Tetrachordon and Colasterion, and registered Poems of Mr. John Milton, Both English and Latin.

Milton's personal life took a favourable turn and he got reunited with Mary Powell. The fruition of this reunion was the birth of two daughters - Anne in 1646 and Mary in 1648.

Two weeks after the public execution of Charles I on January 30, 1649, Milton published Tenure of Kings and Magistrates and in March. As a reward to his services during the Civil War, the Cromwellian government appointed Milton Secretary for Foreign Tongues and ordered him to write an answer to Charles I's purported Eikon Basilike (Royal Image). After publishing Observations on the Articles of Peace, Milton published Eikonoklastes (Image Breaker) in October, 1649. In 1650, the Council of State ordered Milton to write a response to Salmasius' Defensio Regia - the Continental outcry against the English action (Defense of Kingship). Defensio pro populo Anglicano was published in February, 1651. Milton's first son, John, was born in March and the Miltons moved to Westminster.

The year 1652 was another year of losses and gains. It was in this year that he lost his sight. This was a great personal loss but this also made him introspect his 'talent' as well as the future course of life. The loss of sight prompted him to write the well known sonnet 'When I Consider How My Light is Spent' also known as 'On his blindness'. In May, 1652, Mary after giving birth to a daughter, Deborah, died and their one year old son John met with the same fate in June.

In 1654, Milton published Defensio Secunda and in 1655, Defensio Pro Se (“Defense of Himself”). In 1656, Milton married Katherine Woodcock and in late 1657, their daughter Katherine was born. However, his new wife and their daughter both passed away in 1658. Milton wrote the sonnet ‘Methought I saw my late espoused saint’ in the memory of his wife Katherine Woodcock.

In early 1659, Milton published A Treatise of Civil Power and Ready and Easy Way To Establish a Free Commonwealth. However, for his propaganda writings, Milton had to go into hiding, for fear of retribution from the followers of King Charles II. The reason was obvious: with the death of Lord Protector Oliver Cromwell in 1658 the Commonwealth were coming to a close. King Charles II was restored to the throne on May 40, 1660.

In 1664, notwithstanding his daughters’ protest, Milton married again. This time to Elizabeth Minshull. It was during this time that Milton completed his epic, Paradise Lost which is among the greatest works ever written in English. With this Milton overcame the pangs of his blindness. You may wonder how a blind person could write so prolifically and also compose such a great work. Well, it is said that he would compose verse upon verse at night in his head and then dictate them from memory to his aides in the morning. Paradise Lost finally saw publication in 1667, in ten books. It was reissued in 1668 with a new title-page and additional materials. The book was met with instant success. It amazed several persons. Even Dryden is reported to have said, “This man cuts us all out, and the ancients too.”

Hereafter, Milton wrote prolifically: History of Britain was published in 1670; Paradise Regain’d and Samson Agonistes were published together in 1671. Of True Religion and Poems, &c. upon Several Occasions were published in 1674. In summer 1674, the second edition of Paradise Lost was published, in twelve books.

Milton died peacefully of gout in November, 1674, and was buried in the church of St. Giles, Cripplegate. His funeral was attended by “his learned and great Friends in London, not without a friendly concourse of the Vulgar.” A monument to Milton rests in Poets’ Corner at Westminster Abbey.

From the brief sketch of Milton’s life, it is obvious that Milton was the child both of the Renaissance and the Reformation. His childhood was spent at a time when the Renaissance was in the ascendancy. His youth witnessed the rise of Puritanism, and his old age marked the consummation of the Puritan ideals. Naturally, in his poetry we notice a nice fusion of elements both of the Renaissance and the Reformation. A link between the Age of the Renaissance and the Puritan Age is well perceived in his poetry. He is both a belated Elizabethan and a fervent disciple of the Reformation.

On the basis of our discussion in this section, we can put Milton’s works in four periods.

- The College Period. His college poems, Latin and English, are for the most part simply a young man’s experimental work, and are of little importance. But ‘the Ode on the Morning of Christ’s Nativity’ is an exception. It is written on a Biblical subject, but glows with imagination and is full of pagan imagery, thus revealing a fusion of the Renaissance and Reformation influences.
- The Horton Period. To this period belong four minor poems. These poems are ‘L’Allegro’ and ‘Il Penseroso’ (1644), Comus (1644), and ‘Lycidas’

(1647). From them we now learn that he began to write chiefly under the inspiration of the learning and art of the Renaissance. The Puritan element was at first quite subordinate but it gradually gained in strength and depth till it became at last the dominant element. 'L' Allegro' and 'Il Penseroso' present charming contrasted pictures of man, nature and art. The first poem is in the mood of gladness whereas the second in that of melancholy. What is remarkable in these poems is that there is little that is characteristically Puritan. In fact, there is a good deal that is really un-puritan; for, the poet dwells frankly upon the pleasures of romance and rustic sports, upon the beauty of Church architecture and music – all these were the objects of uncompromising hatred to the religious fanatic. Comus, which is the finest example in our literature of Masque, also belongs to the Renaissance.

However, in 'Lycidas' we have a Puritanism which is political and ecclesiastical as well as spiritual and ethical. The religious accent in this elegy is unmistakably puritan. Its fair attack upon the corrupt church and the hireling clergy also openly proclaims Milton's adherences to the Puritan cause. However, Like Spenser's 'Astrophel', 'Lycidas', too, is in the conventional style of the classical pastoral elegy. Thus, in terms of form, 'Lycidas', too, like Comus, belongs to the Renaissance.

- The period of religious and political controversies. In his 41st year, Milton willingly got himself into the fierce controversies of the hour. To use his own words, by choosing to do that he embarked "on a troubled sea of noises and hoarse disputes". In fact, to discharge in his opinion, 'a great public duty', he laid aside his ambition to write a great epic which had always taken shape in his mind. For the next twenty years, Milton continued actively as a writer of prose and was involved in political and religious controversies all the time. He thus turned from poetry entirely and this was a great loss to poetry.
- The Period of the Great Epics. Eventually, when he turned back to poetry, he produced Paradise Lost, the greatest English epic, the stupendous masterpiece of intellectual energy and creative power. Here, we have the complete fusion of the Renaissance and Reformation elements. This is not the case with Paradise Regained which is completely dominated by Puritanism. The entire space in this epic is taken by the spiritual conflict between good and evil. As such, there is hardly any action in it.

The labours of Milton's closing years triumph again in Samson Agonistes. As in Paradise Lost, in this 'dramatic poem', too, Milton applies the form of classical art to the treatment of a Biblical subject. Samson Agonistes is fashioned strictly upon the principle of Great tragedy, while the matter, mood, tone and outlook are strictly Hebraic and Biblical.

We may say, on the basis of our presentation so far that Milton represents the highest and the complete type of Puritanism. However, the culture of the Renaissance was never totally exterminated by his puritanical bend of mind. In his poetry, the puritanical strain is apparent in following manners (a) in the choice of religious subjects, especially in the later poems, (b) the sense of responsibility and moral exaltation, (c) the fondness for preaching, and lecturing, which in Paradise Lost is a positive weakness, and (d) the narrowness of outlook, strongly puritanical, seen in his outbursts against his opponents (as in Lycidas), in his belief regarding the inferiority of women, and in his scorn for the "miscellaneous rabble". Similarly, the Renaissance elements are seen in his love of beauty, his classical learning, and his use of classical forms of poetry. Don't you think that studying such a poet who offers so much will be a fascinating exercise? Why to wait then? Let's read in detail some of his poems and see for ourselves what he offers to us.

4.3 'L' ALLEGRO' & 'IL PENSEROSO'

4.3.1 The Background of the Poems

'L'Allegro' (which means "the happy man" in Italian) is a pastoral poem by John Milton. This poem is invariably paired with 'Il Penseroso' ("the melancholy man"), which depicts a similar day spent in contemplation and thought. It is uncertain when 'L'Allegro' and 'Il Penseroso' were composed because they do not appear in Milton's Trinity College manuscript of poetry. However, if we go by the settings in the poems, we may infer that they were possibly composed shortly after Milton left Cambridge. As far as their publication is concerned, both these poems were first published in Milton’s 1645 collection of poems. In the said collection, the two poems complement each other structurally and contain images which are in specific dialogue with one another. They also serve as a balance not only to each other but also to his Latin poems, including ‘Elegia 1’ and ‘Elegia 6’.

Several critics are of the opinion that it is nearly impossible to understand and appreciate ‘L’ Allegro’ without also having read its companion piece, ‘Il Penseroso’. If L’ Allegro is “the happy person” who spends an idealized day in the country and a festive evening in the city, Il Penseroso is “the thoughtful person” whose night is filled with meditative walking in the woods and hours of study in a “lonely Tower.”

4.3.2 The Text: ‘L’ Allegro’

Hence, loathed Melancholy,
 Of Cerebus and blackest Midnight born
 In Stygian cave forlorn,
 ‘Mongst horrid shapes and shrieks and sights unholy
 Find out some uncouth cell.
 Where brooding Darkness spreads his jealous wings.
 And the night-raven sings :
 There, under ebon shades and low-browed rocks.
 As ragged as thy locks.
 In dark Cimmerian desert ever dwell. 10
 But come, thou Goddess fair and free,
 In heaven yclept Euphrosyne,
 And by men heart-easing Mirth ;
 Whom lovely Venus, at a birth.
 With two sister Graces more,
 To ivy-crowned Bacchus bore :
 Or whether (as some sager sing)
 The frolic wind that breathes the spring.
 Zephyr, with Aurora playing.
 As he met her once a-Maying, 20
 There, on beds of violets blue.....

 On summer eves by haunted stream, 140
 Then to the well- trod stage anon.
 If Jonson’s learned sock be on.
 Or sweetest Shakspeare, Fancy’s child.
 Warble his native wood-notes wild.
 And ever, against eating cares,
 Lap me in soft Lydian airs.
 Married to immortal verse,
 Such as the meeting soul may pierce.
 In notes with many a winding bout
 Of linked sweetness long drawn out 140

With wanton heed and giddy cunning.
 The melting voice through mazes running.
 Untwisting all the chains that tie
 The hidden soul of harmony ;
 That Orpheus' self may heave his head
 From golden slumber on a bed
 Of heaped Elysian flowers, and hear
 Such strains as would have won the ear
 Of Pluto to have quite set free
 His half-regained Eurydice.
 These delights if thou canst give,
 Mirth, with thee I mean to live.

(From 'L' Allegro')

Glossary

- L'Allegro. : The happy or cheerful person; "lively, gay, merry."
- Melancholy : A physiological condition associated with both depression and genius
- Cerberu : The three-headed hound that guards the gates of hell
- Uncout : Unknown, desolate.
- Ebon : A type of hard, black wood
- Cimmeria : The Homeric land of the Cimmerians was so close to the edge of the world that it was eternally wrapped in "mist and cloud" of night (Odyssey 11.14 -9).
- ycleap'd : Named, called. Most editors point to this archaism as particularly Spenserian.
- Euphrosyne : The Goddess of Mirth
- Sager : Wise men
- Zephir with Aurora : This alternate ancestry of Euphrosyne makes her the daughter of the west wind and the dawn. As Roy Flannagan suggests, Milton may be saying that accurately tracing Mirth's origin is not important: "getting there is all the fun, in the sense that the begetting of Mirth must be joyful and guilt-free" (Flannagan 66).
- Fill'd her : Begot, as if he were breathing wind into her. In other words, Mirth will awaken man to his joyful potential.
- Cranks : Like "quip" and "wile," a crank is a fanciful verbal trick.
- Becks : "A gesture expressive of salutation or respect; an inclination of the head.
- Hebe's : The goddess of youth
- Sport : Youthful mockery, jest
- trip...toe : Here, "trip" means to step or dance full of life and vigour.

crue	: “Crew,” reminiscent of Comus’s gang of revellers.
Unreproved	: Blameless, or simply unblamed
Lark	: The counterpart to nightingale in ‘Il Penseroso’; traditionally the first bird to sing in the morning.
Bid good morrow	: There has been some disagreement over who comes to the window to “bid good morrow.” While critics have suggested Mirth, the Lark, and the Dawn, most editorial opinion supports L’Allegro himself. For a discussion on this issue see Stanley Fish 114-15.
Eglantine	: Honeysuckle
the Cock	: The rooster and his Dames are the first of several paired figures (for example, the clouds and the mountain’s breast, and so on) which Casey Finch and Peter Bowen suggest reflect the poem’s theme of sexual companionship.
Scatters the rear	: As in military combat, the rooster’s crowing forces Darkness’ troops to retreat quickly.
Stack	: Haystack
Chearly	: Cheerfully
Hoar Hil	: The dew-covered hills of a summer morning.
Som time	: Analyzing ‘L’Allegro’ as if it were a cinematic montage with dream sequences and slow dissolves, Herbert Phelan notes that while lines 41-56 seem to be in the present tense, 57-69 describe a different time period (Phelan 4) .
State	: The sun begins his stately march as if he were a king.
Dight	: Clothed
tells his tale	: Most editors identify this as a play on words: the shepherd recounts his story and/or counts his sheep.
Lantskip	: Landscape
Measures	: To travel over, traverse (a certain distance, a tract of country)
Pide	: Pied, spotted
Cynosure	: Something that attracts attention by its brilliancy or beauty; a centre of attraction, interest, or admiration.
Corydon and Thyrsi	: Greek pastoral figures
Phillis...Thestylis	: Two more Virgilian shepherds
Bowre	: Cottage
Mead	: Meadow
Secure	: Free from care; derived from the Latin meaning.
Rebecks	: A medieval form of fiddle with three strings
Faery Mab	: Queen of the fairies

Early Modern English Poets	Junkets	: “Any dainty sweetmeat, cake, or confection”
	Friars Lanthorn	: Friar’s Lantern.
	Goblin	: Several editors have suggested the goblin here is a version of Shakespeare’s Puck, the hobgoblin from Midsummer Night’s Dream . Milton’s goblin will do housework and field work only if he is fed by the homeowner.
	Lubbar Fend	: Lubber Fiend: “A beneficent goblin supposed to perform some of the laborious work of a household or farm during the night”
	Chimney’s	: Fireplace
	Crop-ful	: Sated, full. Presumably, the goblin has just gorged himself on the cream which was set out for him.
	Mattin	: Morning song
	Towred Cities	: The scene now shifts from a day in the country to a night in the city.
	Weeds	: Garments, here courtly costumes.
	Triumphs	: Courtly festivals
	Hymen	: God of marriage
	Sock	: The slipper worn by Greek comic actors. Traditionally the sock refers to comic performances and the buskin to tragic.
	fancies childe	: As if Shakespeare were the child of imagination (fancy) personified.
	Lydian Aires	: John Carey and Alastair Fowler note that in the Republic 4.498 -9, Plato associates this Greek musical mode with laxness, conviviality, softness and sloth. James Hutton, however, suggests that Milton may not have meant this as a pejorative term, since Cassiodorus speaks of it approvingly as providing relaxation and delight.

4.3.3 Appreciating the Stages of Progression of the Poem ‘L’Allegro’

The first 10 lines of ‘L’Allegro’ may be looked upon as prelude. Here, the speaker ritually banishes melancholy and disease, associated with hell and darkness. Milton follows the traditional classical hymn model when the narrator invokes Mirth/ Euphrosyne and her divine parentage between lines 11 and 24. He first welcomes Mirth (fair vs dark, free vs cave). She is known as the daughter of Venus (love) and Bacchus (wine, revelry), sister to brightness and bloom. But in typically Miltonic alternative genealogy, she is daughter of Zephyr (west wind) and Aurora (dawn). Mirth embodies time of day the poem celebrates, and is connected with May rituals (fertility, community), and flowers. She is buxom (yielding) and gentle. In lines 25-46, we find the speaker inviting her to bring personified friends - Jest, Jollity, Hebe (youth), Sport and Laughter, followed by the mountain nymph Liberty (political resonance?) or Freedom (not license or luxury). In lines 44-48, Mirth and Liberty are linked – linked to lark (dawn), which pushes back darkness, and bids him (sun) good morning. Then we have the depiction of crowing cock scattering darkness, while infinitive (speaker, not cock) hears hounds and horns (49-56). We also have a subtle hint of “sometime walking” (57-68). This something is presumably the speaker. He is listing all the things he’d do if he joined the crew. The ‘something’ also walks by the ploughman, milkmaid, mower, shepherd, all about to, or actually at, work. All these references along with Shepherds “tell” (either tallying sheep, or telling stories, or both) very well link up with pastoral and georgic poetry.

Then, the speaker straightway eyes new pleasures (69-80): landscape, mountains, brooks, rivers, towers (country estate). Then we find shepherds meeting for lunch and then the suggestion (81-90) that Phyllis needs to haste (present emphatic) to work, a different job whatever the season (seasonal rounds and rural rituals). We are then carried to a local village, on a holiday (91-117) where we have bells and dancing all day. Here, the poem has literary links about English lore (Mab, Friar, Hobgoblin, Robin Goodfellow): Robin joins with others in unending toil of rural life; he leaves at dawn. The tales done, the villagers go to bed.

From line 117, the scene changes again and we are brought to cities’ pleasures: social life, people, ladies, beauty, city marriages, feasts, revelry and masques. These references add to the poem’s appeal to romance. This is further reinforced when the suggestion about fantasy. One wonders if the entire poem is a fantasy (the sights young poets dream “on summer’s eve by haunted stream”) vision.

That the art is part of this “ideal” day is made explicit, from line 141 onwards, though the suggestion was implicit throughout the poem. Now we have references to the theatre of Jonson, Shakespeare (learned, and “native” comedy respectively), and music, married to verse (song): “linked sweetness long drawn out”. The speaker is requested to be immersed in the poetry and the pleasures that Mirth is able to produce:

And ever against eating cares,
Lap me in soft Lydian airs,
Married to immortal verse
Such as the meeting soul may pierce (lines 145–148)

In the last two lines we are told that these are the delights, if Mirth can give them, that would make speaker join her. The final lines of the poem is a response to questions found within Elizabethan poetry, including Christopher Marlowe’s ‘Come live with me and be my love’:

These delights, if thou canst give,
Mirth with thee, I mean to live. (lines 151–152)

4.3.4 The Text: ‘Il Penseroso’

Hence, vain deluding Joys,
The brood of Folly without father bred !
How little you bested,
Or fill the fixed mind with all your toys !
Dwell in some idle brain.
And fancies fond with gaudy shapes possess.
As thick and numberless
As the gay motes that people the sunbeams.
Or likest hovering dreams,

The fickle pensioners of Morpheus' train.
 But, hail ! thou Goddess sag and hoy!
 Hail, divinest Melancholy !
 Whose saintly visage is too bright
 To hit the sense of human sight.
 And therefore to our weaker view
 O'erlaid with black, staid Wisdom's hue ;
 Black, but such as in esteem
 Prince Memnon's sister might beseem,
 Or that starred Ethiope queen that strove
 To set her beauty's praise above
 The Sea Nymphs, and their powers offended.
 Yet thou art higher far descended :
 Thee bright-haired Vesta long of yore
 To solitary Saturn bore ;
 His daughter she ; in Saturn's reign
 Such mixture was not held a stain.
 Oft in glimmering bowers and glades
 He met her, and in secret shades
 Of woody Ida's inmost grove,
 While yet there was no fear of Jove.
 Come, pensive Nun, devout and pure.
 Sober, steadfast, and demure,
 All in a robe of darkest grain.
 Flowing with majestic train.
 And sable stole of cypress lawn
 Over thy decent shoulders drawn.
 , Come, but keep thy wonted state.
 With even step, and musing gait,
 And looks commercing with the skies,
 Thy rapt soul sitting in thine eyes :

(Excerpt from 'Il Penseroso')

Glossary

- Il Penseroso : The thoughtful contemplative person melancholy person or personality
- Bested : Bestead; help, assist, relieve
- Toyes : Idle fancies and imaginary playthings
- Fond : Foolish
- gay motes : Tiny bits of dust that become visible in a bright ray of sunshine.
- Pensioners : "One who is in receipt of pension or regular pay.
- Morpheus : In Greek mythology, Morpheus is the god of dreams - one of the sons of Hypnos, the god of sleep. He and his brothers, Phobetor and Phantasus, are responsible for the variety of dreams experienced by human beings.

- Melancholy : Stella Revard believes that Milton’s goddess Melancholy is an earlier version of Urania, the Muse he invokes in Paradise Lost .
- Visage : The face or features as expressive of feeling or temperament; the countenance.
- To hit the Sense : Literally, too bright for the human sense of sight to apprehend it, or endure it. Milton imagines the female personification of Melancholy has been “O’erlaid with black” to accommodate “our weaker view,” or sense of sight.
- with black : Melancholy was one of ancient medicine’s four humours: black bile, under Saturn’s influence. Milton allows his personification to appear to have a black face, but this is simply the way she must appear to worldly mortals.
- Wisdoms hue : Solomon often is cited as wisdom personified.
- Memnons sister : In Homer, Memnon is an Ethiopian king who fights for Troy. John Leonard notes that later writers ascribe to him a sister of legendary beauty.
- Ethiope Queen : Cassiopeia, Queen to Ethiopian King Cephalus. She was stellified - hanged into a constellation—after she claimed to be more beautiful than the sea nymphs or Nereids.
- higher far descended : Compare Melancholy’s single genealogy with the two versions of Mirth’s origins in L’Allegro 14-24.
- Vesta : Roman goddess of the hearth, and daughter of Saturn, Vesta vowed to remain a virgin. Milton imagines his personified Melancholy as Vesta’s daughter, and Saturn as her Father.
- Saturns reign : In Ovid’s Metamorphoses, which tells a story of the world’s beginnings, the reign of Saturn, or Saturnine age, was a golden age.
- Bowres : A place closed in or overarched with branches of trees, shrubs, or other plants; a shady recess, leafy covert, arbour.
- Ida’s inmost grove : Saturn’s capital was, according to legend, on Mount Ida in Crete. There Jove was born; he ended the golden age and ushered in the silver by usurping his father’s throne.
- Nun : An archaic word for pagan priestess, but Milton would also have considered Catholic nuns virtually pagan.
- Demure : Sober, grave, serious; reserved or composed in demeanour
- Cipres Lawn : Cypress (fine black) linen
- wonted state : The dignity and attendance to which she is accustomed

Early Modern English Poets	Commercing with the skies	: Conversing with the skies
	Forget thyself to marble	: The reader is imagined as changed into a marble monument. This may allude to the myth of Niobe, who was turned to stone for bragging that her children were greater than Latona's children, Apollo and Diana
	Leadenn	: According to the Renaissance astrological systems, lead is linked to Saturn.
	Cherub	: Cherubim, one of the higher orders of angels, passed their time in contemplation of God.
	Hist	: Summon silently
	Philomel	: A nightingale; Refers to the story of the rape of Philomela and her transformation into a nightingale.
	Cynthia	: The moon; another name for Diana, goddess of the moon, sometimes identified or associated with Hecate. Legend had it that she rode a chariot drawn by dragons.
	Charm	: Can mean both "song" and "spell".
	Towr	: Contrast Il Penseroso being inside the tower, while L' Allegro views a tower from a distance
	Thrice great Hermes	: Hermes Trismegistus (three times great). Neo-Platonists of the Renaissance regarded Hermes as knowing everything.
	fleshly nook	: An allusion to the Neo-Platonic idea of human souls as trapped within fleshly bodies
	Dæmons	: Daimons were thought to be spirits, half mortal and half immortal, that served to communicate between the gods and mortals.
	Pall	: "Fine or rich cloth (as a material); especially as used for the robes of persons of high rank"
	Pelops line	: Pelops' descendants make up the characters of much of Greek tragedy: Atreus, Thyestes, Agamemnon, Orestes, Electra, and Iphigeneia.
	Troy	: A sacred city according to Homer; also the setting for several ancient Greek tragedies
	Buskind	: The buskin was the traditional footwear of the tragic actor, as opposed to the sock of the comic actor in L' Allegro.
	Musaeus	: A mythical poet, sometimes described as the son of Orpheus and a priest of Demeter, and is thus interpreted as the founder of religious poetry.
	Him that left half told	: Refers to Geoffrey Chaucer; his the unfinished Squire's Tale
	Virtuous	: Magical
	civil-suited	: Soberly attired

brown	: Dusky, dark
Sylvan	: Pertaining to Sylva, the Roman woodland deity massy proof	: Massive strength. Milton always used the older “massy” instead of “massive”
dight	: Decorated, decked
Hairy Gown and Mossy Cell	: This phrase reinforces the preceding line’s mention of “hermitage.” A hair shirt would often be worn by a man doing penance. Sir Thomas More was famous for wearing a hair shirt under his daily clothes. “Cell” can mean “a dwelling consisting of a single chamber inhabited by a hermit or other solitary”.
Spell	: “Spell” can mean “to engage in a study or contemplation of something”

4.3.5 Appreciating the Stages of Progression of the Poem ‘Il Penseroso’

‘Il Penseroso’ is a vision of poetic melancholy. The speaker of this reflective ode dispels “vain deluding Joys” from his mind in a ten-line prelude, before invoking “divinest Melancholy” to inspire his future verses. You will do well by noticing how the melancholic mood is idealised by the speaker as a means by which to “attain / To something like prophetic strain”. It is also important to note how the central action of ‘Il Penseroso’ proceeds: the speaker speculates about the poetic inspiration that would transpire if the imagined goddess of Melancholy he invokes were his Muse. It is true that the highly digressive style dually precludes any summary of the poem’s dramatic action. However, it is not difficult to find out that the vision of poetic inspiration offered by the speaker of ‘Il Penseroso’ is an allegorical exploration of a contemplative paradigm of poetic genre.

If you read the poem carefully, you will notice that like ‘L’ Allegro’, in this poem, too, the first 10 lines serve as prelude. As prelude to his invocation of Melancholy, the speaker dismisses joy from his imagination. Vain joys and folly are ritually banished. You may also note here a dig at their parentage. Soon after the prelude, the speaker invokes a Melancholy goddess, veiled in black. In the next 20 lines, Melancholy is linked to holy, divine, saintly wisdom garbed in devotional colours. Following the form of classical hymn, she claims her heritage with the Roman pantheon. Here we also find reference to her parents - solitary Saturn and Vesta - and a sort of link to secrecy, shades and twilight. Having invoked the Melancholy goddess, the speaker imagines her ideal personification. So from line 45 onward, we have references to her companions: Peace, Quiet, Fast (Milton had a thing about food), Leisure, Retirement. The main companion, equivalent to Liberty, is Contemplation and the favourite bird is Philomel (nightingale) with her sweet and sad music: melancholic person’s favourite bird (vs lark).

The central action of the poem proceeds as poetic visions of Melancholy, imagined by the speaker. In the lines 65-76, we see the speaker walking in evening (‘unseen’ vs ‘not unseen’: solitary) under moon. He hears curfew bell (8 o’clock), over sullen roar of distant waves on rocky beach. Then if weather (air) does not permit, he moves indoors (77-96), by a quiet fireside for bellman’s charm or stay up late to read and study, as Milton did as a youth. The speaker is found reading philosophy, Hermes Trismegistus (ancient mystic text, popular in the Renaissance, of Gnostic or hermetic writing; they thought it ancient Egyptian, but it was late Greek). You cannot fail to notice art associated with Melancholy, which includes tragedy: ancient, or contemporary (97-102), or other forms of art (104-20): Musaeus (father of priestly poetry), Orpheus in underworld or Chaucerian Squire's tale, or "sage and solemn" Spenser. Here we also notice a succinct definition of allegory. The speaker's love of studies is further reinforced in lines 121-140. The speaker is found studying all night. Then arrives the morning - sombre, raining and windy and the speaker walks abroad (141-154). He walks to (Tolkienesque) woods, quiet, ancient, dark and deep, at times pauses by a brook, sleeps, dreams and listens to sweet music; i.e. Contemplation. At the end of his reverie on poetic Melancholy, the speaker invokes the Muse's song; he imagines that his Muse will reward his studious devotion to her by revealing a heavenly vision. As the final ten lines reveal, the speaker aspires to a revelation of divine knowledge to inspire his great poetry. The final couplet issues an ultimatum to the Melancholy mood; the speaker will devote himself to the existence of a solitary hermit, staking his life upon the contemplative ideal he has illustrated throughout the poem, which he imagines will be rewarded by a vision of the divine. These are all the pleasures Melancholy gives and the speaker declares "I with thee do chose to live".

4.3.6 'L'Allegro' and 'Il Penseroso': A Discussion

'L'Allegro' and 'Il Penseroso' - both poems were very popular during the eighteenth century. They were also widely imitated by poets. You can measure their popularity by the fact that William Blake made illustrations to both 'L'Allegro' and 'Il Penseroso'. Critics' opinions vary on the merits and significance of these poems. Critics like Stelle Revard believe that Milton "takes care to showcase himself as a poet in these first and last selections and at the same time to build his poetic reputation along the way by skilful positioning of poems such as 'L'Allegro' and 'Il Penseroso.'" Barbara Lewalski is of the view that 'L'Allegro' and 'Il Penseroso' "explore and contrast in generic terms the ideal pleasures appropriate to contrasting lifestyles... that a poet might choose, or might choose at different times, or in sequence". There has been a variety of responses with regard to their classification in various traditions and genres. E. M. W. Tillyard views them as an example of academic writing, Sara Watson call them pastoral, Maren-Sofie Rostvig view them as part of classical philosophy whereas S. P. Woodhouse and Douglas Bush view them as part of Renaissance encomia and similar to Homeric hymns and Pindaric odes. Stelle Revard believes that the poems follow the classical hymn model, which discuss goddess that are connected to poetry and uses these females to replace Apollo completely.

Notwithstanding the multiple views of the critics, the best way to understand these poems is to read them carefully. If we do so, we shall agree that 'L'Allegro' celebrates Grace Euphrosone through the traditional Theocritan pastoral model. The poem is playful and is set within a pastoral scene that allows the main character to connect with folk stories and fairy tales in addition to various comedic plays and performances. If we read these poems together, we shall also notice a sort of progression from the pleasures found in 'L'Allegro' with the pleasures found within 'Il Penseroso'. We shall also notice that except one similarity that both are set in traditional form, there is no poetic antecedent for Milton's pairing.

'L'Allegro' invokes Mirth and other allegorical figures of joy and merriment, and extols the active and cheerful life, while depicting a day in the countryside according to this philosophy. Here, it is important to note that Mirth, as one of the Graces, is connected with poetry within Renaissance literature. We will do well by noticing that the poem, in its form and content, is similar to dithyrambs to Bacchus or hymns to Venus. However, the pleasure that Mirth brings is moderated, and there is a delicate balance between the influence of Venus or Bacchus achieved by relying on their daughter.

'Il Penseroso', on the other hand, celebrates Melancholy through the traditional Theocritan pastoral model. The setting focuses on a Gothic scene and emphasises a solitary scholarly life. The speaker of the poem invokes a melancholic mood with which the speaker wanders through an urban environment and the descriptions are reminiscent of medieval settings. In his pursuits, he devotes his time to philosophy, to allegory, to tragedy, to Classical hymns, and, finally, to Christian hymns that cause him to be filled with a vision. Besides being set in a traditional form, there is no poetic antecedent for Milton's pairing.

It is also to be noted that Melancholy, in 'Il Penseroso' does not have the same parentage as Mirth does in 'L' Allegro'. Melancholy comes from Saturn and Vesta, who are connected to science and a focus on the heavens. Melancholy is connected in the poem with the "heavenly" muse Urania, the goddess of inspiring epics, through her focus and through her relationship with Saturn. Furthermore, she is related to prophecy, and the prophetic account within the final lines of 'Il Penseroso' does not suggest that isolation is ideal, but they do emphasise the importance of experience and an understanding of nature. The higher life found within the poem, as opposed to the one within 'L' Allegro', allows an individual to experience such a vision.

It is very common to view 'L' Allegro' and 'Il Penseroso' as companion poems, but as a serious reader we need to find out for ourselves how and why they are related. Is it a battle between Day and Night/Mirth and Melancholy, as Tillyard has pointed out? Or, do these poems represent opposing paths (of pleasure and wisdom), as pointed out by Gerard Cox, toward complete union with God? Or, do these poems represent, as pointed out by Zacharias, Milton's own struggle to become a "whole" man and a truly great poet? Or, can we claim after Roy Flannagan that L' Allegro is the light-hearted Charles Diodati and Il Penseroso, the studious Milton?

Notwithstanding these varied responses, one thing is clear and almost all critics agree that "[w]hat one poem twists, the other untwists" in an unending cycle of what might be called "dissonant companionship" (Finch and Bowen 18). If we wish to appreciate their complementary sounds, we have to read these poems aloud. Then we shall discover how lilting pitch and images of crowing roosters and singing larks deeply of 'L' Allegro' contrasts with sombre tone and "Belmans drousie charm" of 'Il Penseroso'.

Another remarkable feature of these companion poems is the highly digressive style which dually precludes any summary of the poems' dramatic action as it renders them interpretively ambiguous to critics. However, it can surely be said that the vision of poetic inspiration offered by the speaker of 'Il Penseroso' is an allegorical exploration of a contemplative paradigm of poetic genre.

According to Barbara Lewalski, 'Il Penseroso' along with 'L' Allegro' "explore and contrast in generic terms the ideal pleasures appropriate to contrasting lifestyles... that a poet might choose, or might choose at different times, or in sequence". Milton's "companion poems" explore the pleasures associated with two competing (or perhaps complementary) lifestyles, and the attractions of two competing (or perhaps complementary) sources of artistic inspiration, with corresponding descriptions of their differing subjects and genres. Both are in a sense extended versions of Marlowe's 'Come live with me and be my love', the paradigmatic seduction poem, though here it is the poet who is being seduced: which life, or which art, is more appealing? Graceful, urbane, evocatively descriptive, and technically virtuoso, these two poems have exerted an enormous influence on later English poetry.

4.4 ‘ON THE LATE MASSACRE IN PIEDMONT’

4.4.1 The Background of the Poem

‘On the Late Massacre in Piedmont’ is a sonnet which is inspired by the massacre of Waldensians in Piedmont by the Charles Emmanuel II, Duke of Savoy, in April 1655. Piedmont is a region of Italy, which especially at that time was a strongly Catholic country. Annoyed with the peoples’ choice against Catholicism, the troops unleashed an unprovoked campaign of loot, rape, torture, and murder. They killed around 2,000 people and forcibly converted another 2,000 to the Catholic faith. The news of the killings spread quickly throughout Europe. Great efforts were made to remove any survivors from the area and bring them to safety. This massacre inspired John Milton to write his sonnet “On the Late Massacre in Piedmont.”

The Waldensians or Vaudois were Protestants who had long lived in the territories of the Roman Catholic rulers of Piedmont, and were thought of, by Protestants of Milton’s day, as having preserved a simple scriptural faith from earlier times. Confined by the treaty to certain mountain valleys, they had gradually intruded into the plain of Piedmont. Ordered to retire, they had been pursued into the mountains and there massacred by the Piedmontese soldiery in April 1655. In documents penned by Milton as Latin secretary, Cromwell strongly protested against such treachery and cruelty. Later in the year, possibly after Morland returned with his report (see below, 7-8 note), Milton wrote his sonnet, first published in Poems, 1674.

The largest theme of the sonnet is religion but with a view to enact justice. The other theme is the movement from the Old Testament to the New Testament. The poem compares the theme of vengeance from the Old Testament to the theme of regeneration in the New Testament. The clear example of vengeance in the poem is the address in first line “Avenge, O Lord,” which could be a reference to Luke 18:7, a bible verse that speaks about vengeance. An example of regeneration is the lines “grow/ A hundredfold” and “Mother with Infant.”

4.4.2 The Text

On the Late Massacre in Piedmont

Avenge, O Lord, thy slaughtered saints, whose bones
 Lie scattered on the Alpine mountains cold,
 Even them who kept thy truth so pure of old,
 When all our fathers worshiped stocks and stones;
 Forget not: in thy book record their groans 5
 Who were thy sheep and in their ancient fold
 Slain by the bloody Piedmontese that rolled
 Mother with infant down the rocks. Their moans
 The vales redoubled to the hills, and they
 To Heaven. Their martyred blood and ashes sow 10
 O’er all th’ Italian fields where still doth sway
 The triple tyrant; that from these may grow
 A hundredfold, who having learnt thy way
 Early may fly the Babylonian woe.

Glossary

- thy slaughtered saints : The innocent victims are saints because they held their faith
- Alpine mountains : a rigid mountain range whose peaks are often covered in snow.
- Pure : the victims as people of light, undeserving of their fate
- thy book : Refers to the books to be consulted at the Judgment (Revelation 20:12)
- thy sheep : Emphasises the innocence of the massacred
- Slain by the bloody Piedmontese that rolled : Milton's style mimics the rolling of the people
- Mother with infant down the rocks : the way the mother and infant have died
- Vale : valley; the valleys "redouble" or grow into hills. In this image of nature, the low point of the land has become the high point, and the people whose lives have ended so tragically have been raised to heaven.
- Redoubled : re-echoed
- Babylonian woe : The Babylonian Exile is an infamous event of Jewish and Judeo-Christian history. The Babylonians invaded and destroyed the Temple of Jerusalem, but the religion endures. This allusion to the Babylonians' taking advantage of the temple and the land is reflected here in the destruction of the bodies of the martyrs.

4.4.3 An Appreciation

'On The Late Massacre in Piedmont' is a sonnet with the theme of good, pious people trapped in a dark world. You will also notice that the themes of the struggle of good and evil as well as freedom and oppression make their presence strongly felt in the poem. Milton calls on God to avenge the martyrs at Piedmont. The use of the word 'martyrs' in the poem is significant. These innocent victims are martyrs because they have been killed for their Protestant faith. As a perceptive reader, you will do well to notice the transition in the nature that Milton effectively brings about in the poem. Milton invokes images of nature to set a grim tone in the beginning of the poem. The Alpines are a rigid mountain range. Their peaks are often covered in snow. The bones scattered on the cold mountains creates a grim tone, a dark world. So the reference to the Alpines and their association with the words such as 'avenge', 'slaughtered' and 'saints' in the first two lines set the grim tone:

Avenge, O Lord, thy slaughtered saints, whose bones
Lie scattered on the Alpine mountains cold

At the very outset, Milton forcefully evokes the slaughtering of 'pious' people as a tragic act. Mark the use of 'pure' that identifies the victims as people of righteousness, undeserving of their fate. Milton's style in the lines that follow mimics the rolling of the people. This thought ends with a period, a crafted absolute stopping point, the way the mother and infant have died, their own lives terminated. However, a transition begins to appear from the fifth with his request to the Lord to ‘record their groans’ in ‘thy book’. This transition is complete by the end of the poem with the ‘blood of the martyrs’ making the nature around it ‘fertile’. It is an interesting transition, and Milton is not speaking of literally making the ground more fertile for plants to grow, but people:

that from these may grow
A hundredfold, who having learnt thy way
Early may fly the Babylonian woe.

The reference to ‘the Babylonian woe’ is significant here. Most Christian faiths hold the belief that a person’s body is a temple, sacred and to be well-kept. Additionally, many Protestants of Milton’s time identified the Catholic Church with Babylon and the Whore of Babylon in the book of Revelation. So what these lines seek to emphasise is that when one believer dies for his or her faith, a hundred more will take his or her place. Their deaths have transformed the image of Piedmont from a bone-covered rigid and cold mountain range to a fertile field.

The theme of the sonnet is usually understood to be sorrow for the victims and anger at the forces that were responsible for the massacre. This idea is reinforced by the fact that this prayer to ‘Lord, &c’ on behalf of the persecuted protestants was not entirely without effect. For Cromwell exerted himself in their favour.

However, you will notice for yourself that the poem is an address to God and not to the perpetrators of the massacre. Milton emphasises in the poem that God should be blamed for the occurrence of the massacre because He allows the event to happen even though He has direct intervention in it. The author stresses that the poem prophesies the one action that can justify God’s ways to His faithful.

The poem may very well be understood in the light of Tertullian’s famous phrase, “The blood of the martyrs is the seed of the Church” and the parable of the sower (Matthew 14:4-9) where the seed that fell on good ground brought forth as much as a hundredfold. Such was to be the blood of these martyrs sown where the Pope (triple tyrant in his mitre with its three crowns) still rules: it was to make converts who, having learned God’s truth, would renounce the idolatry of Rome (figured, as Protestants believed, by the Babylon of Revelation 16:19, etc.) and thus escape the woe of God’s punishment upon it.

As far as the stanza form is concerned, Milton’s present sonnet (which is also known as sonnet 18) follows an iambic pentameter rhythm scheme with ten syllables per line consisting of 14 lines. You will observe that Milton’s sonnet does not follow the Shakespearean sonnet form. Instead, it follows the ABBA, ABBA, CDCDCD rhyme scheme. The rhyme scheme changes in the third quatrain, and the poem reveals who is behind the massacre: the “Triple Tyrant,” a reference to the Pope with his triple crown.

Sad	: Serious, solemn
Electra’s Poet	: Plutarch’s Lysander 15.4 tells the story of how Athens was spared from destruction by Lysander when a Spartan general recited the first chorus from Euripides’ Electra 167-69.

4.5.3 An Appreciation

The poem’s fancy is that it should be written out on a piece of paper which is then pinned to the outside of the door and acts as a means of an appeal to spare the life of the poet who cowers inside. The supposed model for doing this is Alexander the Great’s sparing of the poet Pindar during the seizure of Emathia. It is Alexander who is given the title ‘Emathian Conqueror’ in the poem.

The poem’s appeal is to the readers’ imagination. He invites readers to imagine that the poet pins this sonnet to his door to protect his property during a military attack. Here, you will notice a touch of reality. Milton, like most of London in 1642, probably expected the King’s forces to attack the city. You may infer from this that Milton designs this sonnet as a plea for special protection for poets in time of war. In its gesture, the poem alludes to Alexander the Great, who is said to have spared the house of the poet Pindar during his invasion of Thebes.

We, as reader, may ask why should a poet be spared by an invading army more than any other person? It may be argued that the poet is a talented person who might act as a valuable resource for the invader. However, the fact remains that in a situation of civil war and revolution, the seizure and control of the means of production of ideas would be an important part of the struggle. Elimination of an opposing voice (if it could not be suborned) would be important to Charles and his supporters. In that sense, then, it would be more sensible for Milton to hide himself away as a non-exceptional person whom the invaders would not bother to hunt or kill. This leads us to ask: is the poet overstating his importance? But the associated question is: why should he do so? We may say that the poet is deliberately overstating his importance for comic effect. However, at the same time he is having an undercurrent of what must be understandable and indeed justifiable fear. Fear, because if an outspoken individual such as Milton had been taken by the enemy, then he would certainly have been in serious trouble. Several critics such as Barbara Lewalski are of the view that this sonnet “inaugurates the political sonnet in the English tradition”.

The sonnet’s structure is formally quite straightforward. It is written in the conventional iambic pentameter and follows a rhyming scheme of abba abba dedede. It would have been more normal for the final two lines to have had an ‘ff’ rhyme scheme and to act as a couplet which concludes and summarises in some way the content and meaning of the poem – this is a technique that had been much used by Shakespeare. Milton avoids this technique and gives the feeling of life continuing into the future, an unknown future to be sure without a specific end point. For a poet of Milton’s calibre, it may be assumed that even the smallest detail has meaning.

4.6 LET US SUM UP

In this unit you read about the life of John Milton. Then, his four poems; namely, ‘L’ Allegro’, ‘Il Penseroso’, ‘On the Late Massacre in Piedmont’ and ‘When the Assault was intended on the City’. The first two are pastoral poems and the last two sonnets. The first two poems are also treated as companion poems and both are very lengthy as well. Hence, we could give you just excerpts. You need to study the complete poems to have a better grasp of them. We have tried to give you the gist of the poem but it would be better if you do more exercise with your counsellor at the study centre.

As far as the two sonnets are concerned, we have included the complete text. When we talk of Milton the image that comes to our mind is that of a poet who wrote the first great epic in English. We regard him chiefly as a puritan writer. But as you have found out for yourself by going through the poems in this unit that John Milton, the Puritan writer of the great biblical epic Paradise Lost, also wrote about 24 sonnets though many of them are not known to the common reader. The most effective of the personal sonnets is sonnet 19, usually called ‘On his Blindness’ or ‘When I Consider How My Light is Spent’. Here, we find allusion to his blindness for the first time. This sonnet records his fear that he will never be able to use his God-given gift for poetry again. Yet God may demand an accounting of his righteousness. And his entry into Heaven will depend upon how well he has used the gifts that God gave him. The sonnet ends with Milton’s acceptance of the fact that what God wants of him is obedience and resignation. He can then serve God even if he cannot write poetry, for “they also serve who only stand and wait.”

Milton’s sonnets, or poem, are composed in Petrarchan style, but in iambic pentameter, similar to William Shakespeare’s sonnets. However, John Milton differs from his contemporaries and his literary idols in choice of topic for poems. While other poets wrote primarily about love or God, John Milton chose more pedantic topics, such as politics, or friendships he enjoyed, or even personal crises. The tension he creates in his poems seldom breaks the confines of form and metre. His emotion and his poetic form remain under control, even as his passion or emotions threaten to break through. Each line has a perfect five beats within. However, if you read his poems carefully, you will note that at times he even cheats a little, shortening some words rather than sacrificing the form of the poem (as in “stol’n”, “shew’th”, or “endu’th”).

Sonnet 18 along with the sonnets and the poems that we have dealt with in this unit very well illustrates that the general perception about Milton as a writer of rebellion is not very tenable. There is no denying the element of rebellion in his poetry but it is also a fact that there were many other writers of rebellion. We usually tend to forget his devotion to the old masters of literature which was greater than anyone else’s. This is amply demonstrated by the fact that he spent six years of his education in a self-devised deliberate study and emulation of poets such as Virgil and Petrarch.

Milton has often been praised for his grandiloquence of voice and vision, his peculiar diction and phraseology. His stylistic innovations such as grandiloquence of voice and vision, peculiar diction and phraseology and use of blank verse influenced later poets. Before Milton, poetic blank verse was considered distinct from its use in verse drama, and Paradise Lost was taken as a unique example. Isaac Watts in 1744 made a significant comment, “Mr. Milton is esteemed the parent and author of blank verse among us”. “Miltonic verse” might be synonymous for a century with blank verse as poetry, a new poetic terrain independent from both the drama and the heroic couplet.

Lack of rhyme was sometimes taken as Milton's defining innovation. He himself considered the rhymeless quality of Paradise Lost to be an extension of his own personal liberty. His pursuit of freedom was largely a reaction against conservative values entrenched within the rigid heroic couplet. Within a dominant culture that stressed elegance and finish, he granted primacy to freedom, breadth and imaginative suggestiveness, eventually developed into the romantic vision of sublime terror. Milton's blank-verse paragraph, and his audacious and victorious attempt to combine blank and rhymed verse with paragraphic effect in 'Lycidas', lay down indestructible models and patterns of English verse-rhythm, as distinguished from the narrower and more strait-laced forms of English metre. The varied manifestations of personal liberty in Milton's works (e.g. abandonment of rhyme, irregular rhythms, and peculiar diction) converge to create specific Miltonic effects that live on to this day.

You might have come to realise why Milton is regarded by many as the "greatest English author" (William Hayley) and "as one of the preeminent writers in the English language". Critical reception, no doubt, has oscillated in the centuries since his death but that is chiefly because of his political affiliation. Samuel Johnson praised Paradise Lost as "a poem which...with respect to design may claim the first place, and with respect to performance, the second, among the productions of the human mind," but he also viewed Milton's politics as those of an "acrimonious and surly republican".

We hope now that now you are ready to read some more poems of Milton and form your own opinion about him.

4.7 SUGGESTED READING

There are several seminal works on Milton and his poetry. For Milton's biography, you may study "Life of John Milton" by Anniina Jokinen in Luminarium which is available on Internet and this article has been used in this unit as well. You will do well by reading 'Milton' in A Short History of English Literature by Crompton – Rickett (New Delhi: Universal Book Stall, Reprint 1988) Milton: A Biography Vol 1 by William Riley Parker (Oxford: Clarendon Press) and "A Brief Life of Milton" in Encyclopaedia Britannica, (9th ed, 1888).

For Milton's literary work, you are advised to read John Milton: A Literary Life by Cedric Brown (New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 1995), The life of John Milton: A Critical Biography by Barbara K. Lewalski (Blackwell Publishers, 2001), John Milton: Twentieth Century Perspectives (in five volumes) edited by Martin J. 4.8 ANSWERS TO SELF-CHECK EXERCISES

Self Check Exercise 1

1. a) The Horton Period: 'L'Allegro', 'Il Penseroso', 'Comus' and 'Lycidas'
- b) The Period of the Great Epics: Paradise Lost, Paradise Regained and Samson Agonistes

- 2) The loss of sight in 1652 was a great personal loss but this also made him introspect his 'talent' as well as the future course of life. The loss of sight prompted him to write the well known sonnet 'When I Consider How My Light is Spent' or 'On his Blindness'. This may be viewed as a blessing in disguise, as it was after his blindness that he wrote his epic, Paradise Lost which is among the greatest works ever written in English. With this Milton overcame the pangs of his blindness. It is said that he would compose verse upon verse at night in his head and then dictate them from memory to his aides in the morning. Paradise Lost finally saw publication in 1667, in ten books. It was reissued in 1668 with a new title-page and additional materials. The book was met with instant success. It amazed several persons. Even Dryden is reported to have said, "This man cuts us all out, and the ancients too."

- 3) Milton involved himself in religious and political controversies in order to discharge, to choose his own words, 'a great public duty'. He did it willingly and for this he laid aside his ambition to write a great epic poem for over two decades. During the Civil War, Milton wrote pamphlets such as 'Of Reformation', 'Animadversions', 'Of Prelatical Episcopacy' and 'The Reason for Church Government'. He also wrote his so-called 'Divorce Tracts' in which he spoke for divorce on the grounds of incompatibility. The attempted censorship of the 'Divorce Tracts' by the Stationers' Company provoked Milton to publish his eloquent Areopagitica in late 1644. It was an oration advocating freedom of the press. In early 1659, Milton published A Treatise of Civil Power and Ready and Easy Way To Establish a Free Commonwealth. However, for his propaganda writings, Milton had to go into hiding, for fear of retribution from the followers of King Charles II, as with the death of Lord Protector Oliver Cromwell in 1658 the Commonwealth were coming to a close.

- 4) Milton's childhood was spent at a time when the Renaissance was in the ascendancy. His youth witnessed the rise of Puritanism, and his old age marked the consummation of the Puritan ideals. Naturally, in his poetry we notice a nice fusion of elements both of the Renaissance and the Reformation. A link between the Renaissance and the Puritan Age is well perceived in his poetry. He is both a belated Elizabethan and a fervent disciple of the Reformation. Take for example, 'the Ode on the Morning of Christ's Nativity' which is written on a Biblical subject, but glows with imagination and is full of pagan imagery, thus revealing a fusion of the Renaissance and Reformation influences. In his companion pastoral poems 'L'Allegro' and 'Il Penseroso' that present charming contrasted pictures of man, nature and art, there is little that is characteristically Puritan. The poet dwells frankly upon the pleasures of romance and rustic sports, upon the beauty of Church architecture and music. However, in Lycidas we have a Puritanism which is political and ecclesiastical as well as spiritual and ethical. The religious accent in this elegy is unmistakably puritan. However, in Paradise Lost, the greatest English epic, we have the complete fusion of the Renaissance and Reformation elements. Even in Samson Agonistes, Milton applies the form of classical art to the treatment of a Biblical subject. This is the reason that it is said that 'Milton is both a belated Elizabethan and a fervent disciple of the Reformation.'

Self Check Exercise 2

- 1) a) The activities in 'L'Allegro' include: Ritual banishing of melancholy, invoking mirth, welcoming mirth, inviting mirth to bring personified friends, 'sometime walking', speaker straightway eyeing new pleasures, shepherds meeting for lunch, bells and dancing in a local village, Robin joining with others in unending toil of rural life, leaving at dawn, the villagers going to bed, feasting and revelry in cities, delights offered by Mirth, etc.
- b) The activities in 'Il Penseroso' include: dismissing joy from imagination, ritually banishing vain joys and folly and invoking a Melancholy goddess, Melancholy claiming her heritage with the Roman pantheon, the speaker walking in evening under moon, hearing curfew bell, moving indoors, sitting by a quiet fireside for bellman's charm or staying up late to reading and studying philosophy; arrival of morning - sombre, raining and windy - and the speaker walking to woods and declaring to Melancholy "I with thee do chose to live".
- 2) a) The figures associated with 'L'Allegro' include: melancholy, Mirth/Euphrosyne and her divine parents Zephyr (west wind) and Aurora (dawn), her personified friends - Jest, Jollity, Hebe (youth), Sport and Laughter along with the mountain nymph Liberty, "sometime walking" (presumably the speaker), the ploughman, milkmaid, mower, shepherd, Mab, Friar, Hobgoblin, Robin Goodfellow, etc.
- b) The figures associated with 'L'Allegro' include: Melancholy, joys, folly, the Roman pantheon, Melancholy's parents Saturn and Vesta, her companions - Peace, Quiet, Fast, Leisure, Retirement, Liberty, Philomel (nightingale), Musaeus (father of priestly poetry), Orpheus in underworld or Chaucerian Squire's tale, or "sage and solemn" Spenser and the Muse.
- 3) a) What actually happens in L'Allegro': The speaker ritually banishes melancholy and invokes Mirth/Euphrosyne. He first welcomes Mirth, the daughter of Zephyr (west wind) and Aurora (dawn). Mirth embodies time of day the poem celebrates, and is connected with May rituals (fertility, community), and flowers. The speaker invites her to bring her friends - Jest, Jollity, Hebe (youth), Sport and Laughter along with the mountain nymph Liberty or Freedom. Amidst the multiplicity of sound, we have a subtle hint of "sometime walking", presumably the speaker. He is listing all the things he'd do if he joined the crew. The 'something' also walks by the ploughman, milkmaid, mower, shepherd, all about to, or actually at, work. The speaker straightway eyes new pleasures: landscape, mountains, brooks, rivers, towers (country estate). The shepherds meet for lunch. We see a local village, on a holiday, where we have bells and dancing all day. Tales done, the villagers eventually go to bed. On the other hand, we have the picture of cities' pleasures: social life, people, ladies, beauty, city marriages, feasts, revelry and masques. The speaker is requested to be immersed in the poetry and the pleasures that Mirth is able to produce. In the last two lines we are told that these are the delights, if Mirth can give them, that would make speaker join her.

- b) What actually happens in 'IL Penseroso': The speaker dismisses joy from his imagination. He ritually banishes vain joys and folly and invokes a Melancholy goddess, veiled in black. He links Melancholy to holy, divine, saintly wisdom garbed in devotional colours and refers to her parents solitary Saturn and Vesta. He also talks about her companions: Peace, Quiet, Fast, Leisure, Retirement, Contemplation and the bird Philomel (nightingale) with her sweet and sad music. The speaker walks in evening under moon. He hears curfew bell (8 o'clock) as well as over sullen roar of distant waves on rocky beach. As weather (air) does not permit, he moves indoors, by a quiet fireside for bellman's charm or stays up late to read and study, as Milton did as a youth. The speaker is found reading philosophy. He is found studying all night. Then arrives the morning - sombre, raining and windy and the speaker walks to woods in contemplation. At the end of his reverie on poetic Melancholy, the speaker invokes the Muse's song; he imagines that his Muse will reward his studious devotion to her by revealing a heavenly visions. Finally, he declares "I with thee do chose to live".
- 4) a) Life style presented in 'L' Allegro': L' Allegro is "the happy person" who spends an idealized day in the country and a festive evening in the city. 'L' Allegro', thus, celebrates Grace Euphrosone and is playful. It extols the active and cheerful life, while depicting a day in the countryside as well the pleasures of the city life. It explores the ideal pleasures appropriate during day time, various comedic plays and performances. There the lilting pitch of crowing roosters and deep singing of larks. All these make the environment very cheerful and add to the romantic life style depicted in the poem. The pleasures offered by Mirth in a way seduce the speaker to accept to live with Mirth.
- b) Life style presented in 'Il Penseroso': Il Penseroso is "the thoughtful person" whose night is filled with meditative walking in the woods and hours of study in a "lonely Towr." 'Il Penseroso' depicts a day spent in contemplation and thought. In fact, the melancholic mood is idealised. There is no room for imagination or for vain joys and folly. The speaker invokes a melancholic mood with which the speaker wanders through an urban environment. He walks in evening under moon, listening to curfew bell, sullen roar of distant waves on rocky beach. Then if weather (air) does not permit, he moves indoors, by a quiet fireside for bellman's charm or stays up late to read and study. In his pursuits, he devotes his time to philosophy, to allegory, to tragedy, to Classical hymns, and, finally, to Christian hymns that cause him to be filled with a vision. Impressed with the pleasures of Melancholy the speaker declares "I with thee do chose to live".

- 5) 'L'Allegro' and 'Il Penseroso' explore and contrast the ideal pleasures appropriate to contrasting lifestyles. Both these life styles are important and they in fact complement each other. However, if I am to choose between the two, I would prefer the life style presented in 'Il Penseroso'. The reason is that the life without meditation and thoughtfulness is no life at all. Mirth no doubt has a very significant role in man's life. However, it is meditation that gives meaning to life. Hence, like the speaker of 'Il Penseroso', I too will like to devote my time to study and contemplation to be filled with a vision.
- 6) 'L'Allegro' and 'Il Penseroso' explore and contrast in generic terms the ideal pleasures appropriate to contrasting lifestyles. The life style in 'L'Allegro' is playful, celebrating Mirth and extolling the active and cheerful life. 'Il Penseroso', on the other hand, emphasises a solitary scholarly life celebrating a melancholic mood. However, we read these poems carefully, we shall find that for a balanced life, we need both. Naturally, we notice a sort of progression from the pleasures found in 'L'Allegro' with the pleasures found within 'Il Penseroso'. That is why several critics have noted that that "[w]hat one poem twists, the other untwists" in an unending cycle of what might be called "dissonant companionship" (Finch and Bowen 18). Barbara Lewalski has very rightly observed that 'Il Penseroso' along with 'L'Allegro' "explore and contrast in generic terms the ideal pleasures appropriate to contrasting lifestyles... that a poet might choose, or might choose at different times, or in sequence". In short, both life styles complete each other.

Self Check Exercise 3

- 1) A sonnet is a poetic form consisting of 14 lines. There are two major types of sonnets – one, Italian type (Petrarchan) sonnets divided into two stanzas of eight and six lines; another, English type (Shakespearean) sonnets divided into three quatrains (a stanza of four lines) and a couplet (two lines). Milton's sonnets, or poem, are composed in Petrarchan style, but in iambic pentameter, similar to William Shakespeare's sonnets. However, John Milton differs from his contemporaries and his literary idols in choice of topic for poems. While other poets wrote primarily about love or God, John Milton chose more pedantic topics, such as politics, or friendships he enjoyed, or even personal crises. 'On the Late Massacre in Piedmont' is a sonnet of Italian type. At the very outset, Milton forcefully evokes the slaughtering of "pious" people as a tragic act. And in the sestet there is reference to "the Babylonian woe" which is very significant. Many Protestants of Milton's time identified the Catholic Church with Babylon and the Whore of Babylon in the book of Revelation. So what these lines seek to emphasise is that when one believer dies for his or her faith, a hundred more will take his or her place. Their deaths have transformed the image of Piedmont from a bone-covered rigid and cold mountain range to a fertile field. Milton's sonnet does not follow the Shakespearean sonnet form. Instead, it follows the ABBA, ABBA, CDCDCD rhyme scheme. The rhyme scheme changes in the third quatrain, and the poem reveals who is behind the massacre: the "Triple Tyrant," a reference to the Pope with his triple crown.
- 2) Milton's sonnets, or poem, are composed in Petrarchan style, but in iambic pentameter, similar to William Shakespeare's sonnets. Milton's present sonnet (which is also known as sonnet 18) follows an iambic pentameter rhyme scheme with ten syllables per line consisting of 14 lines. You will observe that Milton's sonnet does not follow the Shakespearean sonnet form. Instead, it follows the ABBA, ABBA, CDCDCD rhyme scheme. The rhyme scheme changes in the third quatrain, and the poem reveals who is behind the massacre: the “Triple Tyrant,” a reference to the Pope with his triple crown. Milton’s emotion and his poetic form remain under control, even as his passion or emotions threaten to break through. Each line has a perfect five beats within.

- 3) ‘On the Late Massacre in Piedmont’ is a sonnet which is inspired by the massacre of Waldensians in Piedmont. The theme of the sonnet is usually understood to be sorrow for the victims and anger at the forces that were responsible for the massacre. This idea is reinforced by the fact that the prayer to ‘Lord, &c’ on behalf of the persecuted protestants was not entirely without effect. For, Cromwell exerted himself in their favour. However, on a serious note, the poem is an address to God and not to the perpetrators of the massacre. Milton emphasises in the poem that God should be blamed for the occurrence of the massacre because He allows the event to happen even though He has direct intervention in it. One can say that the poem prophesies the one action that can justify God’s ways to His faithful.

Self Check Exercise 4

- 1) ‘When the Assault was intended on the City’ is Milton’s eighth sonnet and it is remarkable for its political overtones. The poem’s appeal is to the readers’ imagination. It invites readers to imagine that the poet pins this sonnet to his door to protect his property during a military attack. Here is the touch of political reality. Milton, like most in London in 1642, expected the King’s forces to attack the city. We can say that Milton designs this sonnet as a plea for special protection for poets in time of war. In its gesture, the poem alludes to Alexander the Great, who is said to have spared the house of the poet Pindar during his invasion of Thebes. It is because of this political association of the poem that several critics such as Barbara Lewalski are of the view that this sonnet “inaugurates the political sonnet in the English tradition”.
- 2) ‘When the Assault was intended on the City’, Milton’s eighth sonnet, has a quite straightforward structure. It is written in the conventional iambic pentameter and follows a rhyming scheme of abba abba dedede. It would have been more normal for the final two lines to have had an ‘ff’ rhyme scheme and to act as a couplet which concludes and summarises in some way the content and meaning of the poem – this is a technique that had been much used by Shakespeare. Milton avoids this technique and gives the feeling of life continuing into the future, an unknown future to be sure without a specific end point.
- 3) ‘When the Assault was intended on the City’, Milton’s eighth sonnet was believed by many to be a ‘serious joke’. The reason is obvious. Milton, here, imagines himself at his home in London at a period when it might have been attacked by King Charles I and his army. And so he intends to write this poem on a piece of paper and to keep it pinned to the outside of the door. This is supposed to act as a means of an appeal to spare the life of the poet who cowers inside. The supposed model for doing this is Alexander the Great’s sparing of the poet Pindar during the seizure of Emathia. It is Alexander who is given the title ‘Emathian Conqueror’ in the poem. That this poem is a ‘serious joke’ becomes clear when we try to answer why a poet should be spared by an invading army more than any other person. It may be argued that the poet is a talented person who might act as a valuable resource for the invader. However, the fact remains that in a situation of civil war and revolution, the seizure and control of the means of production of ideas would be an important part of the struggle. Elimination of an opposing voice (if it could not be suborned) would be important to Charles and his supporters. In that sense, then, it would be more sensible for Milton to hide himself away as a non-exceptional person whom the invaders would not bother to hunt or kill rather than proclaim his importance. Hence, it is right to say that the poem is a 'serious joke'.

5.0 OBJECTIVES

In this unit you will be reading three poems of John Donne, a leading metaphysical poet. On reading this Unit you will be able to:

- understand the features of the metaphysical school of poetry;
- appreciate the salient features of the poetry of John Donne;
- understand the stylistic achievements of John Donne; and
- understand the popularity of John Donne with modern poets.

5.1 INTRODUCTION

John Donne is the most influential poet of the Metaphysical School, a name that was given by Dr. Johnson in the eighteenth century. It was a disparaging christening in as much as it was meant to suggest a major drawback of the poetry that Donne and his followers wrote. In Lives of the Poets Dr. Johnson commented: the most heterogeneous ideas are yoked by violence together; nature and art are ransacked for illustrations, comparisons and allusions.

It can be seen that there is little association of this poetry with metaphysics, a subject that enjoyed a high rank in the classical learning. Dr. Johnson only meant that the poets pretended to be learned.

Succeeding Shakespeare and Ben Jonson immediately, John Donne wrote a poetry of love which clearly breaks from the Elizabethan courtly and pastoral tradition. The lover addresses neither a princess nor a lady of rank who is virtually unapproachable nor does he relate himself to a shepherdess living in idyllic landscape, away from the din and bustle of a city. She is rather a person who reciprocates the lover, is of the same social class and has been on terms of real intimacy. There is a genuine earthly touch about this kind of love. Shorn of loftiness and vague imaginative touches, the poems articulate feelings of fulfilment or frustration that can be shared by common men. The bold physicality of approach makes the experience of love more concrete and human. It is not an experience of the distant ages in a remote diction; it is an everyday experience given in startling words and idioms.

What is very striking is the fact that despite private circulation – Donne's poems were not published in his lifetime – his writings could have almost a mass following as every poet of the seventeenth century is seen imitating his attitude and style of expression.

It is the style which basically provoked Dr. Johnson's censure; but it was this that was actively imitated by Donne's contemporaries. A major characteristic of this style was its colloquialism, its closeness with the spoken language of London of its time. What Ben Jonson used in his satirical plays is here as a vehicle of poetry, creating an immediate bond with the readers. In a sense this kind of writing was a revolt against Elizabethan diction, its tenderness and selectiveness. Lines like Busy, old unruly Sun, Go and catch a falling star were somewhat harsh and unpoetic and yet they created a tone of conversation, natural and familiar.

Being an ecclesiastical figure himself, Donne also wrote religious poems in which again his non-conformism is evident. Instead of writing in a humble devoted manner, he chose to express his doubts and apprehensions, even his sinfulness so candidly that it altered the texture of religious poetry. However, it was seen by his contemporaries as an honest representation of human predicament, of the fundamental situation of being in sin and aspiring for the grace of God at the same time. This was later on termed as tension between flesh and soul – a motif that recurs in the works of George Herbert, Andrew Marvell and Henry Vaughan.

A curious fact about Donne is his influence on T.S. Eliot who credited him for uniting feeling with thought. Generally, poets are supposed to be concerned with feeling, the emotional response to a situation in which there is little intervention of thinking. But, in Donne and the metaphysical poets T.S. Eliot observed: a thought to Donne was an experience; it modified his sensibility in Chapman there is a direct sensuous apprehension of thought, or a recreation of thought into feeling which is exactly what we find in Donne.

What is implied in this remark is the power of poetry to incorporate thought into the framework of feeling so that an experience could be communicated in its totality. The truth is that in any experience feeling and thought are inextricably fused; a poet by emphasizing the one robs poetry of its comprehensiveness.

John Donne therefore should be seen not as an innovative poet, but as a poet who corrected the course of poetry. In the modern age his influence has been very deep both on the writing of poetry and critical thought.

5.2 JOHN DONNE: LIFE AND WORKS

John Donne was born in a Roman Catholic family in 1572. After the death of his father in 1576, his mother, Elizabeth Heywood, married one Dr. John Syminges. Donne studied in Cambridge and then at Lincoln’s Inn. But he had bitter experiences of religious persecution, a fact of his life that turned him into a rebellious thinker. His brother was put to great torture for his religious views and practices. All this left a painful imprint on the mind of John Donne.

By a stroke of good luck, Donne came to enjoy political patronage. He travelled in Spain and Italy and fought against Spain in the company of the Earl of Essex and Sir Walter Raleigh. At the age of 25 he entered into a diplomatic career as Chief Secretary to the Lord Keeper of the Great Seal, Sir Thomas Egerton at whose house he had opportunity to mix with the high and the mighty of the London society.

Donne’s falling in love with Anne More, the niece of Egerton, ruined his career. He was imprisoned. On release he had to remain content with a country life, making his living as a lawyer.

In 1602 Donne was elected Member of Parliament from Brackley. His financial difficulties were not yet over. But his way with the rich and the influential was further supported by his poetry that was now in circulation among the elite of London. Sir Robert Drury became the chief patron of Donne, for whom he wrote many poems. On acceding to King James’s wishes Donne was ordained into the Church of England. He was awarded an honorary degree in divinity by Cambridge in 1615. In 1621 he was made Dean of St. Paul’s.

In addition to his poetry, John Donne’s sermons have exercised great intellectual appeal. His famous lines from the sermons are: no man is an island, one equal music and for whom the bell tolls. They have been used by modern writers as titles of their works. Ernest Hemingway chose For whom the Bell Tolls as a title of a novel of his. Interestingly, Vikram Seth’s novel is An Equal Music.

The years of poverty and uncertainty had a toll on Donne’s health. He is supposed to have died of stomach cancer in 1631.

5.3 POEM: THE SUN RISING

Busy old fool, unruly sun,
 Why dost thou thus,
 Through windows, and through curtains call on us?
 Must to thy motions lovers’ seasons run?
Saucy pedantic wretch, go chide
 Late school boys and sour prentices,
 Go tell court huntsmen that the king will ride,
 Call country ants to harvest offices;
 Love, all alike, no season knows nor clime,
 10 Nor hours, days, months, which are the rags of time.

Thy beams, so revered and strong
 Why shouldst you think?
 I could eclipse and cloud them with a wink,
 But that I would not lose her sight so long;
 15 If her eyes have not blinded thine,
 Look, and tomorrow late, tell me,
 Whether both th’ Indias of spice and mine
 Be where thou leftst them, or lie here with me.
 Ask for those kings whom thou saw’st yesterday,
 20 And thou shalt hear, All here in one bed lay.

She’s all states, and all princes, I,
 Nothing else is.
 Princes do but play us; compared to this,
 All honour’s mimic, all wealth alchemy.
 25 Thou, sun, art half as happy as we,
 In that the world’s contracted thus.

Thine age asks ease, and since thy duties be
To warm the world, that's done in warming us.

Shine here to us, and thou art everywhere;

30 This bed thy center is, these walls, thy sphere.

5.3.1 Glossary

Saucy	: rude, offensive
Pedantic	: academic, teachers
Sour	: having bitter taste, implying people who have become bored by their routine of hard work
Prentices	: apprentices, trainee mechanics
Country ants	: peasants, so called because of their hard work
Mimic	: imitation, a copy (it has a Platonic / Aristotlean echo), to imitate
Alchemy	: a form of chemistry studied in the Middle Ages which involved trying to discover how to change ordinary metals into gold.

5.3.2 Discussion

Let us visualize the situation – the speaker and his beloved are still in bed when the former observes the sun's rays falling on windows and curtains. This provokes his anger. In a sharp rebuke to the sun he says that it has no business to disturb the lovers. Love is not a slave to time and season; the world's time-keeper, the sun, has therefore transgressed its limits by trying to awaken the lovers.

There is significant novelty in this situation to attract and sustain the attention of the reader. With great amusement one hears the mocking tone of the speaker and is almost persuaded of the crime of the sun. The lines that follow make a well-argued case on behalf of the speaker who seems to be quite knowledgeable as well as quite sure of the privileges of lovers.

The speaker asks the sun to mind its business which is to regulate the conduct of late school boys, mechanics, hunters and village farmers. These are the people who should follow the regulations of time. A school boy must get ready for school in the morning, a mechanic should make preparations for his everyday work, a hunter should get ready to accompany the king and equip himself with arms accordingly, and village farmers should do agricultural work demanded by the season. These worldly activities cannot go on in the absence of the sun. Therefore, it is quite logical to ask the sun to supervise the activities of the above-mentioned classes of men.

More boastful claims follow in the next two sections of the poem. The speaker says that he can eclipse the sun by closing an eye of his. But he is not ready to lose the sight of his beloved even for an instant by doing so. Whatever is rich and magnificent in the world – precious spices, gems of the eastern countries or the royal power – they all happen to be there contracted in his bedroom. Finally, he asks the sun to mind its old age and take rest. This it can avail of by forsaking its daily travelling from east to west and showering its beams on the two lovers. There is reversal of the speaker's stand in the last; but it is in the interest of the sun that he makes such a concession.

5.3.3 Appreciation

You should take note of some important features of the language, structure and thematic novelties of the poem.

Donne’s tone is colloquial and deliberately irreverential. Can you see that he is trying to imitate the attitude of seventeenth century scientists who were trying to research planetary motions and were entirely rational and objective in their approach? The sun and other stars were objects of study, not of worship. Donne goes a step further and calls the sun a busy old fool, brushing aside all reverence that theology suggested.

Words and phrases like motions, Indias of spice and mine, all states, alchemy, thy centre, thy sphere have been taken from astronomy and politics. Not only they connect the audience with contemporary scientific attitudes, they give a new orientation to poetic activity. It is no longer an entry into the recesses of emotions and feelings; it is an interiorization of the external world.

The use of hyperbolic expressions is quite abundant. The defiant mood of the lover is established thereby. The situation of the lovers in the bedroom is in itself quite different from the lover begging a glimpse of the beloved, the staple theme in the Elizabethan sonnets.

The poem is developed as a thesis that proves that the bedroom is the centre of the world. Something of the traditional glorification of love is however still there in Donne’s claim that all wealth and power are perishable; being in love alone gives a joy that is eternal.

The beginnings of a dramatic monologue can be felt in a poem like this where the speaker, in a specific situation of his life, speaks to a silent listener. There is enactment of drama; the changing gestures and verbal attacks create varieties of scenes. The concentration and slow movement of a lyric have been substituted by fast tempo.

5.4 POEM: THE ANNIVERSARY

All kings, and all their favorites,
 All glory' of honors, beauties, wits,
 The sun itself, which makes times, as they pass,
 Is elder by a year, now, than it was

5 When thou and I first one another saw:
 All other things to their destruction draw,
 Only our love hath no decay;
 This, no tomorrow hath, nor yesterday;
 Running it never runs from us away,

10 But truly keeps his first, last, everlasting day.

Two graves must hide thine and my corse;
 If one might, death were no divorce.
 Alas, as well as other princes, we (Who prince enough in one another be)

15 Must leave at last in death, these eyes, and ears,
 Oft fed with true oaths, and with sweet salt tears;
 But souls where nothing dwells but love
 (All other thoughts being inmates) then shall prove
 This, or a love increased there above,

- 20 When bodies to their graves, souls from their graves remove.
 And then we shall be thoroughly blest,
 But we no more than all the rest;
 Here upon earth, we're kings, and none but we Can be such kings, nor of such subjects be;
- 25 Who is safe as we, where none can do
 Treason to us, except one of us two?
 True and false fears let us refrain,
 Let us love nobly, 'and live, and add again
 Years and years unto years, till we attain
- 30 To write threescore, this is the second of our reign.

Corse : corpse, dead body inmates : inhabitants, dwellers

5.4.2 Discussion

Apparently the poem is the celebration of the first anniversary of falling in love, the occasion on which the speaker turns quite philosophical. He has passed a year in love and had an opportunity to follow the movement of time in the world and in the realm of love. It is this dual movement of time that is the subject of the speaker's reflection.

He refers first of all to the important political milestones of the year – the changes in the fortunes of the princes and the kings. He finds that all of them have suffered a change. The sun, the marker of time and change, is also older by a year. And then he turns to the personal phenomenon, the act of falling in love. He finds that there has taken place no loss, no disfigurement, no change – the indications of decay in other substances of the world. Love alone has been above all change. It seems to be constant. Once it has occurred it simply continues to be.

The thought of death amidst this feeling of certitude appears to be out of tune. But it is part of a strategy. And Donne's poems are at once an exercise in argument and a splendid strategy by which the speaker wins the beloved's heart. The issue of death the speaker brings in intentionally only to allay all doubts in the last. At one instant he lets his beloved apprehend – we must leave at last in death.

But this is all momentary. He tries to convince that the real grave is the body from which the soul, at the moment of death, will find quick and sure release. Then he announces his programme. As the two alone are real sovereigns between whom there is no chance of breach of trust they should continue to be in love for the next three scores of years.

5.4.3 Appreciation

Now that you have read two of Donne's poems you can better understand what metaphysical conceit is. It is essentially a use of images from diverse worlds, an extended metaphor that combines two entirely different ideas into a single one. In The Sun Rising the two Indias, alchemy, sphere, eclipse are geographical and technical images, used in a context of love. In The Anniversary the solar movements and the political affairs are juxtaposed against love's constancy. They create a sequence of arguments and connect things and experiences which are apparently unconnected.

Donne’s interest in politics and science is not merely superficial. The readers of his manuscripts were the highest of the nobility, capable of enjoying the subtlest of references to political plots and intrigues. More importantly they underline Donne’s independent thinking and secular interests.

It would be interesting to see common patterns in Donne’s love-poems. A very important point is the use of unconventional situations – it may be the bedroom scene, celebration of anniversary, a planning of the future, or simply a continuation of a quarrel. An attitude to death also forms part of these poems – in some poems the tone is mocking and satirical, while in some Donne is quite melancholic and yet capable of rising above the fit of sadness to a brilliancy of wit. There is always something unexpected and sparkling in his poems, forcing the readers to be watchful and alert. The line of his argument is simple, almost predictable and yet the conclusions can be hilarious and complex.

5.5 POEM : THE RELIC

When my grave is broke up again
 Some second guest to entertain
 (For graves have learned that woman head
 To be to more than one a bed),
 5 And he that digs it, spies
 A bracelet of bright hair about the bone,
 Will he not let' us alone,
 And think that there a loving couple lies,
 Who thought that this device might be some way
 10 To make their souls, at the last busy day,
 Meet at this grave, and make a little stay?
 If this fall in a time, or land,
 Where mis-devotion doth command,
 Then he that digs us up, will bring 15 Us to the Bishop and the King,
 To make us relics; then
 Thou shalt be' a Mary Magdalen, and I
 A something else thereby;
 All women shall adore us, and some men;
 20 And since at such time, miracles are sought,
 I would have that age by this paper taught
 What miracles we harmless lovers wrought.

First, we loved well and faithfully,
 Yet knew not what we loved, nor why,
 25 Difference of sex no more we knew,
 Than our guardian angels do;
 Coming and going, we

Perchance might kiss, but not between those meals;
 Our hands ne'er touched the seals,
 30 Which nature, injured by late law, sets free:
 These miracles we did; but now, alas,
 All measure and all language I should pass,
 Should I tell what a miracle she was.

5.5.1 Glossary

- spies : to discover suddenly the last busy day : Judgment day mis-devotion : false mode of worship
Mary Magdalen : a prostitute from whom Christ cast out seven devils; she has been painted by Renaissance painters with long golden hairs.

5.5.2 Discussion

The poem is a fine example of the unconventional ways of thinking of John Donne. He imagines here discovery of a long bright hair around the bone of the speaker's corpse in case of digging of his grave. The hair is rightly pictured as a bracelet, an ornament, priceless and indestructible. In fact, the entire thing is a brilliant imaginative exercise that continues in the subsequent lines. The discovery would lead to speculation that the single grave accommodated a lover-couple. Donne contradicts this and says that it could be a device by which – To make their souls, at the last busy day / Meet at this grave, and make a little stay.

As on Judgment day, men would be resurrected, this hair would revive not only the speaker but also his beloved and reunite them. It is a very clever way of sanctifying love, of raising it to a Christian scale of values.

The speaker thinks of a second possibility of being discovered in this fashion where heathen practices are in force. In that case the diggers would have this preserved as a relic and would be used as a magical object. The speaker thinks that his beloved may be viewed as another Magdalene, and he as an evil cast out from her body.

The rest of the poem is a marvellous pun on miracle. A miracle is a phenomenon that is beyond common laws of nature and science. In this sense the love affair of the speaker was also a miracle, not merely an earthly phenomenon. He recapitulates his affair from the beginning. They loved well and faithfully. The sexual suggestion is not lacking here. But something is in-comprehensible – yet knew not what we loved nor why. Love has a physical basis, but there is a transcendental element in it. It is these vague perceptions of transcendence that have been suggested – perchance we might kiss, these miracles we did. To love was to go beyond the limits of mortality. And it is in this sense that the affair is a miracle. It is no wonder that the hair of his beloved is on his bone.

5.5.3 Appreciation

Of all the poems written by Donne this one seems to be quite popular. Although it has an argumentative structure like other poems of his, there is a touch of sentiment also in this slight picture of a bright hair about the bone. Whatever Donne may say in its defence, it is truly a bright idea. Something very tender and passionate enters into this picture. There is in love something very pure and ethereal that transcends time and death.

From a poet who treated love in its physical form or simply as a fashion of the day, it would have required a little devotion to speak of this eternity of love. A study of the holy sonnets of Donne shows that actually there is no break between his love poems and religious poems. Already he was on the way to realize that love opened such areas of sensitiveness to which divine reflections came quite easily and naturally.

Donne’s knowledge of scientific affairs apart, we are impressed by his mastery of ecclesiastical facts which he subjects to an idiosyncratic vision. To bring the judgment and Magdalene’s hairs together, to talk of miracles in a witty fashion and to weave a poem around a slender idea – all this shows a complexity that characterizes his poetry.

6.0 OBJECTIVES

In this unit you will be reading two well-known poems of Andrew Marvell. He shows the influence of John Donne, though he is also different from him.

On reading the Unit you will be able to:

- understand the range of metaphysical poetry,
- understand the distinctive achievement of Marvell whose lucidity of expression is quite appealing.

6.1 INTRODUCTION

Andrew Marvell led a distinguished civil life as a teacher, a political activist and as an associate of John Milton. He had an opportunity to spend sometime in the rural countryside, a factor that shaped his poetic interests. There he had time to observe natural phenomena and the life of birds, trees and plants from close quarters. He has written about these things sometimes as a detached observer and sometimes as a person who is privy to their secrets:

*Thus I, easy philosopher
Among the birds and trees confer
And little now to me make wants
Or of the fowls, or of the plants*

He was also influenced by the poetry of Donne. He liked its candour, its bold romanticism and the playfulness of language with which things were expressed. With a little exercise he was able to catch up with the new style. Under Donne's influence he now wrote of love quite frankly – his persuasions of the bashful mistress make a delightful reading; his sensuousness creates a warmth and his arguments have an intellectual appeal.

There is a third element in his poetry – he writes of spiritual experiences which do not fit exactly with his puritan background. There is in them simply a realization of the release that moments of meditation provide to the soul, its distancing from the things corporeal and material and an aspiring after the heavenly and the ethereal.

A simplicity of utterance remained an important feature of all the phases of his writing which was also united by a well-directed growth of emotional life. From acute observations of Nature to romantic exuberances and then to a cultivation of mystical attitude, his journey can be likened to that of W.B. Yeats. Both of them remained rooted to deeply private experiences and yet they explored the spiritual moorings of human life.

6.2 ANDREW MARVELL: LIFE AND WORKS

Andrew Marvell was born on March 31, 1621. His father was a clergyman and was later appointed Lecturer at Holy Trinity Church. For two years Andrew Marvell, on graduating from Cambridge University, served as a tutor to the daughter of Lord General Thomas Fairfax.

Andrew Marvell started writing and publishing poems when he was studying at Cambridge. He had interest in the political affairs of England, reflected in his Horatian Ode and Character of Holland. He had also a long association with Oliver Cromwell and John Milton. Because of his active political life he was

5 Whose short and narrow-verged shade
 Does prudently their toils upbraid;
 While all flowers and all trees do close
 To weave the garlands of repose!

Fair Quiet, have I found thee here,
 10 And Innocence, thy sister dear?
 Mistaken long, I sought you then
 In busy companies of men.
 Your sacred plants, if here below,
 Only among the plants will grow;
 15 Society is all but rude
 To this delicious solitude.

No white nor red was ever seen
 So amorous as this lovely green.
 Fond lovers, cruel as their flame,
 20 Cut in these trees their mistress' name:
 Little, alas, they know or heed
 How far these beauties hers exceed!
 Fair trees, wheresoe'er your barks I wound,
 No name shall but your own be found.

25 When we have run our passion's heat,
 Love hither makes best retreat.
 The gods, that mortal beauty chase,
 Still in a tree did end their race:
Apollo hunted Daphne so,
 30 Only that she might laurel grow;
 And Pan did after Syrinx speed,
 Not as a nymph, but for a reed.

What wondrous life is this I lead!
 Ripe apples drop about my head;
 35 The luscious clusters of the vine
 Upon my mouth do crush their wine;
 The nectarine and curious peach
 Into my hands themselves do reach;
 Stumbling on melons, as I pass,
 40 Insnared with flowers, I fall on grass.

Meanwhile the mind, from pleasure less,
 Withdraws into its happiness;
 The mind, that ocean where each kind
 Does straight its own resemblance find;
 45 Yet it creates, transcending these,
 Far other worlds and other seas,
 Annihilating all that's made
 To a green thought in a green shade.
 Here at the fountain's sliding foot,

50 Or at some fruit tree's mossy root,
 Casting the body's vest aside,
 My soul into the boughs does glide:
 There, like a bird, it sits and sings,
 Then whets and combs its silver wings,
 55 And, till prepared for longer flight,
 Waves in its plumes the various light.

Such was that happy garden-state,
 While man there walked without a mate:
 After a place so pure and sweet,
 60 What other help could yet be meet!
 But 'twas beyond a mortal's share
 To wander solitary there:
 Two paradises 'twere in one
 To live in paradise alone.

65 How well the skillful gardener drew
 Of flowers and herbs this dial new,
 Where, from above, the milder sun
 Does through a fragrant zodiac run;
 And as it works, th' industrious bee
 70 Computes its time as well as we!
 How could such sweet and wholesome hours
 Be reckoned but with herbs and flowers?

6.3.1 Glossary

- Apollo : The sun god
- Pan : the Greek god of shepherds and herdsmen, part man and part goat in appearance
- Daphne : Zeus transformed Daphne into a laurel-tree to enable her to escape the passionate pursuit of Apollo
- Syrinx : she was also changed into reeds when Pan chased her

5.3.2 Discussion

The title of the poem is self-revelatory. It is about the thoughts arising in the speaker when he is in a garden. The very situation is such that the speaker enjoys a quietness of mind. There is a scene of natural beauty spread before him which further augments this sense of quietude.

A new set of ideas come to mind in this condition. The thought process starts with a feeling of pleasant surprise, the realization that there is no use going anywhere in quest of peace which is available in such abundance in every corner in a garden. Peace cannot be found in the company of men; it is present in its most charming form in the garden. The poet visualizes peace as a beautiful maiden, good looking and inducing a state of calm.

The garden lies spread before the speaker in an expanse of green, a colour not associated with romance, and yet it arouses romantic ecstasy in him. This is so because his eyes can catch relics of lovers' activities in the garden: they have inscribed their names on the banks of trees. The pleasure is not only of sight; it is one of the saturation of all senses- there is fragrance and also the reaching of ripe fruits and vines into the mouth of the speaker.

From this pleasure there is a further ascent of the mind. For the first time the speaker is aware of the creative powers of mind, its power of creating a new world and also of being firmly concentrated in one attitude. This attitude the speaker names a green thought in a green shade. It is very difficult to specify this green thought – it is full of ambiguities, it may be a highly productive thought or it simply may be the habit of mind to take on the colour of the surroundings. A new vista is added to the experience of the speaker when he feels that his soul has flown out of the body and like a bird freed from a cage has taken seat among the branches of a tree of the garden. The soul in the form of the bird starts singing in an ecstasy of freedom. This is actually the culmination of the experience of the speaker. In the garden he first discovered a repose, then a satisfaction of all the senses, and finally a spiritual release. It is logical therefore for him to view the garden as a replica of Paradise, the first seat of man's ancestors. He can understand that in this garden the movement of time and change of seasons can be read only in terms of increasing fragrance and wholesomeness of herbs and flowers.

6.3.3 Appreciation

The most important feature of this poem is its symbolism. There are a number of symbols – garden, green, ocean, bird, flight etc. That these words mean more than what they literally suggest becomes obvious because of their repetition and also because of the context in which they have been used.

The speaker becomes aware of the immense value of the garden only gradually. It is a realization that comes to him in stages of clear apprehension, feelings and thoughts. In the first stage there is the sense of peace and solitude, a state when the mind is quickened to respond to the beauty of this new environment. There is the second stage of sense-fulfilment, of fruits and vines pouring juices into the mouth of the speaker, instilling a new energy. However, this relish of fruit juices induces a new capacity of contemplation, of becoming aware of the several capacities of mind – of its becoming a repository of all experience, of its power of transcending experience and creating new worlds, and then of cancelling all and being firmly established in an attitude of total concentration. In the last the speaker experiences spiritual freedom – freedom from physicality, mortality and terrestrial restrictions.

There is an interplay of sensuousness and spirituality. To call solitude delicious is to communicate a pleasure with which the word is not associated. Solitude is a state of being alone with pleasant thoughts. But in the surroundings of the garden, full of herbs, flowers, fruits and vines, this can naturally become a thing of taste. You should also understand that sensuousness has not been seen as an obstruction; it has been presented as a stage leading to spiritual fulfilment. The suggestion is that it is only when the senses have been properly gratified that man can rise above bodily limitations and aspire for spiritual elevation.

The use of pagan references – Apollo – Daphne, Pan-Syrinx episodes – and of the Biblical story of Paradise create an exciting complexity in the poem. Both of them however emphasize that the herbs and plants of the garden constitute retreat from passion and create ideal atmosphere for realization of the spiritual potential of man.

6.4 POEM: TO HIS COY MISTRESS

Had we but world enough, and time,
 This coyness, lady, were no crime.
 We would sit down, and think which way
 To walk, and pass our long love's day.
 5 Thou by the Indian Ganges side
 Shoudst rubies find; I by the tide
 Of Humber would complain. I would Love you ten years before the flood,
 And you should, if you please, refuse
 10 Till the conversion of the Jews.
 My vegetable love should grow
 Vaster than empires and more slow;
 An hundred years should go to praise
 Thine eyes, and on thy forehead gaze;
 15 Two hundred to adore each breast,
 But thirty thousand to the rest;
 An age at least to every part,
 And the last age should show your heart.
 For, lady, you deserve this state,
 20 Nor would I love at lower rate.
 But at my back I always hear
 Time's winged chariot hurrying near;
 And yonder all before us lie
 Deserts of vast eternity.
 25 Thy beauty shall no more be found;
 Nor, in thy marble vault, shall sound
 My echoing song; then worms shall try
 That long-preserved virginity,
 And your quaint honor turn to dust,
 30 And into ashes all my lust:
 The grave's a fine and private place,
 But none, I think, do there embrace.
 Now therefore, while the youthful hue
 Sits on thy skin like morning dew,
 35 And while thy willing soul transpires
 At every pore with instant fires,
 Now let us sport us while we may,
 And now, like amorous birds of prey,
 Rather at once our time devour
 40 Than languish in his slow-chapped power.
 Let us roll all our strength and all
 Our sweetness up into one ball,
 And tear our pleasures with rough strife
 Through the iron gates of life:
 45 Thus, though we cannot make our sun
 Stand still, yet we will make him run.

6.4.1 Glossary

rubies	: red, precious gemstones, supposed to preserve virginity
Humber	: the Humber river flows through Marvell's nature town, Hull conversion of Jew	: to occur, as Christian tradition holds, at the end of history vegetable love	: love growing abundantly
transpires	: breathes out
slow-chapped power	: slowly consuming

6.4.2 Discussion

The poem is a clever presentation of the carpe diem philosophy – the view that the days of youth are short and so should be best used in the enjoyment of pleasures of love. The speaker presents this view before his sweetheart in order to persuade her to accept his proposal without delay since the end of youth is imminent and without youth there is no pleasure.

The satirical vein directed at the poor understanding of the lover is evident in the speaker's reference to the two continents where two rivers, the Ganges and the Humber, flow and maintain the division of the world. The lovers would have been by the banks of the two rivers and would have passed time in waiting if only they had the privilege of control over time. This is the beginning of a tedious argument – of the references to the beginning of the creation, its end and to the recent growth of European imperialism. All these historical stages have been crossed over a long stretch of time. Had the lovers had that much time in their disposal, the speaker would have taken a hundred years to look at her beautiful eyes and two hundred years to gaze at her breasts. All this is in hyperbolic mode, implying its sheer improbability.

The second stanza is downright realistic by contrast. The speaker turns to the vision of the old age and death. The marble body of his beloved would decay and perhaps they could unite only in the moment of death, of dust and ashes. The force of argument is strongest here as the beloved can be easily convinced of the futility of union in this state.

The third and the final stanza restores the brilliance of the scene with which the poem began. The speaker refers to the glowing skin of the beloved, to the fires burning in the cells of the body and suggests that the available time should be enjoyed in love – the only means to defeat time.

6.4.3 Appreciation

Having read the two poems of Andrew Marvell you can see for yourself with what great ease the poet could write poems of two different strains. Thoughts In A Garden is celebration of peace, solitude and spirituality; To His Coy Mistress is the celebration of youth and beauty in frankly erotic terms.

There reigns over such diversity of theme and style a definite influence of John Donne. He reiterated the power of rhetoric and ratiocination and also of the value of religious urge amidst the sinfulness of human life.

Marvell’s argument is marked by originality and copiousness. He contrasts the amplitude of time that characterizes the slow growth of civilization with the painful short duration of youth. Compared to the developments in the history of the world man’s life is short, and youth is even shorter. But can anything match the glory of youth?

Of the several rhetorical constructions and conceits you should note chiefly – Time’s winged chariot and deserts of vast eternity. They are perfectly in tune with the hyperbolic opening of the poem. But they are also examples of epigrammatic condensation. Time is flying in a non-stop chariot – a very dynamic image, a powerful suggestion of lack of man’s control over time. The visualization of eternity in the form of deserts stretched before the eyes is not exact as it is suggestive of the intense, hurting pain.

In this unit we studied:

- the life and works of Andrew Marvell, noting the affinities between him and John Donne;
- two poems, having two different themes, in which the distinctive contribution of Marvell is well-represented.

6.6 SUGGESTED READING

6.7 ANSWERS TO SELF-CHECK EXERCISES

Self-check Exercise I

- 1) Society is a disciplining institution. To call it rude is an example of paradox.

Marvell calls society rude since it does not allow man's spiritual growth; it keeps him involved in the affairs of the world.

Elaborate the above idea.

- 2) The speaker enjoys in the garden peace, solitude and gratification of senses. There are pleasures of the initial stage. As he prolongs his stay the garden offers him a moment of release, an opportunity to rise above the limitations of the body.

- 3) Normally, mind is the organ that helps us organize disparate thoughts and experiences in a whole.

But Marvell alludes to a higher power of mind – it has God-like power to create and annihilate.

- 4) Go through Discussion and Appreciation.

Self-check Exercise II

- 1) She is indifferent to the speaker's entreaties. In so far as it involves waste of youth, it is a crime.

- 2) The lady would have waited and the speaker would have spent thousands of years simply gazing at her body.

- 3) Consult Discussion.

- 4) Consult Discussion.

INTRODUCTION TO BLOCK 2

THE LONG EIGHTEENTH CENTURY: A HISTORICAL PERSPECTIVE

No century is longer than any other; still the period of 1660 to 1784 is often referred to as the Long Eighteenth Century. In order to understand the significance of the year 1660 you must have a peep into British history. In 1660 prince Charles of the House of Stuart ascended the throne of England as Charles II. Charles II was son of Charles I (1625 – ‘49), the British monarch and, queen Henrietta Maria sister of the French king. Charles I had been beheaded on 30 January, 1649 at the end of a Civil War. After having been defeated by Cromwell at the Battle of Worcester on 3 September, 1651 the then-prince Charles had taken asylum in France. Regarding 1784, Samuel Johnson the famous lexicographer often called ‘the last of the Romans’ died in that year and brought a period of English literature to a close. It would be a good idea to acquaint yourself with the political history of this period by going through a short history of the British Isles or the relevant entries in the Encyclopaedia Britannica.

The first author in this block that you are going to read is John Dryden (1631 - 1700). He, Alexander Pope (1688 - 1744) and others such as Richard Steele and Joseph Addison, the periodical essayists and, Jonathan Swift the author of Gulliver’s Travels (1726) are the preeminent figures of the the Augustan Age in English literature. The epithet ‘Augustan’ derives from Augustus (27 BCE – 14 CE) the Roman emperor during whose reign poets such as Virgil, Horace and Ovid flourished. The English authors drew frequent parallels between themselves and their Roman counterparts and imitated their works. Oliver Goldsmith (c 1730 – ‘74) in his ‘Account of the Augustan age in England’ (1759) published in The Bee, identified the Augustan Age with the reign of Queen Anne (1702 –‘14). The habit of imitating the great authors of antiquity was admirably summed up by Alexander Pope, the greatest poet of this period, in a couplet:

Those RULES of old discover’d, not devis’d,
Are Nature stll, but Nature methodiz’d,

This was a reference to the influence of classical critics such as Aristotle, Horace, Longinus and Quintiliana on the literatures of this period.

A poet such as Samuel Johnson took pride in carrying forward the neoclassical ethos of the age of Dryden and Pope. However, in the works of James Thomson, particularly The Seasons (1730), Oliver Goldsmith’s The Deserted Village (1770), George Crabbe with his harsh view of life in rural England in The Village (1783), Thomas Gray (1716 - ‘71) in Ode on a Distant Prospect of Eaton College (1747) and the famous Elegy written in a County Churchyard (1751) and William Collins (1721 – ‘59) in Ode to Evening we discover the rise of an Age of Sensibility. ‘Sensibility’ wrote William Callan, ‘is not of course the discovery of the poets of the later eighteenth century; but in the earlier poets it was incidental, in the later ones it is paramount.’ While reading the poems in this block you should bear in mind the slow transition in the literary ethos from Dryden on the one hand to Thomas Gray on the other and its many reflections of that spirit in their poetries.

7.0 OBJECTIVES

Our aim in this unit is to examine John Dryden's poem Mac Flecknoe, a poem which goes beyond critical sniping to a rage at the deathliness of human stupidity. This unit will also discuss briefly the biographical and historical background of John Dryden, the poet. Our intention in this unit is also to show how far whatever Dryden wrote was almost automatically suggested by events in his contemporary life.

7.1 INTRODUCTION

This unit will briefly introduce the poet John Dryden, paying special attention to the manner in which his writings were generally conditioned by the historic events of his society. As you already know, John Dryden was appointed Poet Laureate in 1668 and Historiographer Royal in 1670. But on the accession of James II to the English throne, Dryden became a Catholic, and refusing to abandon his new faith after 1688, he was stripped of the Laureateship and other royal appointments. So this unit will highlight the criss-cross of attractions and revulsions that gradually emerged in John Dryden, the man and the poet.

This unit will then go on to examine John Dryden's MacFlecknoe (1682) through relevant extracts and see how the poem defines by negatives and discrepancies, undoes epic pretensions by playing with the mock-heroic and lets dullness express itself.

7.2 JOHN DRYDEN (1631-1700)

John Dryden was born at Aldwinkle All Saints, Northamptonshire in 1631. His father, the Rev. Erasmus Dryden, the third son of the Baronet, Sir Erasmus, was Rector of Aldwinkle All Saints. Dryden's mother was Mary Pickering, daughter of the Rector of Aldwinkle All Saints. Both the Drydens and the Pickerings were well-to-do families with Puritan leanings and sympathies. Young Dryden was educated at Oundle and later at Westminster under the famous headmaster Dr. Busby. His first attempts at verse composition date from this period. He then proceeded to Cambridge and, after a stay of four years, left the university in 1657 and settled in London about the same year.

Arriving in London, Dryden devoted himself to politics and literature. He became secretary to Sir George Pickering, his cousin on his mother's side who stood high in the Protector, Cromwell's favour. The death of Cromwell in 1658 gave Dryden his first opportunity to appear in the limelight by publishing a copy of verses to deplore the event. The Heroic stanzas on the Death of the Lord Protector was published early in 1659, and it inaugurated the poetical and political career of John Dryden.

After nearly eighteen months of anarchy, Charles II who had been spending much of his exile in France, where he was attracted towards French Literature of the day dominated by a brilliant set of writers, actuated by Classical models, ascended the throne of England. Nothing daunted the young poet John Dryden who quickly got over his discomfiture by ingratiating himself with the Royalists and by bringing out his Astraea Redux (a poem on the happy restoration and return of the sacred majesty Charles II) in 1660, in sharp contrast with his very recent eulogy of and Elegy on the death of Cromwell produced in so indecent a haste. This was followed by a coronation poem A Panegyric on the King's Coronation (April 1661) and the Epistle to Lord Chancellor (New Year's Day 1662). All these early poems were written in heroic couplets.

In November 1662, Dryden became a Member of the newly founded Royal Society which began to exact from all the members "a close, naked, natural way of speaking". But Dryden was foremost a poet, and, in poetry, he was primarily a craftsman. This "man of letters" was also a dramatist, critic and translator, and his life was largely controlled by economic exigencies and dependence on the Court. He cherished as his first ambition as an artist the making of good verse.

It is worth noting here that nearly everything that Dryden wrote was almost automatically suggested by events in his contemporary life. The first group of Dryden's poems was brought to a close by Annus Mirabilis (1667)

In 1670, Dryden was made Historiographer Royal in the Court of Charles II. After some time, he found in the aims and methods of the Whig intriguers a subject made to his hand. Soon the big question arose: who should succeed Charles II? The anti-Catholics led by the brilliant and unprincipled Shaftesbury tried to set aside the succession of James, the Catholic brother. The infamous Popish plot of Titus Oates and the tragi-comic attempts to place Monmouth on the English throne were incidents in the conspiracy. But before the final collapse, Shaftesbury was arrested and sent to the Tower. These were the circumstances in which Part I of Absalom and Achitophel appeared in 1681. Part II of Absalom and Achitophel, of which only a little is Dryden's (much is Nahum Tate's) appeared in 1682. Both were anonymous. By giving his satire a Biblical setting and presenting Monmouth and Shaftesbury as the rebellious Absalom encouraged by the wily counsellor Achitophel respectively, Dryden caught the ears of the Whig and Puritan citizens of London who had been Shaftesbury's strongest supporters. Yet another invective against Shaftesbury came out in The Medal in 1682.

Dryden's contribution of some two hundred lines of abuse in Part II of Absalom and Achitophel is worth commenting on very briefly. The sketches of the "Heroically mad" Elkanah Settle (Doeg) and of Thomas Shadwell (Og) have a vicious palpability about them. Shadwell (?1642-1692) became the object of Dryden's satire purely as a result of his political affiliations, but more directly as a result of an increasing unfriendly rivalry in the theatre. Shadwell's operatic adaptation of The Tempest; The Enchanted Isle of 1679 was a particularly galling success. Dryden's bitter distaste for the flippancy and shoddiness of Shadwell's work as a poet reached its peak in the lampoon which he had begun in 1670s but published only in 1682, Mac Flecknoe or A Satyr upon the True Blue Protestant Poet, T.S.

Dryden's Odes and lyrical poems of the last fifteen years (1685-1700) form the last outstanding group. Here we have inspiration struggling to express itself, with an attention to style that is often too minute. The Song for St. Cecilia's Day (1687) composed in the heat of his recent conversion to Roman Catholicism, is pure in form and has a communicative musical beauty and sweetness.

But his conversion from Protestantism to Roman Catholicism at a time when the latter was in favour at the Court, laid him open to suspicion as to his sincerity. And in 1688 when King James II was driven from England by the Great Revolution which gave the throne to the Protestant William and Mary, Dryden lost all his offices including the Laureateship and the pension that had been conferred on him of late. Ironically enough, Thomas Shadwell was appointed as the new Poet Laureate.

But still undaunted, John Dryden in his sixty seventh year once more devoted himself to classical literature which inspired him to undertake translations from the Latin of Juvenal, Perseus and Virgil – all of which opened up fresh sources of income. In 1697 came out Alexander's Feast containing his best known poems including the Second Ode. His modernizations of Chaucer and Boccaccio under the title of Fables, and the translation of the Classics were two pieces of literary work (published in 1699) which were particularly suited to his temperament. Six months after the publication of his Fables, Dryden died in 1700.

Thus Dryden's literary achievements were enormous. And though in verse the next generation was to improve upon his model, the model was actually his. He is almost as strong in blank verse as he is in his chosen instrument, the heroic couplet. In non-dramatic verse, he has scarcely left any kind of poetry unattempted except the epic proper. His satirical and didactic poems can be regarded as among the most successful attempts ever made to conduct arguments and deliver attacks in a polished metrical form. A clear thinker, he has pondered over the rules of his art, and has sought them in the works of the ancients, in those of the French. His various essays, prefaces, epistles, prologues and epilogues inaugurate in England modern literary criticism, and propound, not without certain strong personal touches the doctrine of Classicism then in the opening stage.

7.3 MAC FLECKNOE (1682)

Dryden’s Mac Flecknoe, or A Satyr upon the True – Blue Protestant Poet, T.S. (1682) is a scathing personal attack on a former friend Thomas Shadwell, who had replied to Dryden’s The Medal (1682) in a poem with scurrilous abuse. Richard Flecknoe, who died in 1678, was an Irish priest and a poetaster who wrote a little good verse and a great deal of bad. This Richard Flecknoe was a stock subject for satire, and even Andrew Marvell wrote against him as early as 1645. Evidently, this suggested Dryden’s choice of Flecknoe, as he noticed how natural was the connection between a bad poet and Flecknoe. Dryden and Shadwell of the Tory and the Whig parties respectively came to satirize each other, and Flecknoe’s name was found handy because of the contemporary references to him by poets and critics. Flecknoe finds his true heir in his son (Mac) Shadwell, a loquacious Celtic bard, irrepressible and irresponsible.

Mac Flecknoe is constructed in a mock-heroical epical framework with all the solemnity and grandeur in the Homeric style. Its scheme is highly ingenious. It can be interpreted as perhaps the best expression of the various forces which served to diffuse the satiric spirit in the age of Dryden. In his ready-made frame, Dryden displays all the classical power of form. Helped by a clear and well thought out plan, the framework of his construction acquires almost an architectural quality. It has all the features of a mock-heroic fantasy. The development is masterly from the very opening in which the aged monarch of Dullness, Flecknoe, is represented in the epic manner down to the closing speech in which he enjoins his heir – the supreme dullard (Shadwell) to trust nature and not labour to be dull. The poem begins:

“All human things are subject to decay,
 And, when Fate summons, monarchs must obey.
 This Flecknoe found, who, like Augustus, young
 Was called to empire, and had governed long.
 In prose and verse was owned without dispute through all the realms of Nonsense absolute.”

The elevated tone of the opening couplet crashes once Flecknoe emerges as a fatuous Augustus having “governed long in prose and verse” but “through all the realms of Nonsense absolute”. Flecknoe, a prince among fake poetasters, realizes that he has ruled too long and decay is only the order of the day and the call of Fate cannot be ignored.

And this aged prince does at length debate to settle the succession of his state (of “Nonsense absolute”) and ponders which of all his sons was fit to reign and wage immortal war with wit. He decides:

“Shadwell alone my perfect image bears
 Mature in dullness from his tender years;
 Shadwell alone of all my sons is he
 Who stands confirmed in full stupidity”.

Thus Shadwell comes out as the right choice for the succession because he is described as “Mature in dullness from his tender years” and “stands confirmed in full stupidity. Dryden’s personal satire against Shadwell can be noticed here as coming out very directly.

The poem next goes on to describe the site of the coronation which has been selected to be in the disreputable quarters of London:

“Amidst this monument of vanished minds;
 Pure clichés the suburban muse affords.
 Here Flecknoe as a place to fame well known
 Ambitiously designed his Shadwell’s throne.”

So the place chosen for the coronation is also presented with a sarcastic venom that actually delights the readers. The monument chosen has been described as one of “vanished minds”, and the place chosen is praised mockingly and ironically as one well known to fame, and Flecknoe is presented as ambitiously designing his Shadwell’s throne. The mock-heroic tone of Dryden can be noticed running through such descriptions. This monument chosen in the disreputable quarters of London is actually only a wretched Nursery – a training centre for actors, where only stupid dramas are the usual favourites.

The next few lines describe the actual coronation of Shadwell:

“The hoary prince in majesty appeared
 High on a throne of his ownlabours reared,
 At his right hand our young Ascanius sat
 Rome’s other hope and pillar of the state
 His brows thick fogs instead of glories grace,
 And Lambent dullness played around his face”.

The “hoary Prince” is Flecknoe, and the throne is made up of his own books. The reference to Ascanius takes us back to the relationship between Ascanius and Aeneas. Shadwell is to Flecknoe what Ascanius was to Aeneas. The gently brilliant “dullness” playing around Mac Flecknoe’s face once again reinforces the satiric thrust on Shadwell.

In the next few lines, come Flecknoe’s unusual prophecy and unique benediction. The father invokes God’s blessings on the son and visualizes a bright future for him in a prophetic mood:

“Then thus continued he: My son advance
Still in new impudence, new ignorance.
Success let others teach, learn thou from me
Pangs without birth and fruitless industry”.

So Shadwell is given an unconventional benediction in which he is blessed to advance still in “new impudence” and “new ignorance”. Flecknoe desires Shadwell to learn from him how to produce “pangs without birth” and “fruitless industry”.

The poem ends with Flecknoe suddenly and dramatically disappearing, thus putting an abrupt end to the entire procedure. The last few lines of the poem give almost an anticlimactic bang:

“He said, but his last words were scarcely heard,
For Bruce and Longville had a trap prepared.
And down they sent the declaiming bard,
Sinking, he left his drugget robe behind
Borne upwards by a subterranean wind.
The mantle fell to the young prophet’s part
With double portions of his father’s art”.

Bruce and Longville are actually characters in Shadwell’s Virtuoso, and the drugget robe is made of coarse woollen cloth. So as the “declaiming bard” (Flecknoe) says his last words to the young prophet (Shadwell), the father’s mantle falls on Shadwell with a double bang.

Thus Mac Flecknoe can be regarded as a highly entertaining though abusive attack on Shadwell, light in weight, concentrated in its venom, devastating in its capacity to hit by means of its satirical thrusts charged with a vision after the epic manner. Dryden, in Mac Flecknoe, emerges in a relaxed, uninhibited mood attacking Shadwell in a burlesque lampoon which is purely, even at times surrealistically, comic. Mac Flecknoe can be rightly considered as a striking example of the mock-heroic in English Literature.

7.4 LET US SUM UP

In this unit we have studied and understood the important phases of John Dryden's personal life, political and literary career. We have also observed how Dryden's writings were generally conditioned by the historic events of his society. We have also examined closely John Dryden's Mac Flecknoe through relevant extracts from the text and seen how the mock-heroic epical framework has been artistically used by Dryden to write the lampoon on Shadwell. Mac Flecknoe finally emerges as a striking example of the mock-heroic in English Literature.

7.6 ANSWERS TO SELF-CHECK EXERCISES

Self-check Exercise I

- a) The Heroic Stanzas on the Death of the Lord Protector inaugurated the poetical and political career of John Dryden.
- b) Dryden became a Member of the newly founded Royal Society in November 1662.
- c) In his sixty seventh year, Dryden devoted himself to classical Literature which inspired him to undertake translations from the Latin of Juvenal, Perseus and Virgil.

Self-check Exercise II

- a) These opening lines of Dryden's Mac Flecknoe are dramatically significant because they set the mock-heroic tone of the entire poem. These lines set up a very serious tone in which all the human beings are described as mortal, and the ponderous truth that when the call of Death comes, even Kings have to respond. But the elevated tone of the couplet crashes once Flecknoe emerges with his "realms of absolute Nonsense". This couplet, therefore, raises the expectations of the readers which are later on only denied ironically
- b) Dryden exposes the confirmed stupidity of Shadwell in these lines when Flecknoe is described here as positively admitting that of all his sons it is only Shadwell who resembles him perfectly as being dull and stupid right from his tender years.

- c) These lines describe ironically the actual place where Shadwell is to be crowned as the successor of Flecknoe. The “hoary prince” is Flecknoe himself, and throne prepared for Shadwell is one made up of the books of Flecknoe. So the mock-heroic satire of Dryden continues even here. The “prince”, “majesty” and “throne” conjure images of grandeur which do not match the satiric story being narrated.
- d) The satiric effect created here by these lines is indeed pungent. Here Shadwell is given a unique, unconventional blessing in which Flecknoe desires him to learn from him how to produce “pangs without birth” and “fruitless industry”. In a way, Flecknoe is actually asking Shadwell do be fruitless in his literary creations.
- e) The dramatic importance of these concluding lines is immense. Contrary to the opening couplet which started on a highly serious note, this concluding couplet ends with an anticlimactic bang. The last words of Flecknoe are scarcely heard as he suddenly falls in the trap-door which opens below his feet. But as Flecknoe falls, his woollen garment is carried upwards by a sudden gust of wind. This is the ‘mantle’ that falls on Shadwell, and he inherits from his father a stupidity which is two times more than that of Flecknoe. The stupidity of Flecknoe has only been doubled in the absurdity of Mac Flecknoe, and the lampoon Mac Flecknoe has reached its culminating point.

8.0 OBJECTIVES

This unit will analyze and explicate Alexander Pope's An Essay on Man (1733-4), through relevant extracts from the text, a poem in which the poet attempts with cheerful optimism to "vindicate the ways of God to Man," arguing that "WHATEVER IS, IS RIGHT". This unit will also comment briefly on the biographical and historical background of Alexander Pope, and try to discover the subtle connections between Pope the man and the artist in the context of the age in which he was writing.

8.1 INTRODUCTION

This unit will introduce Alexander Pope in the biographical, literary and historical perspective and try to examine the relationship between the man and the artist. As you already know, the age of Alexander Pope is sometimes called the classic Age and sometimes the Augustan age of English Literature. It may be well to explain the senses in which these terms should be understood. The epithet 'Classic' we may take to denote, first, that the poets and the critics of this age believed that the works of the writers of the classical antiquity (really of the Latin writers) presented the best models and the ultimate standards of literary taste, and, secondly, in a more general way, that, like these Latin writers, they had little faith in the promptings and guidance of individual genius, and much in laws and rules imposed by the authority of the past. Pope expressed the principle of classicism in the following lines in his Essay on Criticism (1711):

"Tis more to guide than spur the Muse's stand; Restrain his fury, than provoke his speed"

So the Muse had to be guided, the fury had to be restrained, and the speed had to be checked by a masterly control.

The other epithet "Augustan" was applied in the first instance as a term of high praise, because those who used it believed that the Age of Augustus was the golden age of Latin literature, and, therefore the age of Pope was regarded as the golden age of English literature.

This unit will then go on to analyze and respond to Pope's An Essay on Man with the help of suitable extracts from Epistle I, and see how the poem illuminates and explains the premises of contemporary moral philosophy in the form of popular and accessible verse. The four Epistles that make up An Essay on Man variously explore the relationship of human kind to the Newtonian universe ("a mighty maze! But not without a plan") and they offer observations on human limitation, passion, intelligence, sociability, and the potential for happiness.

8.2 ALEXANDER POPE (1688-1744)

Alexander Pope was born in London in 1688 – the year of the Revolution and of John Bunyan's death. His father, a prosperous linen – draper, was a Roman Catholic; and on account of his religion, Pope was excluded from the public schools and universities. As a result, he picked up most of his knowledge in a haphazard way. So although Pope read widely, he never became an accurate scholar. This want of sound learning somehow creeps into his work. Extraordinarily precocious (in his own famous words, he "lisp'd in numbers for the numbers came") he published his Pastorals in 1709 and his Essay on Criticism in 1711.

Pope lived with his parents first at Binfield, on the skirts of Windsor Forest, and then at Chiswick, till the completion of his translation of Homer, the financial success of which enabled him in 1719 to buy a house at Twickenham. At Twickenham, he passed the rest of his life, and there he died in 1744.

Pope's poetic career neatly falls into three periods – an early and a late period of original work divided by a period (1715-25) of translation. To the period before 1715, belong a number of miscellaneous poems of which the most important are Pastorals (1709), short poems on spring, summer, autumn and winter, closely fashioned on Virgil; Essay on Criticism (1711) which is a remarkable performance for a man of twenty one, and Windsor Forest (1713) in which the landscape is copied out of the Greek and Latin poets. In this period also comes out Pope's mock-heroic poem The Rape of the Lock which can certainly be regarded as his masterpiece. It appeared first in 1712, and later in an enlarged form in 1714. The characteristic miniaturizing effect of Pope's use of the mock-heroic has been related by many critics to the fact that he was only four feet and six inches' tall and suffered from the curvature of the spine.

The translation of Homer's Iliad and the Odyssey – the former made single-handed and the latter with much help from the others represents the labour of Pope's second period. The translation of Iliad was published in instalments between 1715 and 1720; and the translation of Odyssey appeared in 1725-26.

After the publication of his translation of Homer, Pope confined himself almost wholly to satire and didactic poetry. The principal works of the third period are: Four Moral Essays (1731-35), The Dunciad (1728), An Essay on Man (1733-34), Imitations of Horace (between 1733 and 1737), and Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot (1742).

The Dunciad, a long and elaborate satire on the 'dunces' – the bad poets and pretentious critics of Pope's day, used the mock-epic machinery and was obviously influenced by Dryden's Mac Flecknoe. But the inspiration for The Dunciad came also from Pope's innumerable quarrels with all sorts of people. In 1742, Pope produced the New Dunciad in continuation of the earlier poem, and in 1743 this was added as Book Four to a new edition of The Dunciad, the hero being changed from Theobald to Colley Ciber, the Poet Laureate.

In An Essay on Man, a poem in four Epistles (containing portions only of a larger plan that was never carried out), Pope undertakes a defence of the moral government of the universe and an explanation of the physical and moral evil in it, on the optimistic postulate that "WHATEVER IS, IS RIGHT". It must be noted here, however, that Pope was not a philosopher and he had no natural leanings towards philosophy, and no training for it. It was simply the influence of others, and especially of his Deistic friend Lord Bolingbroke, which induced him to dabble in it. Consequently, An Essay on Man has been branded by many critics as confused and even self-contradictory. But the poem contains many passages which are justly famous and are still often quoted for their rhetorical beauty and power.

Pope's last years were spent in a rented riverside house at Twickenham, where he played out his own version of the Horatian retirement. Imitating a landed gentleman, he indulged in a mock-heroic, miniaturized version of landscape-gardening, designing a whimsically romantic "grot" in a tunnel which linked the water front with his back garden. Before his death, Pope received his last sacrament, never having abandoned his catholic religion.

The artist Alexander Pope has been critically evaluated as the embodiment of the kind of intelligence which was currently known as "wit", and which the classical age cultivated and admired. He has also been regarded as a marvelously clever and adroit literary craftsman. The neat, compact, antithetic and epigrammatic style of writing which was the Classical ideal, assumed perfection in his hands. He is also considered to be the most consummate master of the classic couplet, which he trimmed of some of the licences which Dryden is supposed to have permitted himself. Pope's perfect models were followed with great fidelity by all other poets who used the couplet till the early nineteenth century.

8.3 AN ESSAY ON MAN: EPISTLE I (1733-4)

In his An Essay on Man, Alexander Pope turns to the philosophical which he hoped would crown his poetic career. Pope published An Essay on Man anonymously so as to wrong-foot his enemies, who were not sure whether to condemn it as Pope's, or to praise it as superior to anything Pope could have achieved. In four heroic-couplet Epistles addressed to the Tory politician Lord Bolingbroke, Pope attempts with cheerful optimism to "vindicate the ways of God to man", arguing that "WHATEVER IS, IS RIGHT". Pope expounds the medieval and Renaissance concept of a "chain of being", with its primitive blend of theology and natural philosophy, and reconciles it uneasily with the modern empirical science of Sir Isaac Newton. The work becomes a kind of handbook of popular Enlightenment notions throughout Europe and has been extensively translated.

An Essay on Man expresses the Deist view that God can be apprehended through nature, and not only through revealed scriptures Epistle I makes significant observations on the nature and state of Man with respect to the universe. The poem introduces man as a "mighty maze" but not without a plan. The Epistle now goes on to vindicate the ways of God to Man:

"Say first, of God above, or Man below,
What can we reason, but from what we know?
Of Man, what see we but station here,
From which to reason, or to which we refer?
Thro' worlds unnumber'd thro' the God be known,
'T is ours to trace Him only in our own."

Thus the poet places God above, and Man below, and goes on to argue that our reasoning can be based only on knowledge. God is known through numberless worlds, but Man has to find Him only in his own. Thus a strong relationship is already established between God and man.

The poem goes on to unfold yet another aspect of Man by observing:

“Presumptuous Man! the reason wouldst thou find,
Why form'd so weak, so little and so blind?
First, if thou canst the harder reason guess,
Why form'd no weaker, blinder and no less?
Ask of the mother earth, why oaks are made
Taller or stronger than the weeds they shade?”

Pope suggests here a natural plan in the ways of God to Man. He begins by denouncing Man as a “presumptuous” being, complaining about his being made weak and small. The poet asks Man to take comfort in thinking why he has not been made weaker and even smaller. Mother Earth, representing Nature, may be asked why oak trees have been made taller than the weeds they are out to protect. So Pope is already suggesting an optimistic view of life by observing that Man should remember that it could have been worse. Besides, Nature provides a particular size to every object for a certain purpose. And it is in the nature of the things that they should be exactly what they are made to be.

Pope next switches on to yet another stand by observing pointedly:

“Respecting Man, whatever wrong we call
May, must be right and relative to all”

Pope's optimistic stand is still further strengthened here when he asks the “respecting” Man to understand that whatever we may call wrong must be right and only relative to everything else. The modern scientific principle of relativity has been artistically suggested here. “Presumptuous” Man has now become “Respecting” Man, and the tone of Pope has mellowed down, and the optimistic point of view of Pope spills over into yet another positive realization:

“Then say not Man's imperfect, hear'n in fault;
Say rather, Man's as perfect as he ought:
His knowledge measur'd to his state and place;
His time a moment, and a point his space.
If to be perfect in a certain sphere,
What matter, soon or late, or here or there?
The blest today is as completely so
As who began a thousand years ago.”

So Man is brought out as “as perfect as he ought” to be. Man is not imperfect. Man should realize that he may be perfect in a certain sphere of life, and once one has achieved success it does not matter whether he had become successful soon or late.

Now God comes out as seeing everyone with an equal eye:

“Who sees with equal eye as God of all,
A hero perish, or a sparrow fall
Atoms or systems into rain hurl’d
And now a bubble burst, and now a world”

Here the poet suggests strongly that everyone is equal in the eyes of God, as He sees with an equal eye a hero dying or a sparrow falling. For God, atoms hurled in the rain making the world come to pieces are as important in the eyes of God as a bursting bubble.

So the poet now advises philosophically:

“Hope humbly then; with trembling pinions soar,
Wait the great teacher Death, and God adore,
What future bliss be given, not thee to know,
But gives that Hope to be thy blessing now
Hope springs eternal in the human breast
Man never Is, but always To be blest.”

The poem now achieves a new philosophical dimension in which Man is advised to be hopeful but with humility. He should only wait for the profound teacher Death and praise God. Man does not know what future happiness is actually waiting for him. Hope is a blessing which springs forever in the body of Man, and blessings are in fact, only waiting to be showered on him.

And Epistle I ends with the following piece of advice:

“Cease then, nor ORDER Imperfection name,
Our proper bliss depends on what we blame.
Know thy own point: This kind, this due degree
Of blindness, weakness, Heav’n bestows on thee.
Submit – In this, or any other sphere
Secure to be as blest as thou canst bear....
And, spite of Pride, in erring Reason’s spite
One truth is clear, WHATEVER IS, IS RIGHT.”

These concluding lines of Epistle I give a brilliant poetic expression to a mood of enlightened confidence which characterizes the period. An optimistic philosophy of life is enunciated when Pope observes that Man’s proper happiness actually depends on what he complains about. Man should try to have a self-realization and submit to the Divine will and accept that whatever is, is right.

So An Essay on Man First Epistle artistically prepares us for the opening lines of the second Epistle:

“Know then thyself, presume not God to scan;
The proper study of Mankind is Man.”

Indeed, with great craftsmanship, Pope really vindicates the ways of God to Man in his An Essay on Man Epistle I, and artistically presents Man as a “mighty maze” but “not without a plan”. The poet admits that Man is befogged by Pride and wrong Reason. But in spite of these hurdles one truth is obviously clear,:
WHATEVER IS, IS RIGHT.

8.4 LET US SUM UP

In this unit we have examined Alexander Pope in the biographical, literary and historical perspective and moved on to a critical discussion of his poem An Essay on Man with special reference to Epistle I. On the basis of some important extracts from the actual text, we have discovered that Pope’s An Essay on Man puts across an optimistic philosophy of life which is that WHATEVER IS, IS RIGHT.

8.6 ANSWERS TO SELF-CHECK EXERCISES

Self-check Exercise I

a) According to Alexander Pope, the poetic Muse had to be restrained rather than provoked. This meant that little faith was to be put on the prompting and guidance of individual genius and much on the laws and rules imposed by the authority of the Past.

- b) Pope was excluded from the public schools and universities because he was a Roman Catholic.
- c) The Dunciad is a long sative on the dunces – the bad poets and pretentious critics of Pope’s day.

Self-check Exercise II

- a) The message Pope gives here is that though God is known through many worlds, Man has to find Him only in his own. So the best way to know God is through man’s self-realization.
- b) The poet suggests that it is only a natural process of the earth that the oak trees should be taller and stronger than the weeds they are made to protect.
- c) These lines are significant because here Pope politely addresses Man as self-respecting, and assures him to note that whatever may appear to be wrong to him is actually only right, and a matter of sheer relativity.
- d) Pope here gives an optimistic message when he affirms that Man should not consider himself as imperfect, and that Heaven has made any mistake. Actually, man is as perfect as he ought to be.
- e) This is the final optimistic message of Epistle I of An Essay on Man where Pope concludes that in spite of all the human Pride and defective Reason, WHATEVER IS, IS RIGHT

9.0 OBJECTIVES

The aim of this unit is to examine Samuel Johnson's poem The Vanity of Human Wishes as an unrelenting exposition of the precariousness of secular hope as compared to patient submission to the will of God. This unit begins with a brief survey of the biographical background of Samuel Johnson exploring how the artist gradually triumphed over the man who was marred by ill-health right from his childhood.

9.1 INTRODUCTION

This unit will briefly introduce Samuel Johnson the individual, paying special attention to the obstacles he had to face starting from his childhood days. The humbly born Samuel Johnson, the struggling young writer, the setter aside of aristocratic patrons, and the maker of his own way in the world was to emerge, somewhat incongruously, as the challenger of what was seen as the smug, tidy, enclosed, and elitist values of an age that had put too much store by the power of human reason.

This unit will then examine The Vanity of Human Wishes and observe how far the poem can be said to be having a Christian stoicism which seeks to deflate human pride.

9.2 SAMUEL JOHNSON (1709-84)

Samuel Johnson, critic, poet, lexicographer, essayist, was born in 1709 at Lichfield to elderly parents, and his childhood was marred by a tubercular infection which affected his sight and hearing, and his face was scarred by scrofula, then popularly called "King's Evil". He was educated at Lichfield Grammar School and in 1728 he went up to Pembroke College, Oxford. His studies at the university were, however, cut short by poverty, and in 1729 he returned to Lichfield, adversely affected by melancholy and depression.

After a brief period as a schoolmaster at Market Bosworth, Johnson moved to Birmingham, where he contributed articles (now lost) to the Birmingham

Journal. In 1735, he married Elizabeth Porter, a widow twenty-two years senior to him in age, and using her money attempted to start a school at Edial, near his home town. The school quickly failed, and in 1737 Johnson set off to London accompanied by one of his pupils, the actor David Garrick. Lack of a university degree hindered Johnson from pursuing a profession, and he determined to make his living by writing.

Edward Care, the founder of The Gentleman's Magazine, allowed him to contribute articles, and for many years, Johnson made his living by hack writing. His Parliamentary Debates were published in this magazine, and were widely accepted as authentic.

It was in 1738 that the publication of his poem London revealed his literary abilities. However, the project of compiling the Dictionary of the English Language, which was to occupy his next nine years, testifies to Johnson's concern to produce saleable material. Lacking a patron, he approached Lord Chesterfield with the plan. But the Lord gave him such a snub that brought out to light the decline of the patronage system.

In 1749, the poem The Vanity of Human Wishes was published and Johnson's play Irene was staged by David Garrick, who had much earlier accompanied him to London after the failure of his school in 1737. In 1750, Johnson began the twice-weekly periodical The Rambler to add to his income and also as a relief from the Dictionary work.

The death of his wife in 1752 returned Johnson to the melancholy and depression he had suffered after leaving Oxford. However, he continued to contribute to periodicals, and in 1755 the Dictionary of the English Language was published, bringing him wide acclaim which also included, by the intervention of friends, an honorary doctoral degree from Oxford. From 1758 onwards, he wrote the Idler essays for the Universal Chronicle, and in 1759 Rasselas was published. In 1762, a crown pension relieved some of the financial pressure, and the following year he met James Boswell, who was to become his biographer.

In 1765, Johnson's spirits were much lifted as he made the acquaintance of the Thrales, and over the next few years he spent much time at their home in Streatham. In 1765, his edition of Shakespeare, for which he wrote a special Preface appeared.

In 1777, Johnson began working on The Lives of the Poets, (1779-81), at the request of the booksellers. In 1784, estranged from his friend Mrs. Thrale by her remarriage, Johnson died in his home in Bolt Court.

Thus it is evident from this survey of the life and works of Samuel Johnson that genius ultimately triumphs. The child who was marred by ill health, grew up into a man of letters whom many years later Thomas Carlyle described as a new kind of hero who stood apart from the narrow confines of his time and had an essentially romantic awareness of the long sweep of cultural history. To Carlyle, Johnson was not the sum of the virtues of his time but the heroic redeemer of its faults. The decades that immediately succeeded Johnson's death in 1784 were to witness cataclysmic political and cultural changes in Europe. The Revolution of France in 1789 was to turn the world upside down. It was to bring about not only a series of radical reassessments of the British constitutional settlement of 1688, but, perhaps more significantly, a profound re-estimate of a rational world-order and of a culture which drew its inspiration from a perception of divine symmetry.

9.3 THE VANITY OF HUMAN WISHES (1749)

Samuel Johnson’s The Vanity of Human Wishes (1749) has been written in imitation of the tenth satire of Juvenal. But in Johnson’s poem Juvenal’s acerbic laughter is tempered by a Christian stoicism, seeking to deflate human pride and bring out the folly of human aspiration. Johnson’s interest in the moral art of biography is evident in his exploration of the examples of blind confidence challenged by time or destiny. Cardinal Wolsey falls from his “full blown dignity”; imagined aspirants to knowledge, longevity and beauty find themselves caught out by the inevitability of change and decay, and the once victorious Charles XII of Sweden meets defeat, exile, ignominy and an obscure death.

The poem's unrelenting exposition of the precariousness of secular hope as compared to a patient submission to the will of God is conveyed through an adjectival precision and a steadily reverberant rhythm.

The Vanity of Human Wishes begins with:

“Let Observation, with extensive view,
Survey mankind from China to Peru;
Remark each anxious toil, each eager strife,
And watch the busy scenes of crowded life;
Then say how hope and fear, desire and hate,
O’erspread with snares the clouded maze of fate,
Where wavering man, betray’d by venturous pride,
To tread the dreary paths without a guide”.

So the poem begins with a serious reflection in which Observation is asked to survey man from China to Peru, giving the poem a wide comprehensive sweep right from the start. The poem then focusses its attention on the “anxious toil”, “eager strife” and the “busy scenes of life”, and then highlights the abstract attributes of “hope”, “fear”, “desire” and “hate” and the clouded “maze of fate” afflicting the “wavering man”. But this perplexed man is himself betrayed by Pride and therefore tries to make his progress on the paths of life without a “guide”. This lack of a proper guide takes the reader to the very heart of the matter, for this “guide” has to be discovered as the poem unfolds itself.

The poem then goes on to expose other problems that Man creates for himself:

“How rarely Reason guides the stubborn choice
Rules the bold hand, or prompts the suppliant voice.....
But scarce observed, the knowing and the bold
Fall in the general massacre of gold....”

So in these lines, the poem reinforces the vanity of human wishes by stating very clearly that Man is stubborn with Reason guiding him only rarely. Man's “bold hand” and “suppliant voice” scarcely ever listen to Reason. The “general massacre of gold” tempts even the knowing and the bold people.

The poem next goes on to further highlight the fundamental human weaknesses by observing:

“Unnumber’d suppliants crowd Preferment’s gate,
A thirst for wealth, and burning to be great;
Delusive Fortune hears the incessant call;
They mount, they shine, evaporate, and fall,
On every stage the foes of peace attend,
Hate dogs their flight, and insult mocks their end”

The poem has now come out with a full exposure of the “anxious toil” and “eager strife” of Man mentioned in the opening lines. Numberless suppliants crowding for preferment and wealth, “burning to be great” with Fortune delusively only listening to the unending calls bring out the “anxious toil” of Man in great detail. Human beings are now described as mounting, shining and then evaporating and falling, crushed with defeat. The human aspirations are always facing the enemies of peace, with hatred and insult always creating problems. Human wishes indeed are vain.

But the poem ends not on a note of despair, but with a promise of hope after raising certain overwhelming questions:

“Where, then, shall Hope and Fear their objects find?
Must dull suspense corrupt the stagnant mind?
Must helpless man, in ignorance sedate,
Roll darkling down the torrent of his fate?”

Johnson has here raised his queries about the “human wishes”. He questions regarding the place where Hope and Fear will find their objects. He worries whether “dull suspense” will continue to contaminate the “stagnant mind”. He is genuinely concerned about the helpless Man, and he questions whether Man will just keep on rolling down the twists and turns of Fate.

But the answers to all such questions are given in the concluding lines of the poem:

“But leave to Heaven the measure and the choice.
Safe in His power, whose eyes discern afar
The secret ambush of a specious prayer,
Implore His aid, in His decisions rest,
Secure whate’er He gives, He gives the best....
Obedient passions, and a will resign’d,
For love, which scarce collective man can fill,
For patience, sovereign o’er transmuted ill;
For faith, that, panting for a happier seat,
Counts death kind Nature’s signal of retreat
These goods for man the laws of Heaven ordain,
These goods He grants, who grants the power to gain;
With these celestial wisdom calms the mind,
And makes the happiness she does not find.”

So the poem ends with Johnson imploring Man to leave the measure and the choice to Heaven itself. Man should feel safe by submitting himself to Divine power. The vanity of human wishes becomes clear in yet another way in which the poet advises the human beings to submit their wishes to the wishes of God. Man should only implore the help of God, rest content with “His decisions” and feel secure that whatever “He gives, He gives the best”. The human passions should be obedient and the human will should be resigned. Love should fill all humanity and patience should be held supreme, faith should pant for happiness, and Death should be accepted only as kind Nature’s signal of retreat. And all these positive virtues have actually been ordained by the laws of Heaven. God grants these positive virtues, and gives Man the power to achieve them. And together with these positive goods the Wisdom of Heaven calms the human mind and gives the happiness which Man has not yet been able to find anywhere else in the world.

Thus The Vanity of Human Wishes can be considered as a poem which begins with an exposure of how vain human wishes actually are. But the poem ends on a note of optimism and final submission to the Heaven. This patient submission to the will of God gives the final answers to all the overwhelming questions raised earlier in the poem. Hope and Fear ultimately find their objects. And dull suspense does not have any chance any more to corrupt the stagnant mind. Helpless Man in sedate ignorance does not have to roll darkling down the torrent of fate any more. He has only to submit to the Divine will with the positive goods like “love”, “patience” and “faith”: Calmness of mind will be given by “celestial wisdom”, and the human being will be blessed with a happiness, yet unknown.

9.4 LET US SUM UP

In this unit we have broadly surveyed the life and works of Samuel Johnson and then focussed our attention on his poem The Vanity of Human Wishes examining it as an exposition of the precariousness of secular hope as compared to the patient submission to the will of God. We have also observed that the poem concludes with the positive message that it is best to leave everything to Heaven and feel safe in His power. The human wishes (with all their subtle shades of “anxious toil”) are indeed vain. It is only the Divine will that ultimately matters.

Self-check Exercise I

- a) Samuel Johnson's studies at the University were cut short by poverty.
- b) The poem London published in 1738 revealed Johnson's literary abilities
- c) Thomas Carlyle described Samuel Johnson as a new kind of hero standing apart from the narrow confines of his time.

Self-check Exercise II

- a) In these lines, the poet projects the vanity of human wishes, by focusing his attention on Man who seems to be in a wavering condition, betrayed by his own pride. He makes his difficult journey without a guide.
- b) The poet here brings out the basic problem of the human being which is that he only rarely is guided by Reason in making his choice which becomes a stubborn one. Reason is not given the chance to rule Man's bold decision or his voice.
- c) These lines comment critically on the numberless people who crowd to get their personal promotions, forever thirsting for money and social prestige.
- d) The poet here raises certain overwhelming questions and asks where exactly will Hope and Fear find their objects, and must the stagnant mind continue to be corrupted by dull suspense.
- e) The message that comes here is optimistic, and the poet concludes his poem here by observing that Man should surrender everything to the will of Heaven and feel secure in the Divine power who sees everything everywhere.

10.0 OBJECTIVES

The aim of this unit is to analyze and explicate Thomas Gray's Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard in the biographical, historical and literary perspective. The unit will also discover how far Gray's Elegy reflects the first rumblings of Romanticism through the choices the poet makes regarding the selection and treatment of his theme in this poem.

10.1 INTRODUCTION

This unit will begin with providing some brief biographical information about Thomas Gray, paying special attention to the important poems he wrote during his literary career. And then the unit will come straight to examine Gray's Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard and bring out the special literary merits of the poem. The discussion of the poem will be based entirely on selected extracts from the poem, and an attempt will be made to see how far the Elegy reveals Romantic features which are later built on by William Wordsworth and other Romantic poets.

10.2 THOMAS GRAY (1716-71)

Thomas Gray, the sole survivor of twelve children, a man of poor physique himself, was born in Cornhill, London in 1716. His father, a scrivener, was mentally unbalanced, and Gray was brought up by his mother who sent him to Eton where he made friends with Horace Walpole. Gray went on to Peterhouse, Cambridge, and gained a high reputation for his Latin poetry, though he failed to take a degree.

In 1739, he embarked on a tour of the continent with Walpole, but in 1741 they quarreled, and Gray returned alone. He turned to the study of law and began writing a tragedy Agrippina which remained unfinished. The death of Richard West, a close friend from his Eton days in 1742 precipitated a period of poetic activity, and Gray's first publication was the Ode On a Distant Prospect of Eton College written in 1742 but published anonymously by Dodsley in 1747.

From 1742, Gray lived in Peterhouse and later Pembroke College, Cambridge, except for a period (1759-61) in London where he pursued his studies in the British Museum. Relations with Walpole were soon restored, and it was the death of Walpole's cat which inspired Gray to write the delightful mock-heroic poem Ode on the Death of a Favourite Cat (1748)

In 1742, Gray also started writing Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard while staying with his mother and aunt at their retirement home in Stoke Pages. The poem was carefully revised over a long period and was eventually published by Dodsley in 1751, achieving instant recognition as a masterpiece. It quickly went through fifteen editions and was often pirated.

With this poem, a great change appears, and many features make it historically very important. There is first the use of Nature which, though employed only as a background, is still handled with fidelity and sympathy. There is next the churchyard scene, the twilight atmosphere, and the brooding melancholy of the poem, which at once connects it with one side of the romantic movement – the development of the distinctive romantic mood. The contrast between the country and town – the peasant's "simple life" and the "madding crowds' ignoble strife" – is a third particular which should be noted. Finally, in the tender feeling shown for the "rude forefathers of the hamlet" and the sense of human values of the little things that are written in the short and simple annals of the poor we see poetry, under the influence of the spreading democratic spirit, reaching out to include humble aspects of life hitherto ignored. Thus despite the poet's continued use of the Augustan trick of personification and capital letters, the Elegy marks a stage in the evolution of Gray's poetic genius.

In 1761, Gray wrote a number of poems reflecting a mixture of bookish scholarship and romantic primitivism very characteristic of the period: The Fatal Sisters, The Descent of Odin (An Ode from the Norse tongue), The Triumphs of Owen (A Fragment from the Welsh) were all published in 1768 in Dodsley's collected edition of his works: Poems by Mr. Gray. These poems were filled with a new conception of the poet as an inspired singer rather than an accomplished artist – in the terms of the eighteenth century antithesis, an "enthusiast" rather than a 'wit'.

In 1768 Gray was appointed Professor of Modern History at Cambridge, though he never delivered a lecture.

In 1769 he travelled to the Lake District and his Journal published posthumously in 1775 relates his reactions to the sublime scenery. His Letters reveal a profoundly learned but witty and entertaining personality.

Thus Thomas Gray can be rightly considered as a scholar who produced little but precious little English poetry. What he wrote was not only exquisite in quality and finish but also curiously interesting as a kind of epitome of the changes which were coming over English literature of his time. He began with versified pamphlets in Pope's manner, passed on through conventional lyrics to the Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard and ended with experiments which were fundamentally romantic in character.

It will be apt to conclude this part of the unit with Gray's brief prose epitaph for his mother's tomb in Stoke Pages Churchyard in which he noted that she was "the tender careful mother of many children: one of whom had the misfortune to survive her". It is a typically self-pitying comment, one accentuated by the fact that when Thomas Gray died in 1771 and was himself buried in the same tomb no further reference was made to him on the stone. In sharp contrast, the monument later erected to his memory in Westminster Abbey, immediately under that to Milton, bore a more assertive quatrain by his friend William Mason (1725-97):

"No more the Grecian Muse unrivall'd reigns,
To Britain let the Nations homage pay;
She felt a Homer's fire in Milton's strains,
A Pindar's rapture from the Lyre of Gray"

10.3 ELEGY WRITTEN IN A COUNTRY CHURCHYARD (1751)

Thomas Gray's Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard has been considered as the most enduringly famous, fluent and diversified of all 'graveyard' poems. And the term Elegy, as you already know, has been defined as any poetic meditation on the death of an individual or upon death itself. Gray's Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard broadly meditates on the obscure destinies of the unknown and undistinguished villagers buried in the country churchyard and culminates in the celebrated comment on unfulfilled greatness; "village Hampdens, "mute inglorious Miltons and "guileless Cromwells", who have in the village had both their talents and their potentials confined by a lack of opportunity.

But Gray is not making a political protest on behalf of the meek or the downtrodden. He is merely siding with the passive placidity of rural rhythm and rustic verse. The poetry of sophistication complements the unsophisticated rhymes on the grave-stones. The Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard intermixes the poetry of country retirement with a self-reflective nocturnal musing on the egalitarian nature of mortality.

The unnamed "hoary headed swain" at the end of the poem becomes a memorializer of an inconspicuous bard. He speaks not in "uncouth rhymes", but in the smooth closing quatrains which form an epitaph, and renders the melancholy poet one with the dead villagers. So the Elegy finally focuses on a solitary poet, a man of "humble birth" and a stranger to "national glory, to fortune, and to fame,"

Now let us look more closely at the poem itself. The Elegy begins with a quatrain that sums up the very mood and thematic content of the whole poem:

"The curfew tolls the knell of parting day,
The lowing herd wind slowly o'er the lea,
The ploughman homeward plods his weary way,
And leaves the world to darkness and to me"

The curfew mournfully tolling the end of a day, the lowing herd winding slowly over the lea, the tired ploughman plodding his way home – all go to build up a dark and dismal mood that artistically prepares one for the dark thoughts about to come in the Elegy. And when the world is left over to darkness, the poet mentions himself in identification with this natural scene of a dusk being overtaken by the darkness of the night. The poet has introduced himself right in the very opening quatrain as a part of the natural landscape. Such an identification between the poet and the natural landscape is later to emerge in the Romanticism of William Wordsworth.

The Elegy Written in a country Churchyard next goes on to the Churchyard itself:

"Beneath those rugged elms, that few tree's shade,
Where heaves the turf in many a mouldering heap,
Each in his narrow cell for ever laid
The rude Forefathers of the hamlet sleep".

The hamlet's churchyard is described as one with objects of Nature significantly pointed out. "The rugged elms", and the "yew tree" provide the necessary shade, and the churchyard has near it the mouldering "heap of turf". The rude ancestors of the village have been buried in this simple churchyard hemmed in with various objects of Nature. The forefathers are described respectfully as sleeping in their narrow cells.

But the Elegy soon switches over to the active Past of these "sleeping Forefathers" when it asserts:

"Oft did the harvest to their sickle yield,
Their furrows oft the stubborn glebe has broke
How jocund did they drive their team afield!
How bow'd the woods beneath their sturdy stroke!"

The poet makes the readers aware of the pleasant lives of these peasants whose Past had been made up of energetic activities. Their sickles had yielded so many harvests, their furrows had often broken the stubborn earth, the woods had surrendered so easily to their powerful strokes and how happy they had been moving over with their teams in the fields.

In the next quatrain, the poet champions the cause of these once active peasants by observing:

"Let not Ambition mock their useful toil,
Their homely joys, and destinies obscure
Nor Grandeur bear with a disdainful smile
The short and simple annals of the Poor"

The poet wants that ambitious people should not mock at the useful actions the farmers had performed as well as at their homely pleasures and obscure destinies. Grandeur must not disdainfully smile at the short and simple stories of these poor people. So the Elegy now begins to talk about the unknown and unsung heroes of the village:

"Perhaps in this neglected spot is laid
Some heart once pregnant with celestial fire
Hands that the rod of empire might have sway'd
Or waked to ecstasy the living lyre
But Knowledge to their eyes her ample page
Rich with the spoils of time, did ne'er unroll
Child Penury repress'd their noble rage
And froze the genial current of the soul"

Here the poet brings out these "rude Forefathers" as people who could have achieved a lot had they been given the opportunity. Poverty stifled the flowering of these geniuses, and so the poet laments that perhaps in this very neglected spot is buried a person who could have achieved greatness had he been given the chance to get knowledge.

So in the country churchyard are buried simple villagers who could have become great had they been given the chance. These sleeping "rude Forefathers" might have been great only if they had been given the opportunity.

And the poem ends with the poet identifying once again with the village scene, as he had done much earlier in the opening quatrain. Now the poem observes:

“Haply some hoary-headed swain may say
Oft have we seen him at the peep of dawn
Breathing with hasty steps the dews away
To meet the sun upon the upland lawn
One morn I miss’d him on the custom’d hill
Along the heath, and near his favourite tree”

The curfew tolling the end of the parting day of the opening quatrain of the Elegy has now been replaced by the “peep of dawn”, and the “hoary headed swain” mentions the poet being seen at the “peep of dawn”, “breathing with hasty steps” to “meet the sun upon the upland lawn”. The earlier dusk has been replaced by dawn now, but the reference to the mourning continues when the hoary headed swain laments:

“The next with dirge, due in sad array
Slow through the church-way path we saw him borne
Approach and read (for thou canst read) the lay
Graved on the stone beneath yon aged thorn”.

The poet now imagines himself as having become a part and parcel of the same churchyard when he projects the swain reporting on ‘the poet’ as dying and being carried with a funeral song through the same country churchyard. The Elegy ends with an Epitaph that artistically sums up the entire mood and thematic pattern of the whole poem:

“Here rests his head upon the lap of Earth
A Youth, to Fortune and to Fame unknown
Fair Science frown’d not on his humble birth
And Melancholy mark’d him for his own.”

This Epitaph sums up the Elegy and shows the poet himself imagining as having come near the “rude Forefathers” he had been referring to in the earlier part of the poem. This “poet” in the Epitaph is unknown to Fortune and Fame, is of humble birth and is marked for Melancholy. The poet here imagines himself as having becomes one with the other humble people sleeping in the narrow cells of the country churchyard.

So, Gray’s Elegy Written ina Country Churchyard does prove to be a literary masterpiece.

10.4 LET US SUM UP

In this unit we have observed closely Gray's Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard in the biographical and sociological context of the poet. We have also seen that although Gray wrote very few poems, his poetry carries significant seeds of the changes that were taking place in the literary scene. Our study has also revealed that Gray's Elegy comes out with distinctive Romantic features that were later developed still further by the other Romantic poets like William Wordsworth.

10.6 ANSWERS TO SELF-CHECK EXERCISES

Self-check Exercise I

- a) Thomas Gray's first publication was Ode on a Distant Prospect of Eton College.
- b) The mock-heroic poem written by Thomas Gray inspired by the death of Walpole's cat was Ode on the Death of a Favourite Cat.
- c) Gray's Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard marked a great change in English poetry because Nature here is handled with fidelity and sympathy, and the churchyard scene connects it with one side of the romantic movement creating a distinctly romantic mood.

Self-check Exercise II

- a) These lines are dramatically significant because they set the basic thematic tone of the poem. The dark mood comes when the exhausted peasants are described as plodding their way homeward, leaving the natural scene of dusk to darkness and to the poet. The poet projects himself as identifying himself with the entire natural scene
- b) These lines bring out the past hectic attributes of the village poor who have been earlier described in the poem as sleeping and buried in the churchyard. In their Past days those peasants had often made their sickles yield innumerable harvests and had struck deeply into the stubborn earth to pave their own way towards success.

- c) In these lines, the poet challengingly tells ambitious people not to mock at the useful labour of these village poor. The domestic moments of happiness and the unknown lives of the rural poor should not be laughed at but sympathized with. These lines bring out the poet as championing the cause of the poor.
- d) These lines suggest that the village poor did not get the opportunity to be properly educated, and so wealth never came their way. These people did not get the chance, although they did possess the talent.
- e) These lines are very important because here the poet imagines himself as having become one with the village people buried in the churchyard. Like the other “rude Forefathers” of the hamlet sleeping in the cells, the poet projects himself as a youth unknown to Fame and Fortune. The poet imagines himself as having finally identified himself with the natural scene of the country churchyard.

APPENDIX: TEXTS OF POEMS

Mac Flecknoe

BY JOHN DRYDEN

A Satire upon the True-blue Protestant Poet T.S.

All human things are subject to decay,
And, when Fate summons, monarchs must obey:
This Flecknoe found, who, like Augustus, young
Was call'd to empire, and had govern'd long:
In prose and verse, was own'd, without dispute
Through all the realms of Non-sense, absolute.
This aged prince now flourishing in peace,
And blest with issue of a large increase,
Worn out with business, did at length debate
To settle the succession of the State:
And pond'ring which of all his sons was fit
To reign, and wage immortal war with wit;
Cry'd, 'tis resolv'd; for nature pleads that he Should only rule, who most resembles me:
Shadwell alone my perfect image bears,
Mature in dullness from his tender years.
Shadwell alone, of all my sons, is he
Who stands confirm'd in full stupidity.
The rest to some faint meaning make pretence,
But Shadwell never deviates into sense.
Some beams of wit on other souls may fall,
Strike through and make a lucid interval;
But Shadwell's genuine night admits no ray,
His rising fogs prevail upon the day:
Besides his goodly fabric fills the eye,
And seems design'd for thoughtless majesty:
Thoughtless as monarch oaks, that shade the plain,
And, spread in solemn state, supinely reign.
Heywood and Shirley were but types of thee,
Thou last great prophet of tautology:
Even I, a dunce of more renown than they,
Was sent before but to prepare thy way;
And coarsely clad in Norwich druggot came
To teach the nations in thy greater name.
My warbling lute, the lute I whilom strung
When to King John of Portugal I sung,
Was but the prelude to that glorious day,
When thou on silver Thames did'st cut thy way,
With well tim'd oars before the royal barge,
Swell'd with the pride of thy celestial charge;
And big with hymn, commander of an host,
The like was ne'er in Epsom blankets toss'd.
Methinks I see the new Arion sail,
The lute still trembling underneath thy nail.

At thy well sharpen'd thumb from shore to shore
 The treble squeaks for fear, the basses roar:
 Echoes from Pissing-Alley, Shadwell call,
 And Shadwell they resound from Aston Hall.
 About thy boat the little fishes throng,
 As at the morning toast, that floats along.
 Sometimes as prince of thy harmonious band
 Thou wield'st thy papers in thy threshing hand.
 St. Andre's feet ne'er kept more equal time,
 Not ev'n the feet of thy own Psyche's rhyme:
 Though they in number as in sense excel;
 So just, so like tautology they fell,
 That, pale with envy, Singleton forswore
 The lute and sword which he in triumph bore
 And vow'd he ne'er would act Villerius more.
 Here stopt the good old sire; and wept for joy
 In silent raptures of the hopeful boy.
 All arguments, but most his plays, persuade,
 That for anointed dullness he was made.

Close to the walls which fair Augusta bind,
 (The fair Augusta much to fears inclin'd)
 An ancient fabric, rais'd to inform the sight,
 There stood of yore, and Barbican it hight:
 A watch tower once; but now, so fate ordains,
 Of all the pile an empty name remains.
 From its old ruins brothel-houses rise,
 Scenes of lewd loves, and of polluted joys.
 Where their vast courts, the mother-strumpets keep,
 And, undisturb'd by watch, in silence sleep.
 Near these a nursery erects its head,
 Where queens are form'd, and future heroes bred;
 Where unfledg'd actors learn to laugh and cry,
 Where infant punks their tender voices try,
 And little Maximins the gods defy.
 Great Fletcher never treads in buskins here,
 Nor greater Jonson dares in socks appear;
 But gentle Simkin just reception finds
 Amidst this monument of vanish'd minds:
 Pure clinches, the suburban muse affords;
 And Panton waging harmless war with words.
 Here Flecknoe, as a place to fame well known,
 Ambitiously design'd his Shadwell's throne.
 For ancient Decker prophesied long since,
 That in this pile should reign a mighty prince,
 Born for a scourge of wit, and flail of sense:
 To whom true dullness should some Psyches owe,
 But worlds of Misers from his pen should flow;
 Humorists and hypocrites it should produce,
 Whole Raymond families, and tribes of Bruce.

Now Empress Fame had publisht the renown,
 Of Shadwell's coronation through the town.
 Rous'd by report of fame, the nations meet,
 From near Bun-Hill, and distant Watling-street.
 No Persian carpets spread th'imperial way,
 But scatter'd limbs of mangled poets lay:
 From dusty shops neglected authors come,
 Martyrs of pies, and reliques of the bum.
 Much Heywood, Shirley, Ogleby there lay,
 But loads of Shadwell almost chok'd the way.
 Bilk'd stationers for yeoman stood prepar'd,
 And Herringman was Captain of the Guard.
 The hoary prince in majesty appear'd,
 High on a throne of his ownlaboursrear'd.
 At his right hand our young Ascanius sat
 Rome's other hope, and pillar of the state.
 His brows thick fogs, instead of glories, grace,
 And lambent dullness play'd around his face.
 As Hannibal did to the altars come,
 Sworn by his sire a mortal foe to Rome;
 So Shadwell swore, nor should his vow be vain,
 That he till death true dullness would maintain;
 And in his father's right, and realm's defence,
 Ne'er to have peace with wit, nor truce with sense.
 The king himself the sacred unction made,
 As king by office, and as priest by trade:
 In his sinister hand, instead of ball,
 He plac'd a mighty mug of potent ale;
 Love's kingdom to his right he did convey,
 At once his sceptre and his rule of sway;
 Whose righteous lore the prince had practis'd young,
 And from whose loins recorded Psyche sprung,
 His temples last with poppies were o'er spread,
 That nodding seem'd to consecrate his head:
 Just at that point of time, if fame not lie,
 On his left hand twelve reverend owls did fly.
 So Romulus, 'tis sung, by Tiber's brook,
 Presage of sway from twice six vultures took.
 Th'admiring throng loud acclamations make,
 And omens of his future empire take.
 The sire then shook the honours of his head,
 And from his brows damps of oblivion shed
 Full on the filial dullness: long he stood,
 Repelling from his breast the raging god;
 At length burst out in this prophetic mood:

Heavens bless my son, from Ireland let him reign
 To far Barbadoes on the Western main;
 Of his dominion may no end be known,
 And greater than his father's be his throne.
 Beyond love's kingdom let him stretch his pen;

He paus'd, and all the people cry'd Amen.
 Then thus, continu'd he, my son advance
 Still in new impudence, new ignorance.
 Success let other teach, learn thou from me
 Pangs without birth, and fruitless industry.
 Let Virtuosos in five years be writ;
 Yet not one thought accuse thy toil of wit.
 Let gentle George in triumph tread the stage,
 Make Dorimant betray, and Loveit rage;
 Let Cully, Cockwood, Fopling, charm the pit,
 And in their folly show the writer's wit.
 Yet still thy fools shall stand in thy defence,
 And justify their author's want of sense.
 Let 'em be all by thy own model made
 Of dullness, and desire no foreign aid:
 That they to future ages may be known,
 Not copies drawn, but issue of thy own.
 Nay let thy men of wit too be the same,
 All full of thee, and differing but in name;
 But let no alien Sedley interpose
 To lard with wit thy hungry Epsom prose.
 And when false flowers of rhetoric thou would'st cull,
 Trust Nature, do not labour to be dull;
 But write thy best, and top; and in each line,
 Sir Formal's oratory will be thine.
 Sir Formal, though unsought, attends thy quill,
 And does thy Northern Dedications fill.
 Nor let false friends seduce thy mind to fame,
 By arrogating Jonson's hostile name.
 Let Father Flecknoe fire thy mind with praise,
 And Uncle Ogleby thy envy raise.
 Thou art my blood, where Jonson has no part;
 What share have we in Nature or in Art?
 Where did his wit on learning fix a brand,
 And rail at arts he did not understand?
 Where made he love in Prince Nicander's vein,
 Or swept the dust in Psyche's humble strain?
 Where sold he bargains, whip-stitch, kiss my arse,
 Promis'd a play and dwindled to a farce?
 When did his muse from Fletcher scenes purloin,
 As thou whole Eth'ridge dost transfuse to thine?
 But so transfus'd as oil on waters flow,
 His always floats above, thine sinks below.
 This is thy province, this thy wondrous way,
 New humours to invent for each new play:
 This is that boasted bias of thy mind,
 By which one way, to dullness, 'tis inclin'd,
 Which makes thy writings lean on one side still,
 And in all changes that way bends thy will.
 Nor let thy mountain belly make pretence
 Of likeness; thine's a tympany of sense.

A tun of man in thy large bulk is writ,
But sure thou 'rt but a kilderkin of wit.
Like mine thy gentle numbers feebly creep,
Thy Tragic Muse gives smiles, thy Comic sleep.
With whate'er gall thou sett'st thy self to write,
Thy inoffensive satires never bite.
In thy felonious heart, though venom lies,
It does but touch thy Irish pen, and dies.
Thy genius calls thee not to purchase fame
In keen iambics, but mild anagram:
Leave writing plays, and choose for thy command
Some peaceful province in acrostic land.
There thou may'st wings display and altars raise,
And torture one poor word ten thousand ways.
Or if thou would'st thy diff'rent talents suit,
Set thy own songs, and sing them to thy lute.
He said, but his last words were scarcely heard,
For Bruce and Longvil had a trap prepar'd,
And down they sent the yet declaiming bard.
Sinking he left his drugget robe behind,
Born upwards by a subterranean wind.
The mantle fell to the young prophet's part,
With double portion of his father's art.

An Essay on Man: Epistle I

BY ALEXANDER POPE

To Henry St. John, Lord Bolingbroke

Awake, my St. John! leave all meaner things
To low ambition, and the pride of kings.
Let us (since life can little more supply
Than just to look about us and to die)
Expatiate free o'er all this scene of man;
A mighty maze! but not without a plan;
A wild, where weeds and flow'rs promiscuous shoot;
Or garden, tempting with forbidden fruit.
Together let us beat this ample field,
Try what the open, what the covert yield;
The latent tracts, the giddy heights explore
Of all who blindly creep, or sightless soar;
Eye Nature's walks, shoot folly as it flies,
And catch the manners living as they rise;
Laugh where we must, be candid where we can;
But vindicate the ways of God to man.

I.

Say first, of God above, or man below,
What can we reason, but from what we know?
Of man what see we, but his station here,
From which to reason, or to which refer?
Through worlds unnumber'd though the God be known,
'Tis ours to trace him only in our own.
He, who through vast immensity can pierce,
See worlds on worlds compose one universe,
Observe how system into system runs,
What other planets circle other suns,
What varied being peoples ev'ry star,
May tell why Heav'n has made us as we are.
But of this frame the bearings, and the ties,
The strong connections, nice dependencies,
Gradations just, has thy pervading soul
Look'd through? or can a part contain the whole?

Is the great chain, that draws all to agree,
And drawn supports, upheld by God, or thee?

II.

Presumptuous man! the reason wouldst thou find,
Why form'd so weak, so little, and so blind?
First, if thou canst, the harder reason guess,
Why form'd no weaker, blinder, and no less!
Ask of thy mother earth, why oaks are made
Taller or stronger than the weeds they shade?
Or ask of yonder argent fields above,
Why Jove's satellites are less than Jove?

Of systems possible, if 'tis confest
That Wisdom infinite must form the best,
Where all must full or not coherent be,
And all that rises, rise in due degree;
Then, in the scale of reas'ning life, 'tis plain
There must be somewhere, such a rank as man:
And all the question (wrangle e'er so long)
Is only this, if God has plac'd him wrong?

Respecting man, whatever wrong we call,
May, must be right, as relative to all.
In human works, though labour'd on with pain,
A thousand movements scarce one purpose gain;
In God's, one single can its end produce;
Yet serves to second too some other use.
So man, who here seems principal alone,
Perhaps acts second to some sphere unknown,
Touches some wheel, or verges to some goal;
'Tis but a part we see, and not a whole.

When the proud steed shall know why man restrains
His fiery course, or drives him o'er the plains:
When the dull ox, why now he breaks the clod,
Is now a victim, and now Egypt's God:
Then shall man's pride and dulness comprehend
His actions', passions', being's, use and end;
Why doing, suff'ring, check'd, impell'd; and why
This hour a slave, the next a deity.

Then say not man's imperfect, Heav'n in fault;
Say rather, man's as perfect as he ought:
His knowledge measur'd to his state and place,
His time a moment, and a point his space.
If to be perfect in a certain sphere,
What matter, soon or late, or here or there?
The blest today is as completely so,
As who began a thousand years ago.

III.

Heav'n from all creatures hides the book of fate,
All but the page prescrib'd, their present state:
From brutes what men, from men what spirits know:
Or who could suffer being here below?
The lamb thy riot dooms to bleed today,
Had he thy reason, would he skip and play?
Pleas'd to the last, he crops the flow'ry food,
And licks the hand just rais'd to shed his blood.
Oh blindness to the future! kindlygiv'n,
That each may fill the circle mark'd by Heav'n:
Who sees with equal eye, as God of all,

A hero perish, or a sparrow fall,
 Atoms or systems into ruin hurl'd,
 And now a bubble burst, and now a world.

Hope humbly then; with trembling pinions soar;
 Wait the great teacher Death; and God adore!
 What future bliss, he gives not thee to know,
 But gives that hope to be thy blessing now.
 Hope springs eternal in the human breast:
 Man never is, but always to be blest:
 The soul, uneasy and confin'd from home,
 Rests and expatiates in a life to come.

Lo! the poor Indian, whose untutor'd mind
 Sees God in clouds, or hears him in the wind;
 His soul, proud science never taught to stray
 Far as the solar walk, or milky way;
 Yet simple nature to his hope has giv'n,
 Behind the cloud-topt hill, an humbler heav'n;
 Some safer world in depth of woods embrac'd,
 Some happier island in the wat'ry waste,
 Where slaves once more their native land behold,
 No fiends torment, no Christians thirst for gold.
 To be, contents his natural desire,
 He asks no angel's wing, no seraph's fire;
 But thinks, admitted to that equal sky,
 His faithful dog shall bear him company.

IV.

Go, wiser thou! and, in thy scale of sense
 Weigh thy opinion against Providence;
 Call imperfection what thou fanciest such,
 Say, here he gives too little, there too much:
 Destroy all creatures for thy sport or gust,
 Yet cry, if man's unhappy, God's unjust;
 If man alone engross not Heav'n's high care,
 Alone made perfect here, immortal there:
 Snatch from his hand the balance and the rod,
 Rejudge his justice, be the God of God.

In pride, in reas'ning pride, our error lies;
 All quit their sphere, and rush into the skies.
 Pride still is aiming at the blest abodes,
 Men would be angels, angels would be gods.
 Aspiring to be gods, if angels fell,
 Aspiring to be angels, men rebel:
 And who but wishes to invert the laws
 Of order, sins against th' Eternal Cause.

V.

Ask for what end the heav'nlybodies shine,
 Earth for whose use? Pride answers, " 'Tis for mine:

For me kind Nature wakes her genial pow'r,
 Suckles each herb, and spreads out ev'ryflow'r;
 Annual for me, the grape, the rose renew,
 The juice nectareous, and the balmy dew;
 For me, the mine a thousand treasures brings;
 For me, health gushes from a thousand springs;
 Seas roll to waft me, suns to light me rise;
 My foot-stool earth, my canopy the skies."

But errs not Nature from this gracious end,
 From burning suns when livid deaths descend,
 When earthquakes swallow, or when tempests sweep
 Towns to one grave, whole nations to the deep?
 "No, ('tis replied) the first Almighty Cause
 Acts not by partial, but by gen'ral laws;
 Th' exceptions few; some change since all began:
 And what created perfect?"—Why then man?
 If the great end be human happiness,
 Then Nature deviates; and can man do less?
 As much that end a constant course requires
 Of show'rs and sunshine, as of man's desires;
 As much eternal springs and cloudless skies,
 As men for ever temp'rate, calm, and wise.
 If plagues or earthquakes break not Heav'n's design,
 Why then a Borgia, or a Catiline?
 Who knows but he, whose hand the lightning forms,
 Who heaves old ocean, and who wings the storms,
 Pours fierce ambition in a Cæsar's mind,
 Or turns young Ammon loose to scourge mankind?
 From pride, from pride, our very reas'ning springs;
 Account for moral, as for nat'ral things:
 Why charge we Heav'n in those, in these acquit?
 In both, to reason right is to submit.

Better for us, perhaps, it might appear,
 Were there all harmony, all virtue here;
 That never air or ocean felt the wind;
 That never passion discompos'd the mind.
 But ALL subsists by elemental strife;
 And passions are the elements of life.
 The gen'ral order, since the whole began,
 Is kept in nature, and is kept in man.

VI.

What would this man? Now upward will he soar,
 And little less than angel, would be more;
 Now looking downwards, just as griev'd appears
 To want the strength of bulls, the fur of bears.
 Made for his use all creatures if he call,
 Say what their use, had he the pow'rs of all?
 Nature to these, without profusion, kind,

The proper organs, proper pow'rs assign'd;
 Each seeming want compensated of course,
 Here with degrees of swiftness, there of force;
 All in exact proportion to the state;
 Nothing to add, and nothing to abate.
 Each beast, each insect, happy in its own:
 Is Heav'n unkind to man, and man alone?
 Shall he alone, whom rational we call,
 Be pleas'd with nothing, if not bless'd with all?

The bliss of man (could pride that blessing find)
 Is not to act or think beyond mankind;
 No pow'rs of body or of soul to share,
 But what his nature and his state can bear.
 Why has not man a microscopic eye?
 For this plain reason, man is not a fly.
 Say what the use, were finer optics giv'n,
 T' inspect a mite, not comprehend the heav'n?
 Or touch, if tremblingly alive all o'er,
 To smart and agonize at ev'ry pore?
 Or quick effluvia darting through the brain,
 Die of a rose in aromatic pain?
 If nature thunder'd in his op'ning ears,
 And stunn'd him with the music of the spheres,
 How would he wish that Heav'n had left him still
 The whisp'ring zephyr, and the purling rill?
 Who finds not Providence all good and wise,
 Alike in what it gives, and what denies?

VII.

Far as creation's ample range extends,
 The scale of sensual, mental pow'rs ascends:
 Mark how it mounts, to man's imperial race,
 From the green myriads in the peopled grass:
 What modes of sight betwixt each wide extreme,
 The mole's dim curtain, and the lynx's beam:
 Of smell, the headlong lioness between,
 And hound sagacious on the tainted green:
 Of hearing, from the life that fills the flood,
 To that which warbles through the vernal wood:
 The spider's touch, how exquisitely fine!
 Feels at each thread, and lives along the line:
 In the nice bee, what sense so subtly true
 From pois'nous herbs extracts the healing dew:
 How instinct varies in the grov'ling swine,
 Compar'd, half-reas'ning elephant, with thine:
 'Twixt that, and reason, what a nice barrier;
 For ever sep'rate, yet for ever near!
 Remembrance and reflection how allied;
 What thin partitions sense from thought divide:
 And middle natures, how they long to join,

Yet never pass th' insuperable line!
Without this just gradation, could they be Subjected, these to those, or all to thee?
The pow'rs of all subdu'd by thee alone,
Is not thy reason all these pow'rs in one?

VIII.

See, through this air, this ocean, and this earth,
All matter quick, and bursting into birth.
Above, how high, progressive life may go!
Around, how wide! how deep extend below!
Vast chain of being, which from God began,
Natures ethereal, human, angel, man,
Beast, bird, fish, insect! what no eye can see,
No glass can reach! from infinite to thee,
From thee to nothing!—On superior pow'rs
Were we to press, inferior might on ours:
Or in the full creation leave a void,
Where, one step broken, the great scale's destroy'd:
From nature's chain whatever link you strike,
Tenth or ten thousandth, breaks the chain alike.

And, if each system in gradation roll
Alike essential to th' amazing whole,
The least confusion but in one, not all
That system only, but the whole must fall.
Let earth unbalanc'd from her orbit fly,
Planets and suns run lawless through the sky;
Let ruling angels from their spheres be hurl'd,
Being on being wreck'd, and world on world;
Heav'n's whole foundations to their centre nod,
And nature tremble to the throne of God.
All this dread order break—for whom? for thee?
Vile worm!—Oh madness, pride, impiety!

IX.

What if the foot ordain'd the dust to tread,
Or hand to toil, aspir'd to be the head?
What if the head, the eye, or ear repin'd
To serve mere engines to the ruling mind?
Just as absurd for any part to claim
To be another, in this gen'ral frame:
Just as absurd, to mourn the tasks or pains,
The great directing Mind of All ordains.

All are but parts of one stupendous whole,
Whose body Nature is, and God the soul;
That, chang'd through all, and yet in all the same,
Great in the earth, as in th' ethereal frame,
Warms in the sun, refreshes in the breeze,
Glow in the stars, and blossoms in the trees,

Lives through all life, extends through all extent,
 Spreads undivided, operates unspent,
 Breathes in our soul, informs our mortal part,
 As full, as perfect, in a hair as heart;
 As full, as perfect, in vile man that mourns,
 As the rapt seraph that adores and burns;
 To him no high, no low, no great, no small;
 He fills, he bounds, connects, and equals all.

X.

Of blindness, weakness, Heav'n bestows on thee.
 Submit.—In this, or any other sphere,
 Secure to be as blest as thou canst bear:
 Safe in the hand of one disposing pow'r,
 Or in the natal, or the mortal hour.
 All nature is but art, unknown to thee;
 All chance, direction, which thou canst not see;
 All discord, harmony, not understood;
 All partial evil, universal good:
 And, spite of pride, in erring reason's spite,
 One truth is clear, Whatever is, is right.

THE VANITY OF HUMAN WISHES

The Tenth Satire of Juvenal,
IMITATED By SAMUEL JOHNSON

Let Observation with extensive View,
Survey Mankind, from China to Peru;
Remark each anxious Toil, each eager Strife,
And watch the busy Scenes of crouded Life;
Then say how Hope and Fear, Desire and Hate,
O'er spread with Snares the clouded Maze of Fate,
Where wav'ring Man, betray'd by vent'rous Pride,
To tread the dreary Paths without a Guide;
As treach'rous Phantoms in the Mist delude,
Shuns fancied Ills, or chases airy Good.
How rarely Reason guides the stubborn Choice,
Rules the bold Hand, or prompts the suppliant Voice,
How Nations sink, by darling Schemes oppres'd,
When Vengeance listens to the Fool's Request.
Fate wings with ev'ry Wish th' afflictive Dart,
Each Gift of Nature, and each Grace of Art,
With fatal Heat impetuous Courage glows,
With fatal Sweetness Elocution flows,
Impeachment stops the Speaker's pow'rful Breath,
And restless Fire precipitates on Death.

But scarce observ'd the Knowing and the Bold,
Fall in the gen'ral Massacre of Gold;
Wide-wasting Pest! that rages unconfin'd,
And crowds with Crimes the Records of Mankind,
For Gold his Sword the Hireling Ruffian draws,
For Gold the hireling Judge distorts the Laws;
Wealth heap'd on Wealth, nor Truth nor Safety buys,
The Dangers gather as the Treasures rise.

Let Hist'ry tell where rival Kings command,
And dubious Title shakes the madded Land,
When Statutes glean the Refuse of the Sword,
How much more safe the Vassal than the Lord,
Low sculks the Hind beneath the Rage of Pow'r,
And leaves the bonny Traytor in the Tow'r,
Untouch'd his Cottage, and his Slumbers sound,
Tho' Confiscation's Vulturs clang around.

The needy Traveller, serene and gay,
Walks the wild Heath, and sings his Toil away.
Does Envy seize thee? crush th' upbraiding Joy,
Encrease his Riches and his Peace destroy,
New Fears in dire Vicissitude invade,
The rustling Brake alarms, and quiv'ring Shade,

Nor Light nor Darkness bring his Pain Relief,
One shews the Plunder, and one hides the Thief.

Yet still the gen'ral Cry the Skies assails
And Gain and Grandeur load the tainted Gales;
Few know the toiling Statesman's Fear or Care,
Th' insidious Rival and the gaping Heir.

Once more, Democritus, arise on Earth,
With chearful Wisdom and instructive Mirth,
See motley Life in modern Trappings dress'd,
And feed with varied Fools th' eternal Jest:
Thou who couldst laugh where Want enchain'd Caprice,
Toil crush'd Conceit, and Man was of a Piece;
Where Wealth unlov'd without a Mourner dy'd;
And scarce a Sycophant was fed by Pride;
Where ne'er was known the Form of mock Debate,
Or seen a new-made Mayor's unwieldy State;
Where change of Fav'rites made no Change of Laws,
And Senates heard before they judg'd a Cause;
How wouldst thou shake at Britain's modish Tribe,
Dart the quick Taunt, and edge the piercing Gibe?
Attentive Truth and Nature to descry,
And pierce each Scene with Philosophic Eye.
To thee were solemn Toys or empty Shew,
The Robes of Pleasure and the Veils of Woe:
All aid the Farce, and all thy Mirth maintain,
Whose Joys are causeless, or whose Grievs are vain.

Such was the Scorn that fill'd the Sage's Mind,
Renew'd at ev'ry Glance on Humankind;
How just that Scorn ere yet thy Voice declare,
Search every State, and canvass ev'ry Pray'r.

Unnumber'd Suppliants croud Preferment's Gate,
Athirst for Wealth, and burning to be great;
Delusive Fortune hears th' incessant Call,
They mount, they shine, evaporate, and fall.
On ev'ry Stage the Foes of Peace attend,
Hate dogs their Flight, and Insult mocks their End.
Love ends with Hope, the sinking Statesman's Door
Pours in the Morning Worshiper no more;
For growing Names the weekly Scribbler lies,
To growing Wealth the Dedicator flies,
From every Room descends the painted Face,
That hung the bright Palladium of the Place,
And smoak'd in Kitchens, or in Auctions sold,
To better Features yields the Frame of Gold;
For now no more we trace in ev'ry Line
Heroic Worth, Benevolence Divine:
The Form distorted justifies the Fall,
And Detestation rids th' indignant Wall.

But will not Britain hear the last Appeal,
 Sign her Foes Doom, or guard her Fav'rites Zeal;
 Through Freedom's Sons no more Remonstrance rings,
 Degrading Nobles and controuling Kings;
 Our supple Tribes repress their Patriot Throats,
 And ask no Questions but the Price of Votes;
 With Weekly Libels and Septennial Ale,
 Their Wish is full to riot and to rail.

In full-blown Dignity, see Wolsey stand,
 Law in his Voice, and Fortune in his Hand:
 To him the Church, the Realm, their Pow'rs consign,
 Thro' him the Rays of regal Bounty shine,
 Turn'd by his Nod the Stream of Honour flows,
 His Smile alone Security bestows:
 Still to new Heights his restless Wishes tow'r,
 Claim leads to Claim, and Pow'r advances Pow'r;
 Till Conquest unresisted ceas'd to please,
 And Rights submitted, left him none to seize.
 At length his Sov'reign frowns — the Train of State
 Mark the keen Glance, and watch the Sign to hate.
 Where-e'er he turns he meets a Stranger's Eye,
 His Suppliants scorn him, and his Followers fly;
 Now drops at once the Pride of awful State,
 The golden Canopy, the glitt'ring Plate,
 The regal Palace, the luxurious Board,
 The liv'ried Army, and the menial Lord.
 With Age, with Cares, with Maladies oppress'd,
 He seeks the Refuge of Monastic Rest.
 Grief aids Disease, remember'd Folly stings,
 And his last Sighs reproach the Faith of Kings.

Speak thou, whose Thoughts at humble Peace repine,
 Shall Wolsey's Wealth, with Wolsey's End be thine?
 Or liv'st thou now, with safer Pride content,
 The richest Landlord on the Banks of Trent?
 For why did Wolsey by the Steps of Fate,
 On weak Foundations raise th' enormous Weight
 Why but to sink beneath Misfortune's Blow,
 With louder Ruin to the Gulphs below?

What gave great Villiers to th' Assassin's Knife,
 And fixed Disease on Harley's closing life?
 What murder'd Wentworth, and what exil'd Hyde,
 By Kings protected and to Kings ally'd?
 What but their Wish indulg'd in Courts to shine,
 And Pow'r too great to keep or to resign?

When first the College Rolls receive his Name,
 The young Enthusiast quits his Ease for Fame;
 Resistless burns the fever of Renown,
 Caught from the strong Contagion of the Gown;

O'er Bodley's Dome his future Labours spread,
 And Bacon's Mansion trembles o'er his Head;
 Are these thy Views? proceed, illustrious Youth,
 And Virtue guard thee to the Throne of Truth,
 Yet should thy Soul indulge the gen'rous Heat,
 Till captive Science yields her last Retreat;
 Should Reason guide thee with her brightest Ray,
 And pour on misty Doubt resistless Day;
 Should no false Kindness lure to loose Delight,
 Nor Praise relax, nor Difficulty fright;
 Should tempting Novelty thy Cell refrain,
 And Sloth's bland Opiates shed their Fumes in vain;
 Should Beauty blunt on Fops her fatal Dart,
 Nor claim the triumph of a letter'd Heart;
 Should no Disease thy torpid Veins invade,
 Nor Melancholy's Phantoms haunt thy Shade;
 Yet hope not Life from Grief or Danger free,
 Nor think the Doom of Man revers'd for thee:
 Deign on the passing World to turn thine Eyes,
 And pause awhile from Learning to be wise;
 There mark what Ills the Scholar's Life assail,
 Toil, Envy, Want, the Garret, and the Jail.
 See Nations slowly wise, and meanly just,
 To buried Merit raise the tardy Bust.
 If Dreams yet flatter, once again attend,
 Hear Lydiat's Life, and Galileo's End.

Nor deem, when Learning her lost Prize bestows
 The glitt'ring Eminence exempt from Foes;
 See when the Vulgar 'scap'ddespis'd or aw'd,
 Rebellion's vengeful Talons seize on Laud.
 From meaner Minds, tho' smaller Fines content
 The plunder'd Palace or sequester'd Rent;
 Mark'd out by dangerous Parts he meets the Shock,
 And fatal Learning leads him to the Block:
 Around his Tomb let Art and Genius weep,
 But hear his Death, ye Blockheads, hear and sleep.

The festal Blazes, the triumphal Show,
 The ravish'd Standard, and the captive Foe,
 The Senate's Thanks, the Gazette's pompous Tale,
 With Force resistless o'er the Brave prevail.
 Such Bribes the rapid Greek o'er Asia whirl'd,
 For such the steady Romans shook the World;
 For such in distant Lands the Britons shine,
 And stain with Blood the Danube or the Rhine;
 This Pow'r has Praise, that Virtue scarce can warm,
 Till Fame supplies the universal Charm.
 Yet Reason frowns on War's unequal Game,
 Where wasted Nations raise a single Name,

And mortgag'd States their Grandsires Wreaths regret
 From Age to Age in everlasting Debt;
 Wreaths which at last the dear-bought Right convey
 To rust on Medals, or on Stones decay.

On what Foundation stands the Warrior's Pride?
 How just his Hopes let Swedish Charles decide;
 A Frame of Adamant, a Soul of Fire,
 No Dangers fright him, and no Labours tire;
 O'er Love, o'er Force, extends his wide Domain,
 Unconquer'd Lord of Pleasure and of Pain;
 No Joys to him pacific Scepters yield,
 War sounds the Trump, he rushes to the Field;
 Behold surrounding Kings their Pow'r combine,
 And One capitulate, and One resign;
 Peace courts his Hand, but spread her Charms in vain;
 "Think Nothing gain'd, he cries, till nought remain,
 "On Moscow's Walls till Gothic Standards fly,
 "And all is Mine beneath the Polar Sky."
 The March begins in Military State,
 And Nations on his Eye suspended wait;
 Stern Famine guards the solitary Coast,
 And Winter barricades the Realms of Frost;
 He comes, nor Want nor Cold his Course delay;—
 Hide, blushing Glory, hide Pultowa's Day:
 The vanquish'd Hero leaves his broken Bands,
 And shews his Miseries in distant Lands;
 Condemn'd a needy Suppliant to wait,
 While Ladies interpose, and Slaves debate.
 But did not Chance at length her Error mend?
 Did no subverted Empire mark his End?
 Did rival Monarchs give the fatal Wound?
 Or hostile Millions press him to the Ground?
 His Fall was destin'd to a barren Strand,
 A petty Fortress, and a dubious Hand;
 He left the Name, at which the World grew pale,
 To point a Moral, or adorn a Tale.

All Times their Scenes of pompous Woes afford,
 From Persia's Tyrant to Bavaria's Lord.
 In gay Hostility, and barb'rous Pride,
 With half Mankind embattled at his Side,
 Great Xerxes comes to seize the certain Prey,
 And starves exhausted Regions in his Way;
 Attendant Flatt'ry counts his Myriads o'er,
 Till counted Myriads sooth his Pride no more;
 Fresh Praise is try'd till Madness fires his Mind,
 The Waves he lashes, and enchains the Wind;
 New Pow'rs are claim'd, new Pow'rs are still bestowed,
 Till rude Resistance lops the spreading God;
 The daring Greeks deride the Martial Shew,
 And heap their Vallies with the gaudy Foe;

Th' insulted Sea with humbler Thoughts he gains,
A single Skiff to speed his Flight remains;
Th' incumber'd Oar scarce leaves the dreaded Coast
Through purple Billows and a floating Host.

The bold Bavarian, in a luckless Hour,
Tries the dread Summits of Cesarean Pow'r,
With unexpected Legions bursts away,
And sees defenceless Realms receive his Sway;
Short Sway! fair Austria spreads her mournful Charms,
The Queen, the Beauty, sets the World in Arms;
From Hill to Hill the Beacons rousing Blaze
Spreads wide the Hope of Plunder and of Praise;
The fierce Croatian, and the wild Hussar,
And all the Sons of Ravage croud the War;
The baffled Prince in Honour's flatt'ring Bloom
Of hasty Greatness finds the fatal Doom,
His foes Derision, and his Subjects Blame,
And steals to Death from Anguish and from Shame.

Enlarge my Life with Multitude of Days,
In Health, in Sickness, thus the Suppliant prays;
Hides from himself his State, and shuns to know,
That Life protracted is protracted Woe.
Time hovers o'er, impatient to destroy,
And shuts up all the Passages of Joy:
In vain their Gifts the bounteous Seasons pour,
The Fruit autumnal, and the Vernal Flow'r,
With listless Eyes the Dotard views the Store,
He views, and wonders that they please no more;
Now pall the tastless Meats, and joyless Wines,
And Luxury with Sighs her Slave resigns.
Approach, ye Minstrels, try the soothing Strain,
And yield the tuneful Lenitives of Pain:
No Sounds alas would touch th' impervious Ear,
Though dancing Mountains witness'd Orpheus near;
Nor Lute nor Lyre his feeble Pow'rs attend,
Nor sweeter Musick of a virtuous Friend,
But everlasting Dictates croud his Tongue,
Perversely grave, or positively wrong.
The still returning Tale, and ling'ring Jest,
Perplex the fawning Niece and pamper'd Guest,
While growing Hopes scarce awe the gath'ring Sneer,
And scarce a Legacy can bribe to hear;
The watchful Guests still hint the last Offence,
The Daughter's Petulance, the Son's Expence,
Improve his heady Rage with treach'rous Skill,
And mould his Passions till they make his Will.

Unnumber'd Maladies each Joint invade,
Lay Siege to Life and press the dire Blockade;
But unextinguish'd Av'rice still remains,

And dreaded Losses aggravate his Pains;
 He turns, with anxious Heart and crippled Hands,
 His Bonds of Debt, and Mortgages of Lands;
 Or views his Coffers with suspicious Eyes,
 Unlocks his Gold, and counts it till he dies.

But grant, the Virtues of a temp'rate Prime Bless with an Age exempt from Scorn or Crime;
 An Age that melts in unperceiv'd Decay,
 And glides in modest Innocence away;
 Whose peaceful Day Benevolence endears,
 Whose Night congratulating Conscience cheers;
 The gen'ral Fav'rite as the gen'ral Friend:
 Such Age there is, and who could wish its end?

Yet ev'n on this her Load Misfortune flings,
 To press the weary Minutes flagging Wings:
 New Sorrow rises as the Day returns,
 A Sister sickens, or a Daughter mourns.
 Now Kindred Merit fills the sable Bier,
 Now lacerated Friendship claims a Tear.
 Year chases Year, Decay pursues Decay,
 Still drops some Joy from with'ring Life away;
 New Forms arise, and diff'rent Views engage,
 Superfluous lags the Vet'ran on the Stage,
 Till pitying Nature signs the last Release,
 And bids afflicted Worth retire to Peace.

But few there are whom Hours like these await,
 Who set unclouded in the Gulphs of fate.
 From Lydia's monarch should the Search descend,
 By Solon caution'd to regard his End,
 In Life's last Scene what Prodigies surprise,
 Fears of the Brave, and Follies of the Wise?
 From Marlb'rough's Eyes the Streams of Dotage flow,
 And Swift expires a Driv'ler and a Show.

The teeming Mother, anxious for her Race,
 Begg for each Birth the Fortune of a Face:
 Yet Vane could tell what Ills from Beauty spring;
 And Sedley curs'd the Form that pleas'd a King.
 Ye Nymphs of rosy Lips and radiant Eyes,
 Whom Pleasure keeps too busy to be wise,
 Whom Joys with soft Varieties invite
 By Day the Frolick, and the Dance by Night,
 Who frown with Vanity, who smile with Art,
 And ask the latest Fashion of the Heart,
 What Care, what Rules your heedless Charms shall save,
 Each Nymph your Rival, and each Youth your Slave?
 An envious Breast with certain Mischief glows,
 And Slaves, the Maxim tells, are always Foes.

Against your Fame with Fondness Hate combines,
The Rival batters, and the Lover mines.
With distant Voice neglected Virtue calls,
Less heard, and less the faint Remonstrance falls;
Tir'd with Contempt, she quits the slipp'ry Reign,
And Pride and Prudence take her Seat in vain.
In croud at once, where none the Pass defend,
The harmless Freedom, and the private Friend.
The Guardians yield, by Force superior ply'd;
By Int'rest, Prudence; and by Flatt'ry, Pride.
Here Beauty falls betray'd, despis'd, distress'd,
And hissing Infamy proclaims the rest.

Where then shall Hope and Fear their Objects find?
Must dull Suspence corrupt the stagnant Mind?
Must helpless Man, in Ignorance sedate,
Swim darkling down the Current of his Fate?
Must no Dislike alarm, no Wishes rise,
No Cries attempt the Mercies of the Skies?
Enquirer, cease, Petitions yet remain,
Which Heav'n may hear, nor deem Religion vain.
Still raise for Good the supplicating Voice,
But leave to Heav'n the Measure and the Choice.
Safe in his Pow'r, whose Eyes discern afar
The secret Ambush of a specious Pray'r.
Implore his Aid, in his Decisions rest,
Secure whate'er he gives, he gives the best.
Yet with the Sense of sacred Presence prest,
When strong Devotion fills thy glowing Breast,
Pour forth thy Fervours for a healthful Mind,
Obedient Passions, and a Will resign'd;
For Love, which scarce collective Man can fill;
For Patience sov'reign o'er transmuted Ill;
For Faith, that panting for a happier Seat,
Thinks Death kind Nature's Signal of Retreat:
These Goods for Man the Laws of Heav'n ordain,
These Goods he grants, who grants the Pow'r to gain;
With these celestial Wisdom calms the Mind,
And makes the Happiness she does not find.

ELEGY WRITTEN IN A COUNTRY CHURCHYARD

Thomas Gray

The curfew tolls the knell of parting day,
The lowing herd wind slowly o'er the lea,
The ploughman homeward plods his weary way,
And leaves the world to darkness and to me.

Now fades the glimmering landscape on the sight,
And all the air a solemn stillness holds,
Save where the beetle wheels his droning flight,
And drowsy tinklings lull the distant folds;

Save that from yonder ivy-mantled tower
The moping owl does to the moon complain
Of such, as wandering near her secret bower,
Molest her ancient solitary reign.

Beneath those rugged elms, that yew-tree's shade,
Where heaves the turf in many a mouldering heap,
Each in his narrow cell for ever laid,
The rude forefathers of the hamlet sleep.
The breezy call of incense-breathing morn,
The swallow twittering from the straw-built shed,
The cock's shrill clarion, or the echoing horn,
No more shall rouse them from their lowly bed.

For them no more the blazing hearth shall burn,
Or busy housewife ply her evening care:
No children run to lisp their sire's return,
Or climb his knees the envied kiss to share.

Oft did the harvest to their sickle yield,
Their furrow oft the stubborn glebe has broke;
How jocund did they drive their team afield!
How bowed the woods beneath their sturdy stroke!

Let not Ambition mock their useful toil,
Their homely joys, and destiny obscure;
Nor Grandeur hear with a disdainful smile,
The short and simple annals of the poor.

The boast of heraldry, the pomp of power,
And all that beauty, all that wealth e'er gave,
Awaits alike the inevitable hour.
The paths of glory lead but to the grave.

Nor you, ye Proud, impute to these the fault,
If Memory o'er their tomb no trophies raise,
Where through the long-drawn aisle and fretted vault
The pealing anthem swells the note of praise.

Can storied urn or animated bust
Back to its mansion call the fleeting breath?

Can Honour's voice provoke the silent dust,
Or Flattery soothe the dull cold ear of Death?

Perhaps in this neglected spot is laid
Some heart once pregnant with celestial fire;
Hands that the rod of empire might have swayed,
Or waked to ecstasy the living lyre.

But Knowledge to their eyes her ample page
Rich with the spoils of time did ne'er unroll;
Chill Penury repressed their noble rage,
And froze the genial current of the soul.

Full many a gem of purest ray serene,
The dark unfathomed caves of ocean bear:
Full many a flower is born to blush unseen,
And waste its sweetness on the desert air.

Some village-Hampden, that with dauntless breast
The little tyrant of his fields withstood;
Some mute inglorious Milton here may rest,
Some Cromwell guiltless of his country's blood.
The applause of listening senates to command,
The threats of pain and ruin to despise,
To scatter plenty o'er a smiling land,
And read their history in a nation's eyes,

Their lot forbade: nor circumscribed alone
Their growing virtues, but their crimes confined;
Forbade to wade through slaughter to a throne,
And shut the gates of mercy on mankind,

The struggling pangs of conscious truth to hide,
To quench the blushes of ingenuous shame,
Or heap the shrine of Luxury and Pride
With incense kindled at the Muse's flame.

Far from the madding crowd's ignoble strife,
Their sober wishes never learned to stray;
Along the cool sequestered vale of life
They kept the noiseless tenor of their way.

Yet even these bones from insult to protect
Some frail memorial still erected nigh,
With uncouth rhymes and shapeless sculpture decked,
Implores the passing tribute of a sigh.

Their name, their years, spelt by the unlettered muse,
The place of fame and elegy supply:
And many a holy text around she strews,
That teach the rustic moralist to die.

For who to dumb Forgetfulness a prey,
This pleasing anxious being e'er resigned,
Left the warm precincts of the cheerful day,
Nor cast one longing lingering look behind?

On some fond breast the parting soul relies,
Some pious drops the closing eye requires;
Ev'n from the tomb the voice of nature cries,
Ev'n in our ashes live their wonted fires.
For thee, who mindful of the unhonoured dead
Dost in these lines their artless tale relate;
If chance, by lonely Contemplation led,
Some kindred spirit shall inquire thy fate,

Haply some hoary-headed swain may say,
'Oft have we seen him at the peep of dawn
'Brushing with hasty steps the dews away
'To meet the sun upon the upland lawn.

'There at the foot of yonder nodding beech
'That wreathes its old fantastic roots so high,
'His listless length at noontide would he stretch,
'And pore upon the brook that babbles by.

'Hard by yon wood, now smiling as in scorn,
'Muttering his wayward fancies he would rove,
'Now drooping, woeful wan, like one forlorn,
'Or crazed with care, or crossed in hopeless love.

'One morn I missed him on the customed hill,
'Along the heath and near his favourite tree;
'Another came; nor yet beside the rill,
'Nor up the lawn, nor at the wood was he;

'The next with dirges due in sad array
'Slow through the church-way path we saw him borne.
'Approach and read (for thou can'st read) the lay,
'Graved on the stone beneath yon aged thorn.'

The Epitaph

*Here rests his head upon the lap of earth
A youth to fortune and to fame unknown.
Fair Science frowned not on his humble birth,
And Melancholy marked him for her own.*

*Large was his bounty, and his soul sincere,
Heaven did a recompense as largely send:
He gave to Misery all he had, a tear,
He gained from Heaven ('twas all he wished) a friend.*

*No farther seek his merits to disclose,
Or draw his frailties from their dread abode,
(There they alike in trembling hope repose)
The bosom of his Father and his God.*

INTRODUCTION TO BLOCK 3

POETRY OF THE ROMANTIC REVIVAL: A HISTORICAL PERSPECTIVE

In Block II you read about a period of English literature that was influenced by classicism, the artistic principles developed in ancient Greece and Rome. In this block you are going to read the literature of Romanticism ‘an innovatory aesthetic creed, as opposed to an orthodox art.’ The literature of the previous period, in spite of Methodism in the religious life of the nation and the rise of ‘Sensibility’ in the realm of culture, was governed by the values of the ‘old order’ or the ‘ancien régime’, as the French would have it. The ancien régime in France supported the opulence of the nobility and the clergy at the cost of the Third Estate, the common people, who stooped in poverty but paid for the other two - the nobility and the clergy - in various ways. This disparity of wealth, income and opportunity characterized life and society of Europe including that of England.

In this block you move from the peace of the Augustans to an era of Revolutions – American in 1776 and the French in 1789. ‘Intense emotion’ opine Emile Legouis and Louis Cazamian, ‘coupled with an intense display of imagery, such is the frame of mind which supports and feeds the new literature.’ We can observe these new tendencies in the poetries of the most eminent Robert Burns (1759-‘96), William Blake (1757-1827), William Wordsworth (1770-1850), S.T. Coleridge (1802-‘52), George Gordon, Lord Byron (1788-1824), P.B. Shelley (1792-1822) and John Keats (1795-1821).

Burns was born into a poor Scottish family and led a precarious existence as a farmer. For some time his financial and domestic problems were so acute that he considered emigrating to Jamaica but he wrote vigorously in 1785-86 and the publication of his Poems, Chiefly in the Scottish Dialect (1786) was an immediate success. Henry Mackenzie (1745 - 1831) the author of The Man of Feeling (1771), which Burns valued ‘next to the Bible’, called him ‘a heaven-taught ploughman’. In his youth, ‘Burns was the god of my idolatry’ admitted Charles Lamb (1775 - 1834). Burns was an extremely handsome person and temperamentally gregarious which led him into a life of dissipation and amorous complexity. Many of his women find mention in his poems: Alison Begbie in ‘Mary Morison’, Mary Campbell in ‘To Mary in Heaven’. Some of his well known poems are, ‘The Cotters Saturday Night’, ‘To a Mouse’, ‘To a Mountain Daisy’, ‘Holy Willie’s Prayer’, ‘Auld Lang Syne’ and of course ‘Tam O’ Shanter’ (1791). The last poem narrates in a mock-heroic fashion Tam’s journey home from drinking. On his way he encounters a witches’ dance and flees. His mare loses her tail in the chase forcing Tam to draw the moral that when one’s thoughts turn to alcohol and sexual indulgence, ‘Think, ye may buy the joys o’er dear, / Remember Tam O’ Shanter’s mare.’ You may study and discuss the life and poems of Robert Burns or any other topic of interest to you in your study group.

William Blake did not go to school but began his career as an apprentice to James Basire, engraver to the Society of Antiquaries. (An engraver cuts designs and letters on hard surfaces such as wood or metal.) He later went to the Royal Academy and at the age of 22 he was employed as an engraver by Joseph

Johnson, a radical publisher and bookseller at St. Paul's Churchyard in London. He held literary dinners over his shop where his guests included Henry Fuseli, a Swiss artist who came to England in 1764 and settled in London, William Godwin, an atheist and philosopher of anarchical views, Joseph Priestley discoverer of oxygen and a radical Dissenter and Thomas Paine, author of The Rights of Man and an upholder of the politics of the Enlightenment. At Joseph's Blake met Fuseli and John Flaxman (1755-1826) English neo-classical sculptor and draughtsman. The latter was a follower of Emanuel Swedenborg (1688-1772), a theosophist and mystic who claimed not only to have visions but also converse with angels in his waking life. Blake's works both as an engraver and poet were influenced by Swedenborg's mysticism.

Historians of English literature have often called Blake and Burns Pre-Romantics, an epithet that better suits Thomas Gray and William Cowper, Macpherson and Percy. Wordsworth, Coleridge and Robert Southey (1774-1843) the first generation of the Romantic poets are frequently described as the Lake Poets. Byron, Shelley and Keats belong to the second generation of the romantic poets. John Gibson Lockhart today remembered for his Life of Sir Walter Scott (his father-in-law), was as editor (1825-53) of The Quarterly Review better known for the name given to himself: 'The scorpion'. He was savage as a critic and in the Blackwood's Magazine he and his associates began a scathing attack 'On the Cockney School of Poetry'. Leigh Hunt, William Hazlitt and John Keats, all Londoners, were frequently derided for their humble origin and contrasted with great writers, all of whom were 'men of some rank'. To the reviewers the younger poets were 'the vilest vermin' and people of 'extreme moral depravity'. We have selected works of only five poets of the Romantic period for some detailed study. I hope you will enjoy reading them and discussing them in your study circle.

11.0 OBJECTIVES

After having read this unit you will be able to:

- Talk and write about Wordsworth the poet;
- Discuss Wordsworth’s poetry with special reference to ‘Intimations of Immortality’ and
- ‘Tintern Abbey’

11.1 INTRODUCTION

In this unit we have discussed William Wordsworth’s life in brief. He is regarded the greatest poet of Nature and also the foremost of the Romantic poets. He brought about a revolutionary change in English poetry by his language, his sense of the influence of Nature on the mind, and his insight into emotion.

The first poem is an extract from ‘Intimations of Immortality’ which can also be termed as autobiography in poetry. Wordsworth talks about how memories recollected in tranquillity / calmness strengthen and inspire us if we remain true to Nature. We have scanned five lines of the poem. You may practice scansion by scanning the rest of the poem.

The second poem is also an extract from ‘Tintern Abbey’. It contains the essence of Wordsworth’s thought as a poet. The extract discusses how Nature soothes and heals a mind and heart in turmoil.

Both the poems are representatives of Wordsworth's theory of poetry: "spontaneous overflow of powerful feelings recollected in tranquillity."

After going through the unit, we hope, you would be able to appreciate the fact that Wordsworth was the poet of Man, of 'man as they are men within themselves.' He celebrates both 'Nature in her modesty' and 'Nature in her sublimity'.

It is better if you read through the unit section by section and do the exercises as you read. Do give yourself a break after you have worked on a section.

11.2 WILLIAM WORDSWORTH (1770-1850)

Wordsworth along with Coleridge and Southey belonged to the first generation of the Romantic poets.

Wordsworth was born on April 7, 1770 at Cockermouth on the Derwent in the Cumberland highlands of Lake District. By the age of fourteen he had become an orphan. His school days at Hawkshead, in his own words, "were very happy one, chiefly because I was left at liberty then, and in the vacations, to read whatever books I liked." Here he received his early impression "derived neither from books nor from companions, but from the majesty and loveliness of scenes around him... loved with the first heats of youth." He spent his first summer vacation at Hawkshead where "after a night spent in dancing, I was deeply moved by a splendid sunrise." Speaking of this experience, he says in The Prelude :

"Ah! need I say, dear friend! that to the brim
My heart was full : I made no vows, but vows
Were then made for me; bond unknown to me
Was given, that I should be, else sinning greatly,
A dedicated spirit."

But he did not relish the petty restrictions of University life and atmosphere of St. John's College, Cambridge, and felt like "a fowl of the air, ill-tutored for captivity." His days at the University are well documented in The Prelude.

After obtaining his B.A. degree in 1791, Wordsworth went to live for some months in London where the multitudes of the huge city brought him a vision of totality – human sympathies into his thoughts of Nature – and made him recognize "the unity of man," the unity of life.

In 1791 Wordsworth went to France to learn French in order to fulfil his cherished idea of becoming a touring tutor. There, like so many of his generation, he was very enthusiastic about the Revolution of 1789 and the revolutionaries. In particular he was charmed by the personality of Michael de Beaupuis whom he met at Blois in 1792. His influence revealed to him the power and potentiality of man - to attain "rational liberty, and hope in Mind, Justice and peace." At Blois he fell in love with Annette Vallon. He did not marry her, but she bore him a daughter.

He was compelled to return to England because his guardians in England threatened to cut off his allowances. The next few years were a period of disillusionment and disappointment for him. He was filled with remorse on account of his desertion of Annette and the child. Besides, the violent course of events in France rudely shattered his dreams of a new world of Liberty, Equality and Fraternity – the ideals of the French Revolution. Further, the war between France and England divided his loyalties in the most agonizing way.

His stay at Racedown, Somerset, between 1795 and 1797 is significant because he gradually overcame the depression and disillusionment caused by the French Revolution. Here he wrote 'Guilt and Sorrow' and his only drama The Borderers, a tragedy in blank verse, both being attempts at the psychology of guilt and expiation.

In 1797, Wordsworth along with his sister, Dorothy, moved to Alfoxden to be near to S.T. Coleridge, whose genius for philosophical speculation offered him an intellectual companionship that answered his needs. Here the two greats thought of embarking upon a book of poems to meet the expenses of a walking tour of Germany. Their joint venture resulted in the publication of the remarkable and monumental The Lyrical Ballads for which 'Tintern Abbey' was composed. The Lyrical Ballads was a manifesto of a new spirit in poetry we know as the Romantic Revival. Among the notes of new poetry were a new and intense interest in Nature, and a new faith in Man. In this period he wrote some of his best poems like 'Ruth', 'Nutting', 'The Poet's Epitaph' and the Lucy poems like 'The Idiot Boy', 'A Slumber did my Spirit Seal', 'She Dwelt Among the Untrodden Way', 'The Education of Nature', etc. This period also saw the publication of 'Peter Bell', a poem written as a reply to Coleridge's 'The Rime of the Ancient Mariner'. Like Coleridge's poem, this poem is also about the redemption of human soul.

In the beginning of 1800, with Dorothy, he settled at Dove cottage, Grasmere. In October 1802, he married Mary Hutchinson. In the following lines from 'She was a Phantom of Delight' he describes her thus:

"The reason firm, the temperate will,
Endurance, foresight, strength and skill;
A perfect woman, nobly planned,
To warm, to comfort, and command."

Here he planned his great philosophical poem The Recluse in three parts, of which he was able to write only two parts: The Prelude by way of introduction and the second part, The Excursion. In 1813, he settled at his favourite place Rydal Mount where he died on April 23, 1850, and was buried in the Grasmere churchyard. In the meantime, in 1843, he was appointed the Poet-laureate in succession to Robert Southey (1774-1843).

11.2.1 Characteristics of his Poetry

Every critic of English poetry has come to the conclusion that Wordsworth is the greatest Nature poet of England. Indeed, after reading his poetry, we are moved deeply and experience a kind of calm pleasure. To him, like the mystics, Nature was not a mere physical entity or loveliness or a sensuous presentation and description, but revelation of the Supreme Being; a vision, an interpretation, a path to perception of the unseen and infinite as both the poems here selected show. To him the myriad forms and phenomena in the universe were the manifestations of the divine – to him God in Man and in Nature is one as the super-sensuous world appeared to be more real than the world of sense-perception.

One cardinal principle of his poetry is his love for human beings – to love Nature is to love Man who is part and parcel of Nature. A distinguishing feature of this belief in Man is his glorification of childhood, of which the ‘Intimations of Immortality’ is the supreme example.

Another characteristic of his poetry is that Nature is a great teacher, healer and soother. In the ‘Tables Turned’ he says:

“One impulse from a vernal wood
May teach you more of man;
Of moral evil and of good,
Than all the sages can.”

But to learn lessons from Nature one must “bring with a heart /That watches and receives.”

His attitude to Nature did not become mystical and spiritual all at once. There were three stages in this development and they are described very vividly in the ‘Tintern Abbey’ and the ‘Immortality Ode’. In the first stage, his love of Nature was like that of child – sheer animal delight in the freshness and beauty of natural objects. This, in the second stage, developed into an impassioned love and sensuous beauty of Nature. In the third stage these passions, joys and raptures of youth yielded place to a quieter and more sober approach in which he became aware of the spiritual and human significance of Nature . He realized that Nature was the abode of God, and that there was an indissoluble bond between Nature, Man and God. This realization filled him with universal love and faith that all God’s creation is full of His blessings.

11.2.2 His Theory of Poetry

Wordsworth elaborated his theory of poetry in his Preface to The Lyrical Ballads . He writes:

“I have said that poetry is the spontaneous overflow of powerful feelings: it takes its origin from emotion recollected in tranquillity: the emotion is contemplated till by a species of reaction , the tranquillity gradually disappears and an emotion, kindred to that which was before the subject of contemplation , is gradually produced, and does itself actually exist in the mind .” But adds:

“Though this be true, poems to which any value can be attached were never produced on any variety of subjects but by a man who, being possessed of more than usual organic sensibility, has also thought long and deeply. For our continued influxes of feelings are modified and directed by our thought, which are indeed the representatives of all our past feelings.”

In his view, sensibility alone was not sufficient to ensure good poetry; it must be directed by “thought long and deep ,” i.e. by a calm mind.

What Wordsworth implies is, to quote Herbert Read, that “good poetry is never an immediate reaction to the provoking cause ; that our sensations must be allowed time to sink back into the common fund of our experiences, there to find their level and due proportion. That level is found for them by the mind in the act of contemplation, and then in the process of contemplation the sensation revive, and out of the union of contemplating mind and the receiving sensibility, rises that unique mode of expression which we call poetry.” This is what Wordsworth means when he asserts that poetry “takes its origin from emotion recollected in tranquillity”- a product which provides ‘pleasure’ and ‘delight’, the purpose being ‘instruction through pleasure’. Wordsworth’s theory of poetry is rooted in his ideas of a poet as a ‘man speaking to men’ who reveals to his fellow beings the hidden unity of their experiences. The poet thinks and feels in the spirit of the passions of people and therefore his language is very akin to theirs.

He writes in The Lyrical Ballads : “ Low rustic life was generally chosen because in that situation the essential passions of the heart find a better soil in which they can attain their maturity , are less under restraint , and speak a plainer and more emphatic language ; because in that situation our elementary feelings exist in a state of greater simplicity and consequently may be more accurately contemplated and more forcibly communicated.... The language too of these men is adopted...because such men hourly communicate with the best objects from which the best part of language is originally derived....”

Wordsworth in this way discarded the abstract and frigid style of the 18th century poetry in order to find a suitable language for the new poetic movement.

11.3 INTIMATIONS OF IMMORTALITY

11.3.1 The Background of the Poem

The full title of the present poem is ‘Ode : Intimations of Immortality from Recollection of Early Childhood’. The poem is in eleven stanzas containing 204 lines. The present extract is stanza IX.

Partly composed in 1802 and partly in 1804, ‘Intimations of Immortality’ is one of the noblest poems of Wordsworth. Around the year 1802 the poet was facing a spiritual crisis. The ‘visionary experiences’ that he had come across as an adolescent and a young man, and which were the source of his ‘deepest illumination’ were gradually losing their shine and glory. The present poem gives expression to the poet’s spiritual crisis, the causes of the lost glory and an answer to the poet’s problem.

C.M. Bowra in The Romantic Imagination observes that the first part (sts. , I-IV) presents the crisis, the second (sts. , V-VIII) attempts an explanation, the third and concluding part (sts., IX-XI) offers a consolation. Though “the radiance ... once so bright” is no more, yet all is not lost; Nature will still ‘uphold’ and ‘cherish’ us is the message that the poem conveys.

11.3.2 The Text

O joy ! that in our embers
 Is something that doth live,
 That nature yet remembers
 What was so fugitive!
 The thought of our past years in me doth breed
Perpetual benedictions : not indeed
 For that which is most worthy to be blest;
 Delight and liberty, the simple creed
 Of childhood, whether busy or at rest,
 With new-fledged hope still fluttering in his breast :
 Not for these I raise
 The song of thanks and praise;
 But for those obstinate questionings
 Of sense and outward things,
 Fallings from us, vanishings;
Blank misgivings of a Creature
 Moving about in worlds not realized,
High instincts before which our mortal Nature
 Did tremble like a guilty thing surprised;
 But for those first affections,
 Those shadowy recollections,
 Which, be they what they may
 Are yet the fountain light of all our day,
 Are yet a master-light of our seeing;
Uphold us, cherish, and have power to make
 Our noisy years seem moments in the being
 Of the eternal Silence : truths that wake,
 To perish never;

Which neither listlessness, nor mad endeavour,
 Nor Man nor Boy,
 Nor all that is at enmity with joy.
 Can utterly abolish or destroy !
 Hence, in a season of calm weather
 Though inland far we be,
 Our souls have sight of that immortal sea
 Which brought us hither,
 Can in a moment travel thither,
 And see the Children sport upon the shore,
 And hear the mighty waters rolling evermore.

11.3.3 The Stanza Form

‘Intimations of Immortality’ is written in an English Pindaric of the irregular form. This form is also known as Cowleyan ode. Wordsworth had never tried such a metre before. Each stanza has its own shape and length, and its own rhyme-scheme.

The first four lines are scanned for you.

This passage is an example of Iambic verse.

Variations : The first four lines are Trimeter. The first and third lines are hypermetrical. These four lines are rhymed and the rhyme scheme is a b a b.

11.3.4 A Discussion

The poem is a reminiscence in the sense that it is a poetic account of immortal nature of the human spirit intuitively known by the child, almost forgotten by the grown-up man, but to be known through recollection in tranquillity of heart and mind.

In this extract, the poet considers the child as superior to the grown-up man in the spiritual perception of divinity. But it is indeed a joy that even in our mature age, we can recall and recollect the elusive visions – the feeling of immortality and heavenly life – experienced during our childhood. In the same breath, the poet makes it clear that his joys in recollecting those experiences is not due to the blessings of childhood, delight and liberty, rather he is full of gratefulness and thanks “for those obstinate questions of sense and outward things,” i.e. , the poet is not thankful for those blessings for which he should feel most grateful. Our maturity force us to question and doubt the existence of tangible objects of the world around us , the vague intimations of the existence of a world of spirit and the natural instincts as experienced during the childhood. During the childhood period he had doubts about the reality of the visible world in which he moved about. The material things seemed to move away from him, and vanish into unreality. But as a grown-up man he feels like a guilty person, for now his life is devoid of the former loftiness. He is grateful to that period because of those innocent feelings and those vague remembrances of a previous existence in heaven which have always been a source of joy. Whatever may be their ultimate cause and effect, they are the primary source of knowledge, wisdom and happiness. These memories / recollection strengthen and inspire us. As a result the years of troubled and noisy times spent in the world are after all just transitory moments in this vast eternity. They support us, sustain us, and have the power to convert the noise and fury of our life into an eternal calm and serenity, i.e., they are capable of making our troubled period appear to us like a momentary interval of disturbance placed between tranquil eternity of life before birth and after death.

The poet believes that once these truths are visualized through mystical illumination, neither idleness, nor the mad pursuit of or endeavour to possess material objects, nor the preoccupations of boyhood or manhood, nor ‘all that is at enmity with joy’, can distory their influence. Hence, when man is advanced in years, the soul has the glimpse of the sea of immortality which helped us in coming on this earth. Our soul can in a moment recollect the experiences of childhood. When our mind is vacant and tranquil, and the imagination at its sublime, by recollecting the experiences of childhood, we can easily and instantly go back to the shore of eternity. In other words, in our innocent imagination we can have a vision of our eternal home.

In this excerpt Wordsworth picturises childhood with the help of apt images. The first is the image of fire(embers) which slowly dies out in the course of time, leaving ashes behind. The vision of childhood also slowly dies out when we grow up, yet the spark remains. In another image ‘hope’ has been likened to a young bird which flutters with its new-fledged wings. The third, ‘affection’ is used to describe innocent experiences.

The words used to describe the process to visualize the eternal abode spontaneously drive home the purpose of the poet – instruct through pleasure/ delight in a very convincing manner in lines colloquial yet full of meaning. They dignify the simplicity, but at times rises to grandeur without falling into pomposity.

11.4 TINTERN ABBEY

11.4.1 The Background of the Poem

The sub-title of the poem ‘Tintern Abbey’ is ‘Lines Composed A Few Miles Above Tintern Abbey’. The poem was composed in 1798, five years after his first visit to the banks of the river Wye, for The Lyrical Ballads, published in 1798. His first visit in 1793, the year following his return from France, when he was in a state of intellectual and emotional turmoil, was still afresh in his mind. About the composition of this poem, Wordsworth writes: “No poem of mine was composed under circumstances more pleasant for me to remember than this. I began it upon leaving Tintern after crossing Wye...Not a line of it was altered...”

The main cause of his mental and moral crisis was his disillusionment with the French Revolution in 1789 and the war between England and France in 1793. He lost his faith in Man and even in God. He cherished to find some solace and this consolation came to him in the lap of Nature. Therefore, when he revisited Tintern in 1798, he was a chastened person fully aware of the sufferings of humanity. He now no longer cried and longed for ‘dizzy raptures’ and ‘glad animal movements’, but looked for a deeper meaning in Nature. On this tour of 1798 with Dorothy, he discovered that ‘Man had much to learn from Nature which was Man’s prime teacher’.

11.4.2 The Text

Five years have past; five summers, with the length
 Of five long winter ! and again I hear
 These waters, rolling from their mountain-springs
 With a soft inland murmur. – Once again
 Do I behold these steep and lofty cliffs,
 That on a wild secluded scene impress
 Thought of more deep seclusion; and connect
 The landscape with the quiet of the sky.
 The day is come when I again repose
 Here, under this dark Sycamore, and view
 These plots of cottage-ground, these orchard tufts

Which, at this season, with their unripe fruits,
 Are clad in one green hue, and lose themselves
 'Mid groves and copses. Once again I see
 These hedge-rows, hardly hedge-rows, little lines
 Of sportive wood run wild : these pastoral farms
 Green to the very door; and wreaths of smoke
 Sent up in silence, from among the trees !
 With some uncertain notice, as might seem
 Of vagrant dwellers in the houseless woods,
 Or of some Hermit's cave, where by his fire
 The Hermit sits alone,
 Through a long absence, have not been to me
 As is a landscape to a blind man's eye :
 But oft, in lonely rooms, and 'mid the din
 Of towns and cities, I have owed to them,
 In hours of weariness, sensations sweet,
 Felt in the blood, and felt along the heart;
 And passing even into my purer mind,
 With tranquil restoration : feelings too
 Of unremembered pleasure : such, perhaps,
 As have no slight or trivial influence
 On that best portion of a good man's life,
 His little, nameless, unremembered, acts
 Of kindness and of love.

11.4.4 A Discussion

Wordsworth begins with a particular scene and a personal memory as experienced five years ago. In these five years he had passed through a period of great despondency. He was distressed by his love-affair with Annette Vallon who also bore him a daughter in 1792, and by political events – The Reign of Terror in France after the Revolution and the war between his motherland, England, and France, the country he wanted to settle in.

The poet gives a vivid account of his second visit to the Wye where he has come again after five years. He again hears the water rolling from their mountain springs with a soft inland murmur. Once again he feels elated in the presence of the wooded hills overhanging the Wye. The precipitous and high mountains, thick Sycamore trees, the cottage ground, the orchards with ripe fruits, the hedge row, etc. etc. are all observed and remembered by him and he recalls an experience. The remembrance of these sights and scenes has been a source of sweet, soothing and healing sensations from 1793 to 1798 when he had been living in London and when the crushed ideals of the Revolution and other sundry things had shaken his inner spirit. Yet the lastingness of his impression derived from the passionate fusion with the myriad forms of Nature sustained him in these critical years of his life. The revisit to the Tintern Abbey on the Wye with all its surroundings gave him mental relief, restored his peace of mind and thrilled the innermost recesses of his heart. The impressions gathered / received from the Nature left a moralizing influence on his character and inspired him to perform the ordinary deeds of love and kindness done in daily life, which are often forgotten and ignored.

Wordsworth always looked towards Nature for peace and comfort for his sorrow-stricken heart and in hours of weariness amid din and bustle of city life. In short, whenever he was in communion with Nature, he discovered spiritual and intellectual meaning in Her as if he were in the presence of some unseen power.

In the above extract the metre is blank verse – unrhymed ten – syllabled iambic lines. The lines of the excerpt use a selection of the real language of men in a state of vivid sensation. The excerpt is a lyrical meditation on the theme of Nature and its effect on a troubled mind.

11.5 LET US SUM UP

In this Unit you have read about the life of William Wordsworth and examined two excerpts from his poetry.

Wordsworth owes his distinctive position in English literature to his spiritual interpretation of Nature. He penetrated to the very heart of Nature and saw in it a revelation of universal spirit of God in the woods, mountains, meadows and men. He has been called a pantheist because he saw the one Universal Spirit permeating the whole universe. Therefore, he was also a mystic. He made it his mission to influence and convert humanity to this new religion – a religion to soothe and heal the tired humanity. His another important mission was to teach, and his greatest poems like ‘Tintern Abbey’, ‘Intimations of Immortality’ and Prelude enabled him to transmute his teaching into pure poetry which are indeed music to our ears and inspire in us obedience to divine eternal law.

12.2 SAMUEL TAYLOR COLERIDGE (1772-1834)

Coleridge was born on October 21, 1772 in Ottery St. Mary, Devonshire. After studying at Christ’s Hospital, a charity school in London, he went to Cambridge, but left the University without completing his studies, and enlisted for some time as a private in a cavalry regiment. Heavy debt might have been the reason of this erratic step. Right from his childhood, he was a sensitive and lonely boy who enthusiastically read whatever books he found around him.

Disillusioned with the French Revolution and convinced that freedom was impossible in Great Britain, he together with Robert Southey and other friends conceived the Utopian idea of Pantisocracy in which twelve gentlemen of good education and liberal principles would marry twelve ladies, migrate to Susquehanna, somewhere in the United States of America, and form a classless community. They proposed to work on a farm two hours a day to eke out a living and devote the rest of their time in literary pursuit. Lack of fund and young ladies forced them to abandon the venture. But in his enthusiasm for it, Coleridge married Sarah Fricker, Southey's sister-in-law, a step he repented throughout his life.

The Coleridges settled at Clevedon in Somerset where he pursued his literary interests and the result was the publication of a political and literary magazine, The Watchman, which, as was his wont with other activities, was short lived. He also published a volume of poems, Poems on Various Subjects in 1796. But it was only in the contact and companionship with Wordsworth that he discovered himself, his mental peace, security and environmental harmony, to write his most enduring poems between 1797 and 1800 – 'The Rime of the Ancient Mariner', the first part of 'Christabel' and 'Kubla Khan'. In collaboration with Wordsworth, The Lyrical Ballads, the manifesto of 'New spirit in poetry', was published in 1798.

In 1804, Coleridge decided to separate from his wife and went to Malta and Italy in search of health. However, he returned to England in 1806 and found a permanent home at Highgate in the house of Dr. Gillman. Here he gave up his addiction to opium. In 1817, he published his magnum opus Biographia Literaria – literary autobiography – which, though not an organized treatise, contains some of the most philosophical principles of poetic composition to be found anywhere. In it he has made a distinction between Fancy and Imagination. According to him, Fancy is passive which simply computes isolated mental pictures – memories and associations. It is intellectual rationalism. On the other hand, Imagination is creative, synthetic and magical power which brings about the fusion of human faculties.

When in 1824, under the patronage of George IV, The Royal Society of Literature was founded, Coleridge was nominated as one of the first ten associates with an annual pension of £100.

He published his last work On the Constitution of Church and State in 1830. He breathed his last at Highgate, London, on July 25, 1834.

Coleridge was a poet, philosopher and critic all rolled into one. He possessed the most vigorous mind among the Romantic poets. His versatility, however was also his undoing.

12.2.1 Poems of Coleridge

Among the poets of the 19th century Coleridge is the most fragmentary and unsystematic. Of the three poems on which his fame traditionally rests, only ‘The Rime of the Ancient Mariner’ is complete. ‘Christabel’ and ‘Kubla Khan’ are merely fragmentary. Apart from these three great poems, he also wrote ‘The Lime-Tree Bower My Prison’ – a poem of hope and joy as experienced by the poet, ‘Frost at Midnight’, which subscribes to the theory of pantheistic philosophy – presence of divine spirit in nature, ‘Dejection: An Ode’, and ‘Youth and Age’ express poet’s sense of failure of creative powers. He also composed some political poems like ‘France: An Ode’, which underlines the disgust caused by the failure of the French Revolution and subsequent reign of terror; ‘The Destruction of Bastille’ extols the event, whereas ‘The Ode on the Departing Year’ fears the fall of England.

Coleridge was the true pantheist who took delight in everything around him, even the weird and bizarre. In his later days, however, under the influence of German transcendental philosophy, he added a new note to it that the external world is phenomenal rather than actual and in whatever form the external objects appear, is actually given to them by ourselves, i.e., Nature lives in us and the impressions we receive from it are nothing distinct from us but a reflection of our own thoughts. He, however, honestly adhered to his own view of poetry: “the best words in the best order.”

In his three important poems on which his fame rests, there is an element of romance enveloped in mystery and marvel of the unknown and untravelled regions. Nature is depicted in its myriad forms – familiar and comforting, tender and soothing, cheerful and jubilant, weird and horrifying, desolate and mournful, tumultuous and perturbing. All these are linked to produce the harmony of a perfect and moral impression. To the critics most of his poems may appear to be fragmentary, but to the reader they present a wholesome experience. While, on the one hand, other romantic poets – Byron, Wordsworth, Shelley, Keats and others – weave a web of romance from their personal experience, Coleridge sees it among the wonders of the external world, links them to the subtleties of human psychology and presents them in a story rich in dramatic situations and psychological truths with a delicate sense of morality.

The essence of Coleridge's romanticism lies in his artistic rendering of the supernatural. In 'The Rime of the Ancient Mariner' there are a phantom ship with its ghastly crew of Death and Life-in-Death, the Polar spirit seeking vengeance for the murder of the Albatross, the two supernatural voices representing Justice and Mercy and a troop of celestial spirits animating the dead crew. The whole atmosphere of this long poem is charged with a sense of heightened mystery. In 'Christabel', the evil spirit that haunts the body of Geraldine and blast the innocent happiness of sweet and lovely Christabel is in the true tradition of vampires and Coleridge infuses a mysterious dread into her. In 'Kubla Khan', a poet, a creator, is shown caught in a spell of creative inspiration which transcends his mundane existence into a purely supernatural being.

Coleridge's chief purpose, and also a problem, while writing about supernatural characters and events as he himself said, was "to transform from our inward nature a human interest and a semblance of truth sufficient to procure for these shadows of imagination that willing suspension of disbelief for the moment, which constitutes the poetic faith", i.e. one has to willingly suspend the disbelief to enjoy poetry, written in frenzy and at the height of imagination.

Coleridge's treatment of the supernatural elements made it imperative for him to lay the scenes in the Middle ages, marked for its magic, witchcraft and superstition. And yet his treatment of the supernatural was quite modern, full of philosophical and psychological hints.

The most distinguishing feature of Romantic poetry is its emphasis on imagination, and Coleridge's poetry reveals his intense imaginative power. He decreed poetry to be governed by the principles of Imagination and not by those of Fancy. To him Imagination was an organizing and integrating principle in absence of which no great poetry could be written.

12.3 KUBLA KHAN

12.3.1 The Background of the Poem

'Kubla Khan' was published by Coleridge in 1816 at the request of Lord Byron. It was described by Coleridge as 'A Vision in a Dream, a Fragment', and in a brief preface to the poem, the poet writes that after taking anodyne he "fell asleep in his chair at the moment that he was reading the following sentence ... in Purchas's Pilgrimage: 'Here the Kubla Khan commanded a palace to be built, and a stately garden thereunto. And thus ten miles of fertile ground was enclosed with a wall' On awakening he appeared to himself to have a distinct recollection of the whole ... and instantly and eagerly wrote down the lines that are here preserved. At this moment he was unfortunately called out by a person on business ... and detained by him above an hour, and on his return to his room, found to his no small surprise and mortification, that though he still retained some vague and dim recollection of the general purport of the vision, yet, with the exception of some eight or ten scattered lines and images, all the rest had passed away”

12.3.2 The Text

In Xanadu did Kubla Khan

A stately pleasure-dome decree :

Where Alph, the sacred river, ran

Through caverns measureless to man

Down to a sunless sea.

So twice five miles of fertile ground

With walls and towers were girdled round :

And there were gardens bright with sinuous rills,

Where blossomed many an incense-bearing tree ;

And here were forests ancient as the hills,

Enfolding sunny spots of greenery.

But oh! that deep romantic chasm which slanted

Down the green hill athwart a cedarn cover !

A savage place! as holy and enchanted

As e'er beneath a waning moon was haunted

By woman wailing for her demon-lover !

And from this chasm, with ceaseless turmoil seething,

As if this earth in fast thick pants were breathing,

A mighty fountain momently was forced :

Amid whose swift half-intermitted burst

Huge fragments vaulted like rebounding hail,

Or chaffy grain beneath the thresher's flail :

And 'mid these dancing rocks at once and ever

It flung up momentarily the sacred river.

Five miles meandering with a mazy motion

Through wood and dale the sacred river ran,

Then reached the caverns measureless to man,

And sank in tumult to a lifeless ocean :

And 'mid this tumult Kubla heard from far

Ancestral voices prophesying war !

The shadow of the dome of pleasure

Floated midway on the waves;

Where was heard the mingled measure

From the Fountain and the caves.

It was a miracle of rare device,

A sunny pleasure-dome with caves of ice!

A damsel with a dulcimer

In a vision once I saw :

It was an Abyssinian maid,

And on her dulcimer she played,

Singing of Mount Abora.

Could I revive within me

Her symphony and song,

To such a deep delight 'twould win me,

That with music loud and long,

I would build that dome in air,
That sunny dome! those caves of ice !
And all who heard should see them there ,
And all should cry, Beware ! Beware !
His flashing eyes, his floating hair !
Weave a circle around him thrice,
And close your eyes with holy dread,
For he on honey-dew hath fed,
And drunk the milk of Paradise.

12.3.4 A Discussion

‘Kubla Khan’ is a poem about the act of poetic creation. It is significant for a thrilling picture of a poet in ecstasy in the process of creation. Kubla Khan (1216-1294), one of the powerful Asiatic kings, was the founder of the Mongol dynasty in China. The poem is both descriptive and suggestive – descriptive in the sense that it describes in detail Kubla Khan’s pleasure-dome of “rare device”, the source of the sacred river Alph, the maid, and suggestive in that if the poet could revive his inspiration a great poetry would follow. Coleridge also hints at some physical clues to identify a poet in his moments of inspiration.

Kubla Khan ordered a magnificent pleasure-palace to be built for him in Xanadu, also called Chandu or Shandu. So a ten-miles of fertile land on the banks of the sacred river Alph was enclosed with walls and towers. The source of the sacred river was a deep mysterious gorge that ran down a green hill across a wood of cedar trees. All these make the enclosed area wild, savage and enchanted, yet it is holy, fit to be frequented by a woman wandering about in the light of a waning moon in search of her demon-lover. Amidst the loud, tumultuous noise caused by the fall of water into the sunless sea, Kubla Khan could hear the voices of his ancestors to be prepared for a war in the near future.

In the last stanza, the poet gives us a vivid picture of an inspired poet and the act of poetic creation. Once, in a vision, he saw and heard an Abyssinian maid playing on her dulcimer and singing sonorously of the wild splendour of Mount Abora. The poet says that if he could recreate in his imagination the sweet, enchanting music of the maid, he would feel so inspired and ecstatic that with the music of his poetry he could build Kubla Khan’s pleasure-dome in the air / imagination, i.e., the listeners would see it in their imagination. In other words, a poet in a spell of poetic inspiration is capable of creation like God (Read the section on the Background).

In the last five lines Coleridge draws a picture of a poet inspired. When a poet's eyes are flashing, his hair floating and seem to be withdrawn from the material world, the listeners / readers ought to be beware of him and feel awed, but not fearful, for he has fed on honey-dew and drunk the milk of Paradise. In that moment he transcends into a superhuman being.

The poem is full of suggestive phrases and lines capable of evoking mystery. The description of the deep romantic chasm, the woman wailing for her demon-lover, the ancestral voices prophesying war, the source of the river Alph, sinuous rills, etc. are natural phenomena, but are suggested in such a way as if they were supernatural occurrences. The poet takes us to distant times and remote and unknown regions where the very unfamiliarity of the scenes prompt us to suspend our reasoning faculties, "willing suspension of disbelief" as Coleridge called it.

The very idea of poetic creativity taking shape under divine inspiration and of the poet transcending his mundane existence and transforming himself to the level of superhuman being when caught in his poetic frenzy evokes a world of magic and enchantment, a romantic concept of poetry.

Kubla Khan's strength and splendour are symbols of the might of poetry and his architectural achievements suggest power of the poetic imagination. The image of 'dome' suggests fulfillment and satisfaction of the might of finished creation.

The rhythm and the sound are perfect and conform to Coleridge's dictum : 'the best words in the best order'.

12.4 LET US SUM UP

Coleridge was the philosopher of the Romantic movement. His poems reveal his love of the marvelous and his great power to fuse natural with the supernatural. 'Kubla Khan' illustrates vividly what he meant when he called the imagination a 'synthetic and magical power', a power which 'instantly' fuses 'shattered fragments of memory' to produce a great poem.

The poem composed in irregular metre, is the recollection of a dream Coleridge saw when he had fallen asleep while reading Purchas's Pilgrimage. Coleridge was an avid reader of travel literature.

The poem is about the act of poetic creation, and notable for a thrilling picture of a poet in ecstasy.

13.0 OBJECTIVES

After having read this unit you will be able to:

- Talk about Byron the poet;
- Appreciate ‘Roll on Thou Dark and Deep Blue Ocean’, and
- Examine ‘George the Third’ as a piece of satire.

13.1 INTRODUCTION

In this Unit we have discussed Byron’s life in brief because it has often been said that Byron’s life itself was poetic. Critics have read his poetry as a record of his life. We will see how this is true.

The first poem is an extract from Childe Harold’s Pilgrimage which is very close to a travelogue in verse. In the fourth canto from which the poem has been taken, Byron drops the mask of Childe Harold and talks about his experiences more directly. We have scanned a stanza of the poem. You may practice scansion by scanning the poem selected for you.

The second poem is a piece of satire born out of a feud with another poet—Robert Southey. We have, in the introduction to the poem shown how Byron ridicules Southey. Thus in both cases Byron is a participant in his poetry, a matter that critics have repeatedly pointed out.

It is better if you read through the unit section by section and do the exercises as you read. Give yourself a break after you have worked on a major section.

13.2 LORD BYRON (1788-1824)

Byron was the eldest of the second generation of the Romantic Poets. Wordsworth, Coleridge and Southey belonged to the first generation. You have already learnt about the first two. In the present and the succeeding two units you will read about the second generation. i.e. Byron, Shelley and Keats.

Byron was born in London on 22 January 1788 while his mother was on her way to Aberdeen. He was born in poverty and of a club foot. While the former disappeared by the time he was 10 years of age the latter remained permanently with him.

Byron was the son of one captain Jack Byron often remembered as ‘Mad Jack’. He had run through the fortunes of two heiresses—a marchioness who gave birth to Augusta Byron, the poet’s half sister, and Catherine Gordon of Gight, mother of the poet. It was while running away from her rapacious (typical of a person who takes everything he can, especially by force) husband that she gave birth to George.

When Byron was three years old his father died (1791). In 1794, when Byron was six, his cousin, the heir to the Byron title, was killed. So when the fifth Baron Byron died in 1798, Byron inherited the title at the age of ten and the mother and son moved to Newstead Abbey, a dilapidated Gothic inheritance.

In Scotland, Byron attended the grammar School at Aberdeen. He later went to Harrow and Trinity College, Cambridge. Byron had always been a rebel. In order to avoid the regulation that forbade keeping dogs he kept a bear as a pet in his room at Cambridge. He also became a member of the Whig Club along with John Hobhouse, about whom you will read more later in this unit, and Lord Broughton.

Later Byron went to the Parliament. He spoke in support of the ‘frame-breakers’, or workers who had destroyed some textile machines through fear of unemployment. On another occasion he supported relief of Catholics in Scotland. He had sympathy for both Napoleon and George Washington. Byron almost wished that Napoleon were not defeated at Waterloo by the British.

Byron lived a considerable part of his life on the continent. It was at Leghorn in Italy that Leigh Hunt (1784-1859) joined him and they produced The Liberal magazine in which was published The Vision of Judgement an extract from which you are going to read later in this unit.

Byron, perhaps of all British poets, was the most European in outlook. Comparing him with Wordsworth, Bernard Blackstone, a critic, wrote:

Wordsworth’s topos is a narrow one, the Lake District, and this limits his appeal to the European reader. Byron’s is a very broad one, the whole of Europe and the Mediterranean world, and this makes him strange to the English reader. Mosques, temples, bazaars, dervishes, pashas, deserts, wadis, don’t go down very easily to a palate accustomed to clergymen, farmers, public-houses, markets, churches and cottages. So that Byron has never seemed quite real to an English audience though his work was very real to himself and to his Mediterranean readers (Byron: A Survey, London, Longman, 1975, p.xi).

Mosques, temples and bazaars, dervishes, pashas, deserts and wadis are unusual in English poetry. So was Byron's personal life unusual. Byron married Annabella Milbanke on 2 January 1815 but he had many women with whom he had affairs—Lady Caroline Lamb, Lady Oxford, Mary Godwin's step sister Claire Clairmont, Teresa Guiccioli and an incestuous relationship with his half sister Augusta. The result was that he and Annabella got separated only after a year of marriage.

It has often been said that Byron's life imitated literature and his poetry makes its primary impact as a historical and biographical document. Perhaps it is generally true to say about the Romantics that it helps us to appreciate a poet's work if we know his or her life. This is more true in case of Byron. Perhaps his last 'poetic' act was his death (19 April, 1824) on the island of Missolonghi while he was working for Greek independence from the Turks.

Do you find Byron's life interesting? If you do you will find a longer introduction to it in the Encyclopedia Britannica, at your Study Centre.

13.3 ROLL ON THOU DEEP AND DARK BLUE OCEAN

13.3.1 The Background of the Poem

'Roll on Thou Deep and Dark Blue Ocean' is an extract from Canto IV of Childe Harold's Pilgrimage. We have here the stanzas CLXXVIII (178) to CLXXXIII (183). These are the last but 3 stanzas of the canto.

The poem Childe Harold's Pilgrimage describes the journey of Childe Harold, whose experiences correspond to Byron's own. On 2 July 1809 Byron left England along with a Cambridge friend John Cam Hobhouse, his servant Fletcher and his 'little page', Robert Rushton. On 6 July they reached Lisbon.

The first two cantos describe the pilgrim, surfeited with his past life of sin and pleasure, finding diversions in his journey across Portugal, Spain, the Ionian Islands and Albania. Byron returned to Newstead in England in 1811 and the first two cantos were published in 1812. It was received enthusiastically by London society and lauded Byron as a major poet of England. 'I woke one morning' Byron wrote in March 1812, 'and found myself famous.'

In April 1816 Byron left England, never again to return to it. He went to Geneva in Switzerland where he met Shelley and completed the third canto of Childe Harold, which was published the same year. It describes the pilgrim's travels to Belgium, the Rhine, the Alps and Jura. Childe Harold also reflects on the Spanish War, and the Battle of Waterloo (1815) at which, Napoleon suffered his final defeat against the United Kingdom.

In October 1816, Byron left Geneva for Venice with Hobhouse. In the fourth canto he speaks directly about his experiences in Italy, his meditations on time and history, on Venice and Petrarch, Ferrara and Tasso, Florence and Boccaccio, Rome and her great men ending with the symbol of the sea. Byron had an abiding interest in the mountains and the sea. The extract that you are going to read is a meditation on the symbol of the sea.

13.3.2 The Text

There is a pleasure in the pathless woods,
 There is a rapture on the lonely shore,
 There is a society, where none intrudes,
 By the deep Sea, and music in its roar:

I love not Man the less, but Nature more,
 From these our interviews, in which I steal
 From all I may be, or have been before,
 To mingle with the Universe, and feel
 What I can ne'er express, yet cannot all conceal.

Roll on, thou deep and dark blue Ocean — Roll!
 Ten thousand fleets sweep over thee in vain;
 Man marks the earth with ruin — his control
 Stops with the shore; upon the watery plain
 The wrecks are all thy deed, nor doth remain
 A shadow of man's ragave, save his own,
 When for a moment, like a drop of rain,
 He sinks into thy depths with bubbling groan,
 Without a grave, unknell'd, uncoffin'd, and unknown.

His steps are not upon thy paths, — thy fields
 Are not a spoil for him, — thou dost arise
 And shake him from thee; the vile strength he wields
 For earth's destruction thou dost all despise,
Spurning him from thy bosom to the skies,
 And send'st him, shivering in thy playful spray
 And howling, to his Gods, where haply lies
 His petty hope in some near port or bay,
 And dashest him again to earth:— there let him lay

The armaments which thunderstrike the walls
 Of rock-built cities, bidding nations quake,
 And monarchs tremble in their capitals,
 The oak leviathans, whose huge ribs make
 Their clay creator the vain title take
 Of lord of thee, and arbiter of war —
 These are thy toys, and, as the snowy flake,
 They melt into thy yeast of waves, which mar
 Alike the Armada's pride or spoils of Trafalgar.

Thy shores are empires, changed in all save thee —
 Assyria, Greece, Rome, Carthage, what are they?
 Thy waters wash'd them power while they were free,
 And many a tyrant since; their shores obey
 The stranger, slave, or savage; their decay
 Has dried up realms to deserts: — not so thou; —
 Unchangeable, save to thy wild waves' play,
 Time writes no wrinkle on thine azure brow:
 Such as creation's dawn beheld, thou rollest now.

Thou glorious mirror, where the Almighty's form
 Glasses itself in tempests; in all time, —
 Calm or convulsed, in breeze, or gale, or storm,
 Icing the pole, or in the torrid clime
 Dark—heaving boundless, endless, and sublime,
 The image of eternity, the throne
 Of the Invisible; even from out thy slime
 The monsters of the deep are made; each zone
 Obeys thee; thou goest forth, dread, fathomless, alone.

13.3.3 The Stanza Form

Childe Harold's Pilgrimage is in an old stanza form. It was invented by Edmund Spenser (1552-99) and used in The Faerie Queene (1590, 1596), his greatest work. It thus came to be called the Spenserian stanza. In his preface to the first and second cantos of the poem Byron wrote thus:

The stanza of Spenser, according to one of our most successful poets, admits of every variety. Dr. Beattie makes the following observation: – ‘Not long ago, I began a poem in the style and stanza of Spenser, in which I propose to give full scope to my inclination, and be either droll or pathetic, descriptive or sentimental, tender or satirical, as the humour strikes me; for if I mistake not, the measure which I have adopted admits equally of all these kinds of composition. Strengthened in my opinion by such authority, and by the example of some in the highest order of Italian poets I shall make no apology for attempts at similar variations in the following composition; satisfied that if they are unsuccessful, their failure must be in the execution, rather than in the design, sanctioned by the practice of Ariosto, Thomson, and Beattie.

Byron saw himself in the tradition of Ludovico Ariosto author of the famous romantic poem Orlando Furioso (1532), James Thomson (1700-48), author of The Seasons (1726-30) and James Beattie (1735-1803) who wrote The Minstrel in Spenserian stanza and was an influence on The Prelude of Wordsworth.

Above we have eight five-foot iambic lines, followed by an iambic line of six feet. The lines rhyme ababbcbcc. You know that a five-foot iambic line is also called iambic pentameter of which blank verse is made and a six-foot iambic line is known as iambic hexameter and also Alexandrine.

Byron has used this stanza form because he agreed with James Beattie that it would be able to express his variety of moods effectively. Notice that a poet makes a conscious decision about a variety of matters before writing poetry. This may appear contrary to the popular notion that poetry gets written without conscious effort. Coleridge's 'Kubla Khan' was composed in a dream; Shelley wrote about the Eolian Harp. However, poetry is in words what a flower is in its petals and sepals, androecium and gynaeceum, more than a sum of its parts. A great poem is likely to elicit a unique response from every individual who reads it. You may, now that you have read the poem carefully yourself, read my appreciation of it.

13.3.4 An Appreciation

'Roll on, Thou Deep and Dark Blue Ocean' is a ceremonial song in praise of the sea. It is an anthem to the Ocean. It is the classic voice of a poet not in the Apollonian but in the Dionysian tradition. Here there is not the clarity and balance, neatness of outlines and the beauty of form but the rapture, the enthusiasm, the exuberance and joy of youth. Here is Romantic poetry in its splendour.

The English Romantics were lovers of nature. 'I love not Man the Less' proclaims Byron, 'but nature more'. Byron's nature, as that of the classical poets – Dryden and Pope, Johnson and Goldsmith — was not truth — the laws of nature-but God's variegated creation, its soothing power, its destructive aspect and creative force — Shelley's destroyer and preserver. What Shelley saw in the 'wild' West Wind, Byron sees in the sea. The 'West Wind's clarion O'er the dreaming earth' drives 'sweet buds like flocks to feed in air'. Byron's ocean chastises the vain man, melts his Armadas and the spoils of Trafalgars into the yeast of its waves. From its slime are born the monsters of the sea.

'Roll on' is a hymn to the sea, because it is the Almighty's 'glorious mirror'. It is His throne. It is the image of eternity itself. It expresses God's grandeur in its varied aspects — calm and violent as in a 'breeze, or gale, or storm'; frigid as in the polar regions and dark and tempestuous as in the equatorial. In looking at the sea as a symbol of the Divine, because of its variegated beauty, Byron pre-empted Gerard Manley Hopkins (1844'-89). Hopkins in 'Pied Beauty' saw God represented in beauty that is in many colours, as in certain birds, or the sky—azure and white—or the fish (trout) with its 'rose-moles' (red dots)—or the landscape with its bends, portions fallow and ploughed, or the freckled skin. What we find in the last stanza of 'Roll on' is magnified many times by Hopkins in 'Pied Beauty' but the seed of experience in both cases is the same.

In 'Roll on', the sea has been apostrophized. The poem is an address to the sea. It is the expression of the rapture of communion with the 'Universe' which Byron thinks he 'can ne'er express, yet cannot all conceal'. However, Byron's rapture is well communicated to the reader through the images in and the cadences of the poem. The tone is set in the first stanza itself.

There is society.....

By the deep sea, and music in its roar!

Byron does something more. He ignores the barriers raised by human language, by refusing to distinguish between the sea and ocean as he declines to accept that society is made only of human beings. For Byron there is music in the beat of the drum, the roar of the sea.

Byron was a poet of the mountain peaks and the sea just as Wordsworth of the child and 'the meanest flower' and Keats of the 'unravished bride' and the 'fruit with ripeness to the core'. It is strange, but true that the creator of Don Juan loved loneliness— 'the pathless wood', 'the lonely shore'. The dichotomy of the poet finds expression in the oxymorons.

Byron's repudiation of man's pride and power finds expression in the image of man compared to rain drop falling on the surface of the sea. Like the rain drop, he dies with no more than a 'bubbling groan'. Worse still is his image in the third stanza where he is rejected and thrown into the sky, ridiculed by the cold and 'playful spray' and sent back to some port or bay nearby. In the fourth stanza it is not the ordinary man but his monarch who is subjected to the same insult. The 'clay creator' refers to the man who makes the ships of war— 'oak leviathans'. Man claims to rule over the waves and assumes titles such as 'arbiter of war'. However, the truth is that it is the sea which has complete control over the monarch, the empire builder. For the sea, his ships are objects to play with.

Byron began with an image of the insignificance of man in the second stanza and through the fifth he develops it into the futility of his exploits—the decay of ancient civilizations of Assyria, Greece, Rome and Carthage. To Byron, the poet, it matters not which came first—Assyrian or Greek, Roman or Carthagian. Poets are insular to the prosaic world of facts. What matters to them is the core of humanity, made in the image of God. Byron feels that man's acquisitive instinct has led him to ruin. Wordsworth said, 'Getting and spending we lay waste our powers'. Byron's sea scorns the emperor, spurns the conqueror and lays waste civilizations that are expressions of man's greed. While they decay, the sea remains as young as it was in the first dawn of creation. It is the image of eternity.

If on the one hand Byron decries the British victory on the Spanish Armada in the sixteenth century and the Battle of Trafalgar in his own time, with contempt, on the other he remembers Shakespeare, if only in a veiled way, with approval. There is an echo of Sonnet 60. In the last two lines of the fifth stanza, Shakespeare wrote:

Time doth transfixe the flourish set on youth,
And delves the parallels in beauties brow,
Feeds on the rarities of nature's truth,
And nothing stands but for his scieth to mow.

From the second through the fourth stanzas are the various images of man as an ordinary individual compared to a rain drop, as a king and tyrant who is repulsed to the shore; as a conqueror whose ships are the ocean's toys, and as a builder of civilizations that decay. Byron has presented a series of word pictures that drive his point home. The last two lines of the fifth stanza, in reminding us of ‘creation’s dawn’ prepare us for the ‘image of eternity’ that the sea becomes in the last stanza. The transition, due to those two lines, becomes smooth and gentle.

There is a happy marriage of sound with sense in the poem. The choice of the word ‘roll’ is a stroke of genius of a master craftsman. The epanadiploic (from epanadiplosis) use of roll in the first line of the second paragraph echo in our ears the sound of the wave and the sound suggests its ebb and flow to our visual imagination. The pattern of rhyme suggested by the words —roll, vain, control, plain, remain... as it were, bring the elation to our heart that the sight of the gigantic waves in the sea themselves bring. Byron thought that the Spenserian stanza was capable of expressing a variety of moods. In this short specimen itself we notice that while the second, through fifth stanzas, at the level of the sound, picture the sea the first supports an introspective mood and the last a meditative one. The introspective mood is suggested by the three assertive statements of the first stanza.

The repetition of ‘There is’ three times suggests that the introspection is only a prelude to the rhetorical vein in which Byron is soon going to get into. However, the rhetoric here only brings in variety to the poetry. It does not detract us from the rich poetic experience that Byron has to offer. The poem has remained unforgettable because it has pictured in words the sights and sounds of the actual experience of standing in front of the expanse of the sea. It is a product of Byron’s catholic temper, his love for the sea and above all an abiding faith in man’s capacity to improve himself in the face of adversity.

13.4 GEORGE THE THIRD

13.4.1 Background of the Poem

Byron's The Vision of Judgment (1822) is a parody of Robert Southey's (1774-1843) original poem, A Vision of Judgment (1821). (Notice the difference in the two titles.) Southey's was meant to be a panegyric to George III of England who died in 1820. Byron's is a satire both on Southey and the King.

In Southey's poem, the poet in a trance sees George III rise from his tomb and reach the gates of Heaven where the Devil and Wilkes the democrat leader come to charge him with crimes he committed on earth. However, they retire in discomfiture when Washington eulogises him and he is greeted by the previous English monarchs, the eminent English and finally his own family.

In the preface to his poem Southey made a direct attack on Byron's works and referred to him as the leader of the 'satanic school' of poetry. In response Byron wrote the parody in which Southey is swept up by one of the devils from the Lake District where he offers to write Satan's biography and on being declined the favour, Michael's. when he attempts to read his own 'Vision' Saint Peter,

Upraised his keys,
And at the fifth line knock'd the poet down;

Southey fell into the lake but there he did not drown,

'He first sank to the bottom —like his works,
But soon rose to the surface —like himself;
For all corrupted things are buoy'd, like corks,
By their own rottenness, light as an elf,
Or wisp that flits O'er a morass;

This is trenchant satire and Southey had provoked Byron to deserve it.

The extracts that you are going to read are mainly satire on George III. In it, however, Byron praises George's domestic virtues. His family life was free from the characteristic vice of his predecessors. However he wanted to re-establish his personal rule prevalent during the reigns of the later Stuarts. He opposed Catholic emancipation, the American War of Independence and the French Revolution. He suffered from recurring fits of insanity and finally became insane in 1811. His eldest son was appointed regent until his father's death in 1820.

If you now read the satire you will be able to appreciate the darts that Byron shoots at George.

13.4.2 The Text

In the first year of freedom's second dawn
Died George the Third; although no tyrant, one
Who shielded tyrants, till each sense withdrawn
Left him nor mental nor external sun:
A better farmer ne'er brush'd dew from lawn,
A worse king never left a realm undone!

He died – but left his subjects still behind,
One half as mad - and t'other no less blind.

He died ! His death made no great stir on earth:
His burial made some pomp; there was profusion
Of velvet, gilding, brass, and no great dearth
Of aught but tears — save those shed by collusion.
For these things may be bought at their true worth:
Of elegy there was the due infusion-
Bought also; and the torches, cloaks, and banners,
Heralds, and relics of old Gothic manners,

Form'd a sepulchral melodrame. Of all
The fools who flock'd to swell or see the show,
Who cared about the corpse? The funeral
Made the attraction, and the black the woe.
There throb'd not there a thought which pierced the pall;
And when the gorgeous coffin was laid low,
It seem'd the mockery of hell to fold
The rottenness of eighty years in gold.

....'Look to the earth, I said, and say again:
When this old, blind, mad, helpless, weak, poor worm
Began in youth's first bloom and flush to reign,
The world and he both wore a different form,
And much of earth and all the watery plain
Of ocean call'd him king: through many a storm
His isles had floated on the abyss of time;
For the rough virtues chose them for their clime.

'He came to his sceptre young; he leaves it old;
Look to the state in which he found his realm,
And left it; and his annals too behold,
How to a minion first he gave the helm;
How grew upon his heart a thirst for gold,
The beggar's vice, which can but overwhelm
The meanest hearts; and for the rest, but glance
Thine eye along America and France.

'Tis true, he was a tool from first to last
(I have the workmen safe); but as a tool
So let him be consumed. From out the past
Of ages, since mankind have known the rule
Of monarchs —from the bloody rolls amass'd
Of sin and slaughter —from the Ceasar's school,
Take the worst pupil; and produce a reign.
More drench'd with gore, more cumber'd with the slain

'He ever warr'd with freedom and the free:
Nations as men, home subjects, foreign foes,
So that they utter'd the word 'Liberty!'

Found Geroge the Third their first opponent. Whose History was ever stain'd as his will be
With national and individual woes?
I grant his household abstinence: I grant
His neutral virtues, which most monarchs want;

'I know he was a constant consort; own
He was a decent sire, and middling lord.
All this is much, and most upon a throne;
As temperance, if at Apicius' board,
Is more than at an anchorite's supper shown.

'I grant him all the kindest can accord;
And this was well for him, but not for those Millions who found him what oppression chose.
'The New World shook him off; the Old yet groans Beneath what he and, his prepared, if not Completed: he leaves heirs on many thrones
To all his vices, without what begot
Compassion for him—his tame virtues; drones
Who sleep, or despots who have now forgot
A lesson which shall be re-taught them, wake
Upon the thrones of earth: but let them quake!'

13.4.3 A Discussion

‘George the Third’, as you know, is an extract from Byron’s The Vision of Judgment. The scene which the poem has in the foreground is that of the decease, funeral and ascent of George III to Heaven.

The first stanza sets the background of the poem. It announces the event — the demise of George III — and sets the comico-satirical tone of the poem. 1820 was the year in which the struggle for Greek independence began in which Byron also took some interest. George died in the same year. Byron thus makes use of periphrasis. He tells us about some of George’s good qualities— that he was no tyrant and was a good farmer—and some bad ones — that he shielded tyrants, (perhaps a reference to Lord Castlereagh about whom you will read also in the Unit on Shelley); that he left his kingdom undone, that he was blind, etc. A satirist attempts to rectify the vices of the society in which he lives. While Byron, apparently ridicules the king alone, at times he hints at the shortcomings in the British people also. He points out that George left his subjects, ‘One half as mad — and other no less blind.’

The second and the third stanzas describe the melodrama that the funeral was. There was plenty of everything, velvet, gilding, brass, elegies, torches, cloaks, banners and heralds and dearth of only one thing—genuine sorrow for the deceased.

From the fourth through the seventh stanzas are the words of the Devil who has come to claim George from Michael at the Heaven Gate. Hence you find the king subjected to caustic satire. The ‘I’ of the first line of the fourth stanza refers to the Devil. His chief attack is on George’s attempt to establish personal rule in England. During his reign Britain’s American colonies became independent. Britain, both in trying to suppress the American colonies and Napoleon who was in the popular imagination a symbol of liberty, became the butt of Byron’s satire. Besides being a foe to liberty George had an insatiable thirst for gold. The sovereign besides was a tool in the hands of other people.

The last two lines of the seventh stanza make a transition to the main subject of the eighth, recounting, George’s virtues — ‘his household abstinence’, faithfulness to his wife, qualities as a father, etc. These the Devil admits would not have been seen as virtues in a person at a lower station in life. The two telling images that clinch the point are those of ‘Apicius’s board’ and ‘an anchorite’s supper.’

The last stanza shifts the focus of our attention from a dead British monarch to the monarchs of Europe who either as drones sleep on their thrones unmindful of their country's plights or are despots who have refused to learn from the mistakes of the deceased monarch.

Byron's satire thus has a noble intention, that is, of rectifying the sources of politico-administrative power of their ills. The sovereigns on the European thrones are George's heirs, metaphorically speaking and Byron's satire is directed at them also.

13.5 LET US SUM UP

In this unit you read about the life of Lord Byron and examined two excerpts from his poetry.

The first is from his epic poem, Childe Harold's Pilgrimage which is an account of Byron's own travels on the continent and in Asia Minor. It is written in the Spenserian stanza and we hope that you can now scan the remaining stanzas of the poem yourself. Do the exercise with your counsellor at the Study Centre.

The second extract is from Byron's satire on Southey and George III. You have seen how Byron had two or three goals behind writing The Vision of Judgment and how he fulfilled them.

We hope now you will try to read a few more poems of Byron you may find in anthologies or the collected works of Byron.

13.6 SUGGESTED READING

There is a good survey of Byron's work in Byron: A Survey by Bernard Blackstone from which I have quoted a passage in this unit. Byron's Poetical Works edited by Frederick Page and re-edited by John Jump has been published by the Oxford University Press (Oxford, 1970). R.K. Kaul has edited Byron's The Vision of Judgment which is published by College Book Depot (Jaipur, 1965). The Growth and Evolution of Classical Rhetoric by A.B. Sharma (Delhi, Ajanta Books International, 1991) will be helpful in understanding the rhetorical devices used in the course generally and this unit particularly.

14.0 OBJECTIVES

After having read this unit you will be able to:

- know about Shelley's life and work;
- appreciate 'Ode To The West Wind'; and
- 'To A Skylark'.

14.1 INTRODUCTION

In this Unit we have discussed Shelley's life and work because his eventful as well as unconventional life has influenced his writings and probably an understanding of his life may help you in analyzing and appreciating his poetry in general and the prescribed poems in particular.

The first poem 'Ode to the West Wind' is a lyric of great complexity and consummate artistic design. Shelley glorifies the west wind because it destroys to preserve, and his optimism is also evident in the last line, 'If Winter comes, can Spring be far behind'?

The second poem 'To a Skylark' is an impassioned invocation to the invisible bird which pours out its heart 'In profuse strains of unpremeditated art and singing still dost soar and soaring ever singest'. It is a very famous lyric in which the poet glorifies the blissful life of the skylark, a heavenly bird, and contrasts her fate with human suffering.

14.2 PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY (1792-1822)

P.B. Shelley was one of the greatest romantic poets of early nineteenth century. He was an uncompromising rebel. He continued his struggle for the cause of individual liberty, social justice and peace. He wished to bring social reforms by his inspiring and courageous works of literature. He dreamt of an ideal society in which there should be no slavery and no exploitation.

Shelley was born on 4 August 1792 at Field Place, Broadbridge Heath, near Horsham, West Sussex, England. He was the eldest legitimate son of Sir Timothy Shelley — a Whig Member of Parliament for Horsham from 1790 -1792 and for Shoreham from 1806- 1812; and Elizabeth Pilford, a Sussex landowner. Shelley had four younger sisters and one much younger brother. He received his early education at home, tutored by Reverend Evan Edwards of nearby Warnham. He spent a happy and contented childhood largely in country pursuits such as fishing and hunting.

In 1802, he entered the Syon House Academy of Brentford, Middlesex. In 1804, Shelley entered Eton College, where he performed poorly, and was subjected to an almost daily mob torment at around noon by older boys. Surrounded, the young Shelley would have his books torn from his hands and his clothes pulled at and torn until he cried out madly in his high-pitched voice. This daily misery could be attributed to Shelley's refusal to take part in fagging and his indifference towards games and other youthful activities. These idiosyncrasies acquired him the nickname 'Mad Shelley'.

On 10 April 1810, he matriculated at University College, Oxford. It is said that Shelley attended only one lecture while at Oxford, but often read sixteen hours a day. His first publication was a Gothic novel, Zastrozzi (1810), in which he voiced his early atheistic view through the villain Zastrozzi. In 1811, Shelley published his second Gothic novel, St. Irvyne and a pamphlet called The Necessity of Atheism. The latter gained the attention of the university administration and he was called to appear before the College's fellows, including the Dean, George Rowley. His denial to disclaim the authorship of the pamphlet resulted in his expulsion from Oxford on 25 March 1811.

After four months of his expulsion from Oxford, on 28 August 1811 the nineteen year-old Shelley eloped to Scotland with the sixteen year-old Harriet Westbrook, a pupil at the same boarding school as Shelley's sisters, whom his father had forbidden him to see. Harriet Westbrook had been writing Shelley passionate letters threatening to kill herself because of her unhappiness at the school and at home. Shelley, heartbroken after the failure of his romance with his cousin, Harriet Grove, cut off from his mother and sisters, impetuously decided to salvage Harriet Westbrook and make her his beneficiary. The Westbrooks pretended to object but secretly encouraged the elopement. Sir Timothy Shelley, however, annoyed that his son had married below his status cancelled Shelley's allowance and refused ever to receive the couple at Field Place. Shelley was also at that time involved in a deep spiritual relationship with Elizabeth Hitchener, a twenty eight year-old unmarried school teacher whom Shelley called the 'sister of my soul' and "my second self". She became his muse and soul mate in the writing of his philosophical poem Queen Mab.

Shelley was gradually unhappy with his marriage to Harriet and essentially disliked the influence of her older sister Eliza, who discouraged Harriet from breastfeeding their baby daughter. Shelley accused Harriet of having married him for his money. Longing for more intellectual female companionship, he initiated spending more time away from home, among other things, studying Italian with Cornelia Turner and visiting the home of William Godwin.

William Godwin had three highly educated daughters, two of whom, Fanny Imlay and Claire Clairmont, were his adopted step-daughters. Godwin's first wife, the celebrated feminist Mary Wollstonecraft, author of A Vindication of the Rights of Woman, had died giving birth to Godwin's biological daughter Mary Wollstonecraft Godwin, named after her mother. Fanny had been the illegitimate daughter of Mary Wollstonecraft and her lover, the diplomat speculator and writer, Gilbert Imlay. Claire was the illegitimate daughter of Godwin's much younger second wife, Mary Jane Clairmont Godwin, whom Shelley considered a vulgar woman –not a proper person to form the mind of a young girl. Mary was being educated in Scotland when Shelley first became acquainted with the Godwin family. When she returned, Shelley fell madly in love with Mary.

On 28 July 1814, Shelley abandoned Harriet, though pregnant with their son Charles, he ran away to Switzerland with Mary, then sixteen, inviting her stepsister Claire Clairmont, who was also sixteen, along because she could speak French. The older sister Fanny, was left behind, to her great disappointment, for she, too, had fallen in love with Shelley. The three sailed to Europe, and made their way across France to Switzerland on foot. After six weeks, homesick and destitute, the three young people returned to England. In mid-1816, Shelley and Mary made a second trip to Switzerland. They were prompted to do this by Mary's stepsister Claire Clairmont, who, in competition with her sister, had initiated a liaison with Lord Byron. Regular conversation with Byron had an invigorating effect on Shelley's output of poetry. While on a boating tour the two took together, Shelley was inspired to write his Hymn to Intellectual Beauty, often considered his first significant production since Alastor.

After Shelley and Mary's return to England, Fanny Imlay, Mary's half-sister and Claire's stepsister, despondent over her exclusion from the Shelley household and perhaps unhappy at being omitted from Shelley's will, travelled from Godwin's household in London to kill herself in Wales in early October. On 10 December 1816, the body of Shelley's estranged wife Harriet was found in an advanced state of pregnancy, drowned in the Serpentine in Hyde Park, London. On 30 December 1816, a few weeks after Harriet's body was recovered, Shelley and Mary Godwin were married.

Early in 1818, the Shelleys and Claire left England to take Claire's daughter, Allegra, to her father Byron, who had taken up residence in Venice. In 1818 and 1819 Shelley's son Will died of fever in Rome, and his infant daughter Clara Everina died during yet another household move. A baby girl, Elena Adelaide Shelley, was born on 27 December 1818 in Naples, Italy and registered there as the daughter of Shelley and a woman named 'Marina Padurin'. However, the identity of the mother is an unsolved mystery. However, Elena was placed with foster parents a few days after her birth and the Shelley family moved on to yet another Italian city, leaving her behind. Elena died 17 months later, on 10 June 1820.

Shelley completed Prometheus Unbound in Rome, and he spent mid-1819 writing a tragedy, The Cenci, in Leghorn (Livorno). In this year, prompted among other causes by the Peterloo massacre, he wrote his best-known political poems: The Masque of Anarchy and Men of England. These were probably his best-remembered works during the 19th century. Around this time period, he wrote the essay The Philosophical View of Reform, which was his most thorough exposition of his political views.

In 1820, hearing of John Keats' illness from a friend, Shelley wrote him a letter inviting him to join him at his residence at Pisa. Keats replied with hopes of seeing him, but instead, arrangements were made for Keats to travel to Rome with the artist Joseph Severn. Inspired by the death of Keats, in 1821 Shelley wrote the elegy Adonais. On 8 July 1822, less than a month before his 30th birthday, Shelley drowned in a sudden storm while sailing back from Leghorn (Livorno) to Lerici in his boat, Don Juan. He was returning from having set up The Liberal (a magazine) with the newly arrived Leigh Hunt.

Shelley's most remarkable poems are Ozymandias, Ode to the West Wind, To a Skylark, Music, When Soft Voices Die, The Cloud and The Masque of Anarchy. His other major works include long, visionary poems such as Queen Mab, Alastor, The Revolt of Islam, Adonais, the unfinished work The Triumph of Life; and the visionary verse dramas The Cenci (1819) and Prometheus Unbound (1820).

14.3 ODE TO THE WEST WIND

14.3.1 The Background of the Poem

In order to know the background of the composition of Shelley's 'Ode to the West Wind', it is relevant to know what the poet says in this regard. The poem was inspired by his life at Arno near Florence in 1819. Shelley's note says: 'This poem was conceived and chiefly written in a wood that skirts the Arno, near Florence, and on a day when that tempestuous wind, whose temperature is at once mild and animating, was collecting the vapours which pour down the autumnal rains. They began, as I foresaw, at sunset with a violent tempest of hail and rain, attended by that magnificent thunder and lightning peculiar to cisalpine regions'. His mythopoeic imagination seized on scientific facts and phenomena and transformed them into beautiful images; his iconoclastic intellect tore at all outdated and meaningless conventions of society, religion and politics. His revolutionary zeal burns through his great 'Ode to the West Wind'.

14.3.2 The Text

O Wild West Wind, thou breath of Autumn's being,
 Thou, from whose unseen presence the leaves dead
 Are driven, like ghosts from an enchanter fleeing,

Yellow, and black, and pale, and hectic red,
 Pestilence- stricken multitudes: O thou
 Who chariotest to their dark wintry bed
 The winged seeds, where they lie cold and low,
 Each like a corpse within its grave, until Thine azure sister of the Spring shall blow

Her clarion o'er the dreaming earth, and fill (Driving sweet buds like flocks to feed in air)
With living hues and odours plain and hill;

Wild Spirit which art moving everywhere;
Destroyer and preservers; hear, O, hear!

II

Thou on whose stream, mid the steep sky's commotion,
Loose clouds like earth's decaying leaves are shed,
Shook from the tangled boughs of Heaven and Ocean,

Angles of rain and lightening; there are spread
On the blue surface of thine airy surge,
Like the bright hair uplifted from the head

Of some fierce Maenad, even from the dim verge
Of the horizon to the zenith's height
The locks of the approaching storm. Thou dirge

Of the dying year, to which this closing night
Will be the dome of a vast sepulchre,
Vaulted with all thy congregated might

Of vapours, from whose solid atmosphere
Black rain, and fire, and hail, will burst: O, hear!

III

Thou who didst waken from his summer dreams
The blue Mediterranean, where he lay,
Lulled by the coil of his crystalline streams,

Beside a pumice isle in Baiae's bay,
And saw in sleep old palaces and towers
Quivering within the wave's intenser day,

All overgrown with azure moss and flowers
So sweet, the sense faints picturing them! Thou
For whose path the Atlantic's level powers
Cleave themselves into chasms, while far below
The sea-blooms and the oozy woods which wear
The sapless foliage of the ocean, know
Thy voice and suddenly grow grey with fear,
And tremble and despoil themselves: O, hear!

IV

If I were a dead leaf thou mightiest bear;
If I were a swift cloud to fly with thee;
A wave to pant beneath thy power, and share

The impulse of thy strength, only less free
Than thou, O uncontrollable! If even
I were as in my boyhood, and could be

The comrade of thy wanderings over Heaven,
 As then, when to outstrip thy skiey speed
 Scarce seemed a vision, I would ne'er have striven

As thou with thee in prayer in my sore need.
 Oh, lift me as a wave, a leaf, a cloud!
 I fall upon the thorns of life! I bleed!

A heavy weight of hours has chained and bowed
 One too like thee: tameless, and swift, and proud.

V

Make me thy lyre, even as the forest is:
 What if my leaves are falling like its own!
 The tumult of thy mighty harmonies

Will take from both a deep autumnal tone,
 Sweet though in sadness. Be thou, Spirit fierce,
 My spirit! Be thou me, impetuous one!

Drive my dead thoughts over the universe
 Like withered leaves to quicken a new birth!
 And, by the incantation of this verse,

Scatter, as from an unextinguished hearth
 Ashes and sparks, my words among mankind!
 Be through my lips to unawakened earth

The trumpet of a prophecy! O, Wind,
 If Winter comes, can Spring be far behind?

Glossary

- Hectic red : an unhealthy red as though flushed with fever.
- Winged seeds : seeds with wing-like growths which enable them to be blown away and scattered.
- Azure sister : the warm west wind (the Zephyrus of the Poets) which blows from the clear blue skies.
- Clarion : trumpet. The spring wind wakes them up as the angel blows its trumpet to summon the dead on the Judgment day.
- Destroyer and preserver : The West Wind combines in himself the role of destroyer & preserver: it destroys the old decaying leaves; it scatters the seeds and thus preserves life.
- Shook from the tangled boughs of Heaven and Ocean : The whole universe should be shaken up—the air and the sea as well as the earth, both horizontally and vertically. The Wind seems to let loose the clouds as he blows off the dead leaves.

- The locks : the rain clouds are the wind's locks of hair.
- Thou dirge : The sound of the wind becomes a funeral song (dirge) for the dying year; the dark clouds become the dome of a vast tomb (sepulcher). The forces of destruction will erupt from these ruins. The poet prophesies the destruction of an old order and the birth of a new one.
- O, hear! : The poet seems to warn us with a prophetic zeal.
- his : the Mediterranean. The Mediterranean is a symbolical of the wealthy aristocracy who live a voluptuous life of indolence cut off from the living stream of reform and change.
- coil : murmur. The word generally means commotion or tumult.
- Crystalline : clear and transparent
- intenser day : clearer light.
- azure : blue.
- the Atlantic level powers : the smooth waters of the Atlantic ocean.
- While far below.....
despoil themselves : Shelley's own note may be given in explanation: "This phenomenon...is well-known to naturalists. The vegetation at the bottom of the sea, of rivers and of lakes, sympathizes with that of the land in the change of the seasons, and is consequently influenced by the winds which announce it."
- oozy woods : the vegetation on the oozy bed (the soft mud at the bottom) of the sea.
- despoil themselves : deprive themselves ; they change colour and fall off even as the leaves shed themselves from trees in winter.
- O ,hear! : The first three stanzas end on this note of prophetic warning: the poet calls upon the powers of the earth, the sky and the sea to listen the clarion call of reform and change.
- When to outstrip....Vision: In my boyhood I did not consider it a mere vision to go faster than you"(west wind).
- Skiey speed : your speed through the sky.
- Make me thy lyre : Let me be the poet of revolution, reform and change.
- Be thou me : Here the poet identifies himself completely with the tumultuous west wind.

If winter comes...behind?: The poem begins in a tone of impatient indignation and then passes on to a state of utter helplessness and sadness but ends on a note of hope. Gloom will be followed by hope as surely as winter will be followed by spring.

14.3.3 Analysis

The poet invokes the wild West Wind of autumn, which scatters the dead leaves and spreads seeds so that they may be nurtured by the spring, and asks that the wind, a ‘destroyer and preserver,’ hear him. He calls the wind the ‘dirge / Of the dying year,’ and describes how it stirs up violent storms, and again implores it to hear him. The poet says that the wind stirs the Mediterranean from “his summer dreams,” and cleaves the Atlantic into choppy Chasm.

The second section of the poem deals with the sky. Like withered leaves, the loose clouds fall from the unseen forests of the heaven into the river of the west wind. Suddenly, the imagery of the leaves is replaced by the human imagery. The clouds become hair of a huge giant. The west wind then becomes transformed into a mournful tune. And the rapidly encroaching night becomes the dome of an extensive sepulchre, canopied by the unifying power of the west wind.

The third section presents the effects of the wind on the sea. Here the placid Mediterranean is personified- asleep, dreaming of old palaces and towers which are only reflections. The west wind drives away unreal thoughts of the Mediterranean Sea. The under- water vegetation feels the arrival of the wind and sheds the leaves.

The poet says that if he were a dead leaf that the wind could bear, or a cloud it could carry, or a wave it could push, or even if he were, as a boy, “the comrade” of the wind’s ‘wandering over heaven,’ then he would never have needed to pray to the wind and invoke its powers. He pleads with the wind to lift him “as a wave, a leaf, a cloud!”—for though he is like the wind at heart, untamable and proud—he is now chained and bowed with the weight of his hours upon the earth.

The poet asks the wind to ‘make me thy lyre,’ to be his own Spirit, and to drive his thoughts across the universe, ‘like withered leaves, to quicken a new birth.’ He asks the wind, by the incantation of this verse, to scatter his words among mankind, to be the “trumpet of a prophecy.” Speaking both in regard to the season and in regard to the effect upon mankind that he hopes his words to have.

The last section of the poem presents the details of this identification sought to be established between the poet and the west wind. He desires to become the mouth piece of the west wind, as the forest is the lyre on which it plays the rustling tune. He asks the west wind to drive his old dead ideas which will form the manure to help the blossoming forth of new conceptions. The poet wants that the prophetic note of the west wind should spread throughout the world through his mouth. The optimistic prophecy, ‘If Winter comes, can Spring be far behind?’ makes the poem full of optimism and new hopes.

In short, Shelley invokes the wind magically, describing its power and its role as both ‘destroyer and preserver,’ and asks the wind to sweep him out of his torpor

‘as a wave, a leaf, a cloud!’ In the fifth section, the poet then takes a remarkable turn, transforming the wind into a metaphor for his own art, the expressive capacity that drives ‘dead thoughts’ like ‘withered leaves’ over the universe, to ‘quicken a new birth’—that is, to quicken the coming of the spring. Here the spring season is a metaphor for a “spring” of human consciousness, imagination, liberty, or morality—all the things Shelley hoped his art could help to bring about in the human mind. Shelley asks the wind to be his spirit, and in the same movement he makes it his metaphorical spirit, his poetic faculty, which will play him like a musical instrument, the way the wind strums the leaves of the trees.

14.3.4 The Stanza Form

Each of the five parts of ‘Ode to the West Wind’ contains five stanzas—four three-line stanzas and a two-line couplet, all metered in iambic pentameter. The rhyme scheme in each part follows a pattern known as terza rima, the three-line rhyme scheme employed by Dante in his Divine Comedy. In the three-line terza rima stanza, the first and third lines rhyme, and the middle line does not; then the end sound of that middle line is employed as the rhyme for the first and third lines in the next stanza. The final couplet rhymes with the middle line of the last three-line stanza. Thus, each part of ‘Ode to the West Wind’ follows this scheme: ABA BCB CDC DED EE.

14.4 TO A SKYLARK

14.4.1 The Background of the Poem

The sources and influences which stimulated Shelley's imagination when he composed the Skylark are not merely significant in themselves, but also essential in understanding its meaning. Let us see the natural observations which led Shelley to compose his poem 'To A Skylark'. From June 15 to August 5, 1820, Shelley, Mary, and Claire Clairmont stayed at Casa Ricci, the Leghorn home of John and Maria Gisborne. In a note of 1839 Mrs. Shelley says: 'In the spring we spent a week or two near Leghorn, borrowing the house of some friends, who were absent on a journey to England. It was on a beautiful summer evening while wandering among the lanes, whose myrtle hedges were the bowers of the fireflies, that we heard the caroling of the skylark, which inspired one of his most beautiful poems'.

14.4.2 The Text

Hail to thee, blithe spirit!
 Bird thou never wert,
 That from heaven, or near it
 Pourest thy full heart
 In profuse strain of unpremeditated art.

Higher still and higher
 From the earth thou springest
 Like a cloud of fire;
 The blue deep thou wingest,
 And singing still dost soar, and soaring ever singest.

In the golden lightning
 Of the sunken sun,
 O'er which clouds are bright'ning,
 Thou dost float and run;
 Like an unbodied joy whose race is just begun.

The pale purple even
 Melts around thy flight;
 Like a star of heaven,
 In the broad daylight
 Thou art unseen, but yet I hear thy shrill delight.

Keen as are the arrows
 Of that silver sphere,
 Whose intense lamp narrows
 In the white dawn clear,
 Until we hardly see, we feel that it is there.

All the earth and air
 With thy voice is loud,
 As, when night is bare,
 From one lonely cloud
 The moon rains out her beams, and heaven is overflow'd.

What thou art we know not,
 What is most like thee?
 From rainbow clouds there flow not
 Drops so bright to see,
 As from thy presence showers a rain of melody.

Like a poet hidden,
 In the light of thought,
 Singing hymns unbidden,
 Till the world is wrought
 To sympathy with hopes and fears it heeded not;

Like a high-born maiden
 In a palace-tower,

Soothing her love-laden
 Soul in secret hour
 With music sweet as love, which overflows her bower;

Like a glow-worm golden
 In a dell of dew,
 Scattering unbeholden
 Its aerial hue
 Among the flowers and grass, which screen it from the view;

Like a rose embower'd
 In its own green leaves,
 By warm winds deflower'd,
 Till the scent it gives Makes faint with too much sweet these heavy-winged thieves:

Sound of vernal showers
 On the twinkling grass,
 Rain-awaken'd flowers,
 All that ever was
 Joyous, and clear, and fresh, thy music doth surpass.

Teach us, sprite or bird,
 What sweet thoughts are thine;
 I have never heard
 Praise of love or wine
 That panted forth a flood of rapture so divine;

Chorus hymeneal,
 Or triumphal chaunt,
 Match'd with thine would be all
 But an empty vaunt
 A thing wherein we feel there is some hidden want.

What objects are the fountains
 Of thy happy strain?
 What fields, or waves, or mountains?
 What shapes of sky or plain?
 What love of thine own kind? what ignorance of pain?

With thy clear keen joyance
 Languor cannot be :
 Shadow of annoyance
 Never came near thee:
 Thou lovest - but ne'er knew love's sad satiety.

Waking or asleep,
 Thou of death must deem
 Things more true and deep
 Than we mortals dream,
 Or how could thy notes flow in such a crystal stream?

We look before and after,
And pine for what is not;
Our sincerest laughter
With some pain is fraught;
Our sweetest songs are those that tell of saddest thought.

Yet if we could scorn
Hate, and pride, and fear;
If we were things born
Not to shed a tear,
I know not how thy joy we ever should come near.

Better than all measures
Of delightful sound,
Better than all treasures
That in books are found,
Thy skill to poet were, thou scorner of the ground!

Teach me half the gladness
That thy brain must know,
Such harmonious madness
From my lips would flow,
The world should listen then, as I am listening now!

14.4.3 Analysis

In the poem ‘To a Skylark’ the poet has addressed a skylark (little bird) that soars up at a great height and sings so sweetly that the world is enchanted and bewitched by its sweetness. The skylark symbolizes high imagination, eternal happiness and harbinger of peace and progress. It is a spirit. Though it is unseen, yet it pours forth profuse sweetness. It stands for idealism and newly built society – free from corruption, exploitation and economic slavery. The Skylark’s sweet note and ideal message spread everywhere in the atmosphere. It is heard by the poet who is highly impressed. He boldly claims that the skylark is a superior thing in the sky. The cloud, the stars, the moon, the sun – all are left behind and the skylark dominates by its excellent tune and soothing voice.

The poet himself does not know what the skylark actually is. The mystery of the Skylark is still unsolved to the poet. But he is sure of the fact that he can learn a message of welfare from it and can spread in the world for recreation of the society. The poet had drawn beautiful comparison. In such comparison, he has proved his imaginative quality and an extraordinary talent.

He has compared the beauty and sweetness of the skylark to a highly born beautiful girl who lives in her tower like palatial building and sings sweet love songs. Similarly, its comparison with golden glow-worm among the flowers and grass and with rose having soothing scent is excellent and befitting. The poet is so confident about the sweetness and joy of Skylark’s song that he says that even the rainbow clouds do not spread as bright drops as the presence of the skylark spreads a rain of melody. In short, the music of the Skylark surpasses every pleasure of nature.

The poet wishes to get instruction and messages from the skylark. So he asks it to teach him its sweet thoughts. The poet is confident that the skylark is pouring out a flood of rapture which is divine.

The line, “Our sweetest songs are those that tell of saddest thought” is very meaningful. It tells the philosophy of Shelley’s life. What Shelley wants to convey here is that we like a song dealing with pleasure no doubt but it has a transitory effect. We forget the happy moments of life very soon. It does not impress us for long. But on the other hand, tragedy of life leaves a powerful stamp on our life. It becomes eternal in its appeal because it affects our heart emotionally. We are lovers of tragedy because we cannot escape it. Sorrow is part and parcel of human life. Naturally, sad thoughts impress us in a greater degree than happy thoughts we like to sing or listen to a tragic song more eagerly than a pleasant song.

The skylark scorns the nasty habits of the earth and stands for bliss, joy and prosperity of the world. The poet is of cosmopolitan outlook. He is restless to preach his idealism in the world. Therefore he earnestly requests the skylark to teach him the message.

Some critics say that P.B Shelley was not a practical man. He was far away from realism. So his skylark always flew higher and higher and did not come to the earth, like the skylark of Wordsworth. Shelley’s skylark can achieve perfection because it is ‘scorner of the ground’. This is where we find the difference of attitude of the two Romantic poets, Shelley and Wordsworth. Shelley’s skylark is an inhabitant of purely ethereal world and is a symbol of perfection. On the other hand, Wordsworth’s skylark in his poem ‘To the Skylark’ is an inhabitant of both earth and ether: ‘Type of the wise who soar, but never roam; /True to the kindred points of Heaven and Home’!

On the whole, ‘To a Skylark’ is one of the best lyrics of P. B. Shelley The flow of art, the similes, the flight of imagination and lyrical quality make this poem unparalleled in romantic poetry.

15.1 INTRODUCTION

John Keats was born in London, to Thomas and Frances Jennings Keats, on 31 October, 1795. Neither of his parents, nor any of his family members exhibited any taste for art. Thus, parentage threw no light on his poetic genius. He was educated at a private school at Enfield because of his parent’s poor financial condition. As a young lad Keats showed no intellectual interest and was known for fighting with people and is estimated as a morbid hysterical youth. At the age of fourteen he gave in to books. When he was of age fifteen, his parents died and his guardians took him from school and apprenticed him to a surgeon. In 1814 he transferred his residence to London, and followed part of the regular course of instruction for medical students. Already, however, his poetical bent of mind was becoming apparent. Surgery lost its slight attraction and giving up all thoughts of a medical career, he devoted himself to literature. The career of a poet became a bright possibility when he got acquainted with Leigh Hunt (1816), the famous Radical journalist and poet, whose collisions with the Government had caused much commotion and his own imprisonment. Keats was soon intimate with the Radical brotherhood that surrounded Leigh Hunt, and thus he became known to Shelley and others. Keats was in circle where great spirits flourished. Wordsworth, Lamb and Leigh met the young enthusiast and each in his own way fed the poetic enthusiasm in Keats. In 1817 he published his first volume of verse, which in spite of the championship of Hunt, could attract little notice. After the publication, he went to the Isle of Wight and the suburbs of London, where his affliction might be remedied and free him from distractions. But it ill-suited his temperament and he returned to London. By the end of this year he completed the first draft of Endymion. While he was staying there he was acquainted with Fanny Browne, and afterwards was engaged to her for a time. His physical problem, however, became worse, and the mental and physical distress caused by his complaint, added to despair regarding the success of his love affair, produced a frantic state of mind painfully reflected in his letters to the young lady. These letters were printed (1878), long after the poet's death.

His second volume of verse, published in 1818, was brutally assailed by the Quarterly Review and by Blackwood's Magazine. The reaction towards Endymion was also quite unfavorable. "Keats association with Hunt was sufficient in itself in certain quarters to discredit him; for Hunt's political radicalism had made him odious to the great Tory reviews". (Compton- Rickett, 1989) Keats bore the attack with apparent serenity, and always protested that he minded it little; but there can be little doubt that it affected his health to some degree and it is believed that he took such assaults of the critics deeply to his heart. In 1820, he was compelled to seek warmer skies, and died in Rome early in the next year, at the age of twenty-five.

15.2 JOHN KEATS (1795-1821)

At the age of seventeen, John Keats became acquainted with the works of Spenser when he read "Faerie Queen" which was given to him by his friend Cowden Clarke and this proved to be the turning point in his life. The mannerisms of the Elizabethan poet immediately captivated him, and he resolved to imitate him. His earliest attempt at verse is his Imitation of Spenser (1813), written when he was eighteen. This and some other short pieces were published together in his Poems (1817), his first volume of verse. This book contains little of any outstanding merit, except for some of its sonnets, which include the superb On First Looking into Chapman's Homer. While on one hand we can say that Spenser had been Keats' first enchanter, the second being Homer; on the other he owed much to Leigh Hunt for wise and generous encouragement and direction. The poems, which include Sleep and Poetry and I stood tip toe upon a little hill, show the influence of Spenser and more immediately, of Leigh Hunt, to whom the volume was dedicated.

Of a different quality was his next volume, called Endymion (1818). Probably based partly on Drayton's The Man in the Moon and Fletcher's The Faithful Shepherdess, this remarkable poem of Endymion professes to tell the story of the lovely youth who was kissed by the moon goddess on the summit of mount Latmos. Keats develops this simple myth into an intricate and flowery and rather obscure allegory of over four thousand lines. The work is clearly immature, and flawed with many weaknesses both of taste and of construction, but many of the passages are the most beautiful, and the poem shows the tender budding of the Keatsian style- a rich and suggestive beauty obtained by a richly ornamented diction. However the crudeness of the work laid it open to attack and the hostile reviews found it an easy prey.

Among his shorter poems La Belle Dame sans Merci, a kind of lyrical ballad, is considered to be one of the choicest in the language.

In 1819 Keats collaborated in a drama, Otho the Great, and began another, King Stephen, which he did not complete. Neither effort is of much consequence. The Cap and Bells, a longish fairy-tale which also is unfinished, is much below the level of his usual work.

Intellectually Keats was strongly in sympathy with Shelly and Byron in terms of religious philosophy he was much more extreme and whole heartedly pagan than either. For Keats there was no other religion than the religion of beauty; for him the earth was his great consoler. He never let his political inclination effect his poetry.

Compton-Rickett is of the view that “where Wordsworth spiritualizes and Shelly intellectualizes Nature, Keats is content to express her through the senses: the colour, the scent, the touch, the pulsing music.”

15.3 ODE ON A GRECIAN URN

15.3.1 The Background of the Poem

Keats was a romantic poet and where in most of his poems we find the solace of romance in this poem Keats has changed it to the solace of art. The theme of Ode on a Grecian Urn is about the attempt to escape from the complexities of time and escape into the world of unchanging art although it is achieved at a certain price. It considers the arresting of time and life by art as both profit and loss—it represents the escape from change and decay into eternity, but at the expense of eternal fulfillment: the “unravished bride” remains forever between the wedding ceremony and the bridal bed, as it were. Beauty and permanence remain with the figures on the urn, but they are after all only an “Attic shape”, and “attitude”, a “cold pastoral”.

15.3.2 The Text

Ode on a Grecian Urn

Thou still unravish'd bride of quietness,
Thou foster-child of silence and slow time,
Sylvan historian, who canst thus express
A flowery tale more sweetly than our rhyme:
What leaf-fring'd legend haunts about thy shape
Of deities or mortals, or of both,
In Tempe or the dales of Arcady?
What men or gods are these? What maidens loth?
What mad pursuit? What struggle to escape?
What pipes and timbrels? What wild ecstasy?

Heard melodies are sweet, but those unheard
Are sweeter; therefore, ye soft pipes, play on;
Not to the sensual ear, but, more endear'd,
Pipe to the spirit ditties of no tone:
Fair youth, beneath the trees, thou canst not leave

Thy song, nor ever can those trees be bare;
 Bold Lover, never, never canst thou kiss,
 Though winning near the goal yet, do not grieve;
 She cannot fade, though thou hast not thy bliss,
 For ever wilt thou love, and she be fair!

Ah, happy, happy boughs! that cannot shed
 Your leaves, nor ever bid the Spring adieu;
 And, happy melodist, unwearied,
 For ever piping songs for ever new;
 More happy love! more happy, happy love!
 For ever warm and still to be enjoy'd,
 For ever panting, and for ever young;
 All breathing human passion far above,
 That leaves a heart high-sorrowful and cloy'd,
 A burning forehead, and a parching tongue.

Who are these coming to the sacrifice?
 To what green altar, O mysterious priest,
 Lead'st thou that heifer lowing at the skies,
 And all her silken flanks with garlands drest?
 What little town by river or sea shore,
 Or mountain-built with peaceful citadel,
 Is emptied of this folk, this pious morn?
 And, little town, thy streets for evermore
 Will silent be; and not a soul to tell
 Why thou art desolate, can e'er return.

O Attic shape! Fair attitude! withbrede
 Of marble men and maidens overwrought,
 With forest branches and the trodden weed;
 Thou, silent form, dost tease us out of thought
 As doth eternity: Cold Pastoral!
 When old age shall this generation waste,
 Thou shalt remain, in midst of other woe
 Than ours, a friend to man, to whom thou say'st,
 "Beauty is truth, truth beauty,—that is all Ye know on earth, and all ye need to know."

John Keats

Glossary

Tempe	:	valley in Thessaly
Arcady	:	a region of ancient Greece, but primarily a vision of the pastoral ideal
Sensual	:	sensuous
And . . . return	:	The "little town" is not on the urn but exists only in the implication of art
Attic	:	pertaining to Attica, i.e. Athens
Brede	:	embroidery

Tease. . . thought : as in the “epistle of John Hamilton Reynolds” l. 77

Beauty . . . know : there has been much critical controversy as to where Keats intended the quotation to end: I follow Douglas Bush in assigning the entire last two lines (ll. 49-50) to the urn, and not just the first five words of l. 49.

15.3.3 The Discussion

The poem is both to and on a Grecian Urn as the poet is both talking ‘to the Urn’ by addressing it as a bride while it is ‘on the urn’ because the poet is detailing about the pictures drawn on the urn. The poet addresses the urn and calls it the bride of quietness and the child of silence and slow time as if it is wedded for ever to quietness and also it is unchanged or unchangeable because a piece of art is a permanent thing. So the bride is ‘still unravished’. In this poem, the poet believes that the pictures on the urn are frozen in time therefore they will never change or come to an end.

In the first stanza, the speaker stands before an ancient Grecian urn and addresses it. He is preoccupied with its depiction of pictures frozen in time. It is the “still unravish’d bride of quietness,” the “foster-child of silence and slow time.” The bride who is unravished will never consummate her love thus would never fulfill that desire. But a spark of wanting would remain forever. Addressing the bride as unravished could also mean that she is the one who has not been tainted with impurities. He also describes the urn as a “Sylvian historian” who can tell a story. He believes that this historian can tell a story in a much better way than any poet. He wonders about the figures on the side of the urn and asks what legend they depict and from where have they come. The picture seems to show a group of men chasing a group of women in the forest. The scene is such that it is hard for the poet to understand that what could be happening. He wonders what could be their story and asks questions like: “What mad pursuit? What struggle to escape? / What pipes and timbrels? What wild ecstasy?”

Looking at another picture on the urn, the speaker talks about a young man playing a pipe and is lying with his lover beneath a glade of trees. The speaker calls the music as the “unheard” melodies because they can never be heard but still he tries to listen to them and he believes that they are sweeter than mortal melodies as they are unaffected by time. As the song in the picture would never end; the trees would never shed their leaves and it would always be spring. He tells the youth that, though he can never kiss his lover because he is frozen in time, he should not grieve, because her beauty will never fade.

In the following lines, the poet talks about the surroundings that are feeling happy. The trees will never shed their leaves, the songs of the piper will be “forever new,” and that the love of the boy and the girl will last forever, unlike mortal love, which lapses into “breathing human passion” and eventually vanishes, leaving behind only a “burning forehead, and a parching tongue.” Therefore, everyone in the picture is happy as there is no fear of losing. Nothing would fade away. The picture on the urn is timeless. Evil has not been introduced. It is not affected by the cycle of life where everything deteriorates.

The speaker examines another picture on the urn, this one of a group of villagers leading a heifer to be sacrificed. He wonders where they are going and from where have they come. The scene is probably of an animal sacrifice. He imagines a little town there, empty of all its inhabitants for this purpose and he believes the streets will forever remain empty and silent, for those who have left it will never return as it is a picture and pictures are static in time. The final stanza, contains the beauty-truth equation, the speaker again addresses the urn itself, saying that it, like Eternity, “doth tease us out of thought.” Through the poet’s imagination, the urn has been able to preserve a temporary and happy condition in permanence, but it cannot do the same for the poets and their generation. As old age will waste everything and bring them grief. He thinks that when his generation would be long lost in time, the urn will remain, telling future generations its story. He believes that “Beauty is truth, truth beauty.” The speaker says that this is the only thing the urn knows and the only thing it needs to know. This may also indicate that this is the only thing we know on earth as there is more to know after the life on this earth comes to an end.

Thus to summarize, it can be said that in the poem the poet is trying to show that “human life and happiness may be brief, yet art may enshrine them with an ideal beauty that outlives the years. The figures and all they symbolized are gone but art has given them a lasting durability and so links the ages together”. (Compton-Rickett 1989)

15.4 ODE TO A NIGHTINGALE

15.4.1 The Background of the Poem

Ode to a Nightingale is generally admired for its rich and slow moving verse and for its expression of what are considered to be emotions proper to romantic poetry. But its true merits are of higher kind, deriving from its treatment of the nightingale’s song as symbol of the timeless, of the escape from the world of change and decay. The relation between art, death and life is the true theme of the poem as it is of the Ode on a Grecian Urn. The poem portrays Keats’ speaker’s engagement with the fluid expressiveness of music and has a different flavor of romanticism.

15.4.2 The Text

Ode to a Nightingale

My heart aches, and a drowsy numbness pains
 My sense, as though of hemlock I had drunk,
 Or emptied some dull opiate to the drains
 One minute past, and Lethe-wards had sunk:
 ’Tis not through envy of thy happy lot,
 But being too happy in thy happiness,—
 That thou, light-winged Dryad of the trees,
 In some melodious plot
 Of beechen green, and shadows numberless,
 Singest of summer in full-throated ease.
 O for a draught of vintage, that hath been Cooled a long age in the deep-delved earth,
 Tasting of Flora and the country green,
 Dance, and Provencal song, and sun-burnt mirth!

O for a beaker full of the warm South,
Full of the true, the blushful Hippocrene,
With beaded bubbles winking at the brim,
And purple-stained mouth;
That I might drink, and leave the world unseen,
And with thee fade away into the forest dim:

Fade far away, dissolve, and quite forget
What thou among the leaves hast never known,
The weariness, the fever, and the fret
Here, where men sit and hear each other groan;
Where palsy shakes a few, sad, last gray hairs,
Where youth grows pale, and spectre-thin, and dies;
Where but to think is to be full of sorrow
And leaden-eyed despairs;
Where beauty cannot keep her lustrous eyes,
Or new love pine at them beyond tomorrow.

Away! away! for I will fly to thee,
Not charioted by Bacchus and his pards,
But on the viewless wings of Poesy,
Though the dull brain perplexes and retards:
Already with thee! tender is the night,
And haply the Queen-Moon is on her throne,
Clustered around by all her starry fays;
But here there is no light,
Save what from heaven is with the breezes blown
Through verdurous glooms and winding mossy ways.

I cannot see what flowers are at my feet,
Nor what soft incense hangs upon the boughs,
But, in embalmed darkness, guess each sweet
Wherewith the seasonable month endows
The grass, the thicket, and the fruit-tree wild;
White hawthorn, and the pastoral eglantine;
Fast-fading violets covered up in leaves;
And mid-May's eldest child,
The coming musk-rose, full of dewy wine,
The murmurous haunt of flies on summer eves.

Darkling I listen; and for many a time
I have been half in love with easeful Death,
Called him soft names in many a mused rhyme,
To take into the air my quiet breath;
Now more than ever seems it rich to die,
To cease upon the midnight with no pain,
While thou art pouring forth thy soul abroad
In such an ecstasy!
Still wouldst thou sing, and I have ears in vain—
To thy high requiem become a sod

Thou wast not born for death, immortal Bird!
 No hungry generations tread thee down;
 The voice I hear this passing night was heard
 In ancient days by emperor and clown:
 Perhaps the self-same song that found a path
 Through the sad heart of Ruth, when, sick for home,
 She stood in tears amid the alien corn;
 The same that oft-times hath
 Charmed magic casements, opening on the foam
 Of perilous seas, in faery lands forlorn.

Forlorn! the very word is like a bell
 To toll me back from thee to my sole self!
 Adieu! the fancy cannot cheat so well
 As she is fabled to do, deceiving elf.
 Adieu! adieu! thy plaintive anthem fades
 Past the near meadows, over the still stream,
 Up the hill-side; and now 'tis buried deep
 In the next valley-glades:
 Was it a vision, or a waking dream?
 Fled is that music:—do I wake or sleep?

John Keats

Glossary

Lethe, a river flowing from the Greek underworld; it's also known as the river of forgetfulness, for those who drink from it forget everything. The allusion coincides with one of the themes of the poem, Keats' desire to forget everything as he listens to a bird sing, or as he writes poetry.

Light-winged Dryad of the trees In Greek Mythology, Dryads are the female spirits of nature (nymphs) who preside over forests and groves. The two mythological references establish a surreal mood—that state between reality and dreaming perhaps. This supports the theme that the poet wants to escape reality, and does.

Draught of vintage that hath been / Cooled a long age in the deep-delved earth / tasting of Flora and the country greenis Hippocrene. In Greek Mythology, Hippocrene is the name of a fountain on Mt. Helicon. It was sacred to the Muses and was formed by the hooves of Pegasus. Drinking the fountain's water brings forth poetic inspiration.

That I might drink, and leave the world unseen / And with thee fade away into the forest dim" Thee in this citation refers to the nightingale.

Not charioted by Bacchus... / but on the viewless wings of Poesy the depressed speaker wishes to escape through poetry. Bacchus is an allusion to the Roman god of wine and revelry.

Still wouldst thou sing, and I have ears in vain— / To thy high requiem become a sod. The problem with dying is the poet would no longer be able to listen to the nightingale's song

Forlorn snaps the poet out of his trance. The nightingale has flown and the poet wonders “Was it a vision, or a waking dream?”

15.4.3 A Discussion

The speaker feels a pain at heart and opens with a declaration of his own heartache. He feels a kind of uneasy drowsiness as if he is drunk. But his condition is not because he is envious of the nightingale whom he hears singing somewhere in the forest and says that it is not due the bird’s happiness, but is rather from sharing the experience wholly. The happiness is from the Nightingale’s singing as it sings the music of summer from amid some unseen plot of green trees and shadows.

The song of the nightingale seems to have paralyzed the poet’s mind as he wants to give up his senses and be one with the nightingale. For this, he longs for a drop of alcohol, so that he could experience the feeling completely and escape from reality. He wants to exist as one with the bird and forget all the pains and sorrow of this world. The poet longs for wings like Nightingale as it would help him see the world from a different height. He desires to fade away, saying he would like to forget the troubles the nightingale has never known. It doesn’t know the pains of human life and truth that everything is mortal. It doesn’t know that youth gets pale and that beauty loses its charm as time flies; it doesn’t know that life is full of sorrow and misery.

In the fourth stanza, the speaker asks the nightingale to fly away, and he will follow, not with the help of alcohol, but through his poetry, which will give him unseen wings. He doesn’t need alcohol as his spirits would lead him. He can see the moon and the stars although there is just a glimmer. This is because he is lifted above the trees along with the nightingale. In the fifth stanza, although the poet loses his sight but he can sense life into everything as he can smell, taste and hear a new world around him. It seems to him as if he has entered a totally new paradise.

In the sixth stanza, the speaker confesses that he is “half in love” with the idea of dying and believes that Death is soft. He wants an easeful death and enter a new world with the nightingale. He wants to experience that richness from a new height. But he soon realizes that the life of imagination and reality is different and if he would die, the nightingale would continue to sing but he would “have ears in vain” and be no longer able to hear.

In the following lines, the speaker tells the nightingale that it is immortal that it was not “born for death.” Nightingale’s song is eternal and its voice has always been heard by people from the past i.e. by ancient emperors and clowns, by homesick Ruth, whose reference we can find in the Old Testament also heard it. And it can be heard in the present times and would continue to be heard in future. The song has often charmed open magic windows. In the final stanza, the word forlorn tolls like a bell to restore the speaker from his preoccupation with the nightingale and back into him. The realization of the actual world makes him disheartened as the imaginary world is now shattered. As the nightingale flies away, he wakes up from his dream. He realizes that it was his imagination or maybe he has come out from his sleep. But he also realizes that what he was thinking is not possible and that he should come back to his senses.

Thus, here we find one of the main themes of the poem where he is conflicting between reality and the ideal. In this poem we can see that Keats has allowed his thought to have wings and be free and get rid from the life of frustration. One though leads to another but finally he comes back to reality and realizes the truth of life.

15.5 LET US SUM UP

In this unit you read about the life and works of John Keats and examined two of his poems. Both of them are romantic poems addressing things of beauty in nature and in the creation of man. You should now be able to examine, appreciate and discuss Keats's poetry in general and these two poems in particular effectively.

15.6 ANSWERS TO SELF-CHECK EXERCISES

Now that you have read the poems carefully, try to answer the following questions. And thus you would discuss the poems

- a) Talk about the life and important works of Keats.

Ans: Refer to section 15.1 and 15.2

- b) What do you think Keats mean by a Sylvan historian in the first stanza of Ode on a Grecian Urn?

Ans: Refer to the second paragraph of Section 15.3.3.

- c) Discuss how the poet defines art to be eternal?

Ans: Refer to the fourth, fifth and final paragraph of Section 15.3.3.

- d) How will the poet follow the Nightingale when it flies away in the poem Ode to a Nightingale?

Ans: Refer to the second paragraph of the section 15.4.3

- e) Why does the poet become disheartened in the poem Ode to Nightingale?

Ans: Refer to the second last paragraphs of Sections 15.4.4

INTRODUCTION TO BLOCK 4

THE VICTORIAN POETS: A HISTORICAL PERSPECTIVE

In the last block we read some of the Romantic poets; the poetry of an age of revolutions. ‘The formal doctrines of the Romanticists’ wrote Legouis and Cazamian, ‘had never been officially recognized; to the end, they had been opposed by conservative opinion, and their disputed triumph was rather a question of fact than of rights.’ In this block you are going to read a selection of the poetry of the British Isles at the height of its imperial glory. This age has been named after Queen Victoria who sat on the throne of England from 1837 to 1901. She was the sixth and the last monarch of the House of Hanover. Victoria was succeeded by Edward VII (1901- 10) of the House of Saxe-Coburg and George V (1910 - 36) of the House of Windsor. Accordingly some historians of English literature talk about the Victorian, the Edwardian and, the Georgian periods in English literature.

Funny as it may appear, the Victorian period symbolises growth and stability on the one hand, poverty, ugliness, squalor and injustice, especially among the urban industrial workers, on the other. Benjamin Disraeli (1804 - 81) a British politician, prime minister and novelist contrasted the conditions of the rich and the poor in his trilogy, especially the second novel in the series: Coningsby (1844), Sybil (1845) and Tancred (1847). This divide in the society which saw prosperity and progress on the one hand and poverty and ugliness on the other, moralism and philanthropy on the one hand and capitalistic greed and corruption on the other is often referred to as ‘Victorian Compromise’. We can observe the social divide in the novels also of Charles Dickens, W. M. Thackeray, Anthony Trollope, George Meredith, Elizabeth Gaskell, Charlotte, Emily and Anne Brontë, Thomas Hardy and, Mary Ann Evans who wrote under the pseudonym George Eliot.

The period 1901 – 14 is often called the Edwardian age. It is commonly used to contrast with the Victorian period. This was the age of H.G. Wells, Arnold Bennet and John Galsworthy. It is said that Queen Victoria sat on the throne like a great paper-weight and after her death things blew all over the place. The image gives expression to the sense of freedom going hand in hand with the lack of direction that characterizes the age. The other aspect of the Edwardian age is the cheering prosperity and quiet confidence that the empire gave to the English people, especially as it preceded the First World War (1914 - 18).

Georgian Poetry was a series of five volumes of poems edited by Edward Marsh. The project was conceived as a harbinger of a new age of nature poetry like those of the Romantic period. Some of the poets who found their poems published in the early volumes were W. H. Davies, John Masefield, D. H. Lawrence, Walter de la Mare, Lascelles Abercrombie, Gordon Bottomley and John Drinkwater. Among the poets in the later volumes were poets such as Edmund Blunden, Siegfried Sassoon, Robert Graves and Isaac Rosenberg. However, on the whole, Georgian poetry acquired the image of work of an escapist nature.

When we talk about Victorian poetry we generally think of the poetries of Alfred Tennyson and Matthew Arnold who were in some ways part of the English establishment. Tennyson succeeded William Wordsworth as the poet laureate at the latter's death in 1850 and Matthew Arnold became inspector of schools in 1851 in which capacity he served for 35 years. Besides, he was son of Thomas Arnold headmaster of Rugby.

In 1848 a group of artists – J.E.Millais, D.G.Rossetti, W. Holman Hunt - met as a group in appreciation of the Italian quattrocento and in defiance of Raphael as a master of 19th century English painting. William Michael and Christina Georgiana Rossetti brother and sister respectively of Dante Gabriel Rossetti were also important members of the group to which Walter Pater and William Morris were later roped in. Their outlook was coloured by nostalgia for the Middle Ages. The group known as Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood was strongly literary and their paintings were influenced by poets like Keats, Tennyson, Shakespeare and Dante.

Poets such as Browning and Hopkins are justifiably seen as pre-modernists. Late in the eighties we discover the poets of the Aesthetic Movement, members of the Rhymers' Club, such as Oscar Wilde, Arthur Symons , Ernest Dowson and Lionel Johnson. They are also termed fin de siècle, i.e. characteristic of end of the nineteenth century. The aesthetes were influenced by the slogan l'art pour l'art (art for art's sake) which became popular in France in the first half of the nineteenth century, especially in the writings of Théophile Gautier. While the aesthetes believed in art for art's sake the imperialists such as Rudyard Kipling (he was born in Mumbai, the then-Bombay, in 1865), W. E. Henley and John Davidson believed in art for the sake of the British empire. They wrote jingoistic verse of which a few lines from Kipling's Barrack-Room Ballads (1892), 'Gunga Din' are quoted below:

Now in Injia's sunny clime,
Where I used to spend my time
A-servin' of 'Er Majesty the Queen,
Of all them blackfaced crew
The finest man I knew
Was our regimental bhisti, Gunga Din,
He was 'Din! Din! Din!
'You limp in' lump o' brick-dust, Gunga Din!
'Hi! Slippy hitherao
'Water, get it! Panee lao,
'You squidgy-nosed old idol, Gunga Din.'

Gunga Din is finally portrayed as a hero in contrast to the British soldier that killed him:

Though I've belted you and flayed you,
By the livin' Gawd that made you,
You're a better man than I am, Gunga Din!

'The Decadents' is another name given to the aesthetes and the imperialists.

16.0 OBJECTIVES

In this Unit we shall discuss two lyrics and one long poem of Alfred, Lord Tennyson. After you have read this unit you should be able to:

- understand Tennyson's relationship with the Victorian age;
- have an idea of Tennyson as a lyric writer;
- discuss the poetic techniques of Tennyson

16.1 INTRODUCTION

Lord Tennyson is called a representative poet of the Victorian age. When we say this we mean that he is one poet in whose works the basic nature of the age – its achievements, doubts and fears – are best reflected.

As a matter of fact, the Victorian age was an age of great progress and of the consolidation of the powers of England. Naturally, a poet of this age is expected to be full of optimism. But Tennyson could see beyond the political and economic achievements of his time. He was studiously following the advances of contemporary science which moved Victorian men and women to scrutinize the Biblical story of the origin of the creation on a rational basis. This instilled first doubts in the realm of religion.

Tennyson felt the emotional tremors of the people of his age. His poems document their anxiety; but Tennyson could also instil faith as he himself mastered a personal crisis and remained devoted to creativity. This balance is characteristic of his poetry and is also a great contribution to the Victorian age.

16.2 THE VICTORIAN AGE

Queen Victoria ascended the throne in 1837 and introduced such economic and political measures, with the aid of her astute ministers that England was at the zenith of development. She did not hesitate in ending the monopoly of merchants – the old laissez – faire policy was replaced by just intervention and close scrutiny of market trends by state.

The major industries of coal, iron, textiles and railway building continued to flourish. There were other European competitors like Germany, France and Belgium. But England left them far behind. Many new machines and gadgets were either invented by British scientists or perfected by them. Bicycle, camera, electric light and telephone not only made life comfortable for Britishers; they gave rise to new industries that considerably enhanced British exports and income.

The rise of Limited Liability Companies was a new thing. It ended the monopoly of one-family firms; on the other hand, it gave birth to a new era of capitalism in which the British middle class had a definite share. These companies were managed by Board of Directors; but any individual might become a shareholder. Common people cultivated the habit of investing in industrial stock and a few depended entirely on the dividends from industry.

The picture did not remain so bright for long. A series of conflicts jeopardized the Victorian peace and prosperity – there were troubles in Canada and India. However, Queen Victoria emerged stronger and her policies proved to be a mixture of toughness and liberality. The Sepoy Mutiny in India in 1857 compelled the queen to be sensitive to the demands of justice and trust. She rose to the challenge and in her proclamation in 1858 promised “It is our further will that so far as may be, our subjects of whatever class or creed, be fully and freely admitted to any offices the duties of which they may be qualified by their education, abilities and integrity duly to discharge.”

The assertion of her independence and fairness is evident in this. The presence of such a wise queen together with long strides in commerce and industry made the Victorian age one of the best ages for the English people. They enjoyed peace at home, their children got the best of education and they had a healthy social life. They worked hard; they had a grasp of the affairs of the world; they were constantly modifying technology for better communication and facilities. And they remained deeply religious.

Yet the most serious crisis of the Victorian times occurred in the realm of religion. So far science had not disturbed their faith. But the publication of Charles Lyell’s Principles of Geology, 1830 and of Charles Darwin’s The Origin of Species, 1859 altered the scene.

Charles Lyell only studied the fossils and spoke of the great antiquity of Creation; Darwin accepted it and accounted on its basis for the differentiation of animal species by theory of Natural Selection. This was in direct conflict with the story of creation given in The Book of Genesis.

A storm rose and shook Christianity by roots. The Victorian intellectuals and writers, poets and novelists could not ignore the scientific basis of the theory of evolution propounded by Darwin. Faith was tinged with doubt; an attitudinal change had occurred, best expressed by Tennyson –

There remains more faith in honest doubt
Believe me than in half the creeds.

In view of such a spiritual crisis it would not be easy to sum up the Victorian age in a neat phrase. It was an age of prosperity, but also an age of gloomy forebodings; it was an age of imperial expansion, but also an age of colonial uprisings; above all, it was an age of peace, but there was an undercurrent of ‘sick hurry and divided aims.’

16.3 TENNYSON: LIFE AND WORKS

Alfred Tennyson was born in August 1809 in Lincolnshire where his father was a rector. It is said that the rectory had an enchanting landscape that moulded the aesthetic taste of Tennyson. Not only did he take in the beautiful topography of his birth place, he tried to compose lines that could match the sights and the sounds that he experienced as a child and as a young man.

Tennyson’s father had an academic bent of mind. He made the young boy learn Latin and Greek classics seriously. So when Tennyson came to Cambridge University in 1828 he had sufficient intellectual training to cope with the studies and other challenges of the legendary educational institution.

In Cambridge Tennyson became intimate with Arthur Hallam, the son of the eminent historian. Later on Mr. Hallam was engaged to Tennyson’s sister; he died, however, in Vienna on a trip with his father. Tennyson had already written poems that won distinction. But the death of Arthur Hallam shattered him. For some time he was dumb with grief and melancholy. Yet in this period he found poetic composition as a means of psychic relief. He composed short lyrics as his moods dictated him. This continued for a couple of years and the result was In Memoriam, a great elegiac poem. The poem is supposed to reflect not only the intense personal sorrow of the poet, but also to represent the chief conflict of the Victorian age – the conflict between science and religion.

The fact that Tennyson could transcend his personal losses and think in a systematic way about the larger concerns and issues of his age is of singular importance. It gives Tennyson’s poetry a lasting appeal.

The classical training that his father imparted to him remained a principal stimulus to Tennyson’s poetic life. He is one poet who chose a number of medieval and Greek legends as subjects for his works. But in all his works he tried to interpret the life of his times. In other words, the sense of historical continuity gives his perception of modern issues a sharper edge. His poetry makes the readers feel that there exists a sure fusion between the past and the present.

In 1850 Tennyson succeeded as the Poet Laureate and continued to publish poems some of which have political themes. Extensive travels in England and Europe – Holland, Belgium and Switzerland and – further sharpened his vision. He was able to think in a practical manner since he had first-hand experience of social, political and economic changes.

After a fulfilled life of a prolific poet he died in 1892 at the age of 83.

16.4 THE SPLENDOUR FALLS

The two lyrics prescribed for you are extracts from The Princess, a poem that Tennyson wrote in his mature years when British political and social issues began to interest him seriously. It is said that The Princess covers a number of prominent issues related to women their status, their field of action, their educational and political rights, legal rights of marriage and property. The protagonist of the poem is Ida, a princess who holds extreme feminist views. She has raised an academy for training of women.

Tennyson's characterization of Ida gives a clue to his attitude towards women. Ida is independent minded but in her zeal she has developed attitudes and a temper that make her unfit for reforms that she wishes to carry.

These two lyrics occur at dramatic moments in the narrative and were added by Tennyson in a subsequent edition. Actually, these two lyrics are supreme achievements of Tennyson and can be enjoyed independently.

The first lyric The Splendour Falls is a song that occurs after the narrator and others have had a magnificent view of the palace that the princess has shown them. The narrator is simply charmed by this view.

The second lyric is sung by a maid who is specifically ordered to entertain by the princess.

Then she, 'Let someone sing to us: lighter more
The minutes fledged with music': and a maid of those beside her, smote her harp, and sang

But the aftermath is quite ironic. In a fit of vanity the princess dismisses the tranquillizing effect of song:

She ended with such passion that the tear / she sang of, shook and fell, an erring pearl / lost in her bosom: but with some disdain / Answered the princess, 'If indeed there haunt / About the moulder's lodges of the past so sweet a voice and vague, fatal to men / well needs it we should cram our ears with wool.

This declamation on the part of the princess is spontaneous, of course. But the conviction with which she attacks melodious associations with the past is clear indication of her prejudices and haughtiness. All tenderness is anathema to her as it would interfere with her plans for women's emancipation.

16.4.1 The Poem

The Splendour Falls

The splendour falls on castle walls
 And snowy summits old in story:
 The long light shakes across the lakes,
 And the wild cataract leaps in glory.
 Blow, bugle, blow, set the wild echoes flying,
 Blow, bugle; answer, echoes, dying, dying, dying.

O hark, O hear! how thin and clear,
 And thinner, clearer, farther going!
 O sweet and far from cliff and scar
 The horns of Elfland faintly blowing!
 Blow, let us hear the purple glens replying:
 Blow, bugle; answer, echoes, dying, dying, dying.

O love, they die in you rich sky,
 They faint on hill or field or river:
 Our echoes roll from soul to soul,
 And grow for ever and for ever.
 Blow, bugle, blow, set the wild echoes flying,
 And answer, echoes answer, dying, dying, dying.

16.4.2 Glossary

- Splendour : grand and impressive beauty
Cataract : large steep waterfall
Elfland : an imaginary country where elves – small creatures with magical powers – are supposed to live
Glen : narrow valley

16.4.3 Discussion

The lyric is an essay in landscape painting. The scene is that of sunset transforming a castle and its surroundings. The speaker notices not only the fall of sunlight but also of a fall of splendour, of a glorious hue, on the walls of the castle. This initial perception is in itself a cause of ecstasy. But this is not all. Each moment that succeeds brings in bright vistas of everything around. The bright light makes the snowy towers of the castle shine gloriously and then travels to the lakes and the cataracts in course of which its dynamism is revealed. It shakes the waters of the lakes and makes the cataract leap in joy. So happy is the speaker in the enjoyment of this scene that he wants the bugle to be sounded, allowing a synchronization of light and sound to follow.

The important thing, you should notice, is the impact of this scene on the speaker. We see not only the light adding beauty and glory to the castle but also creating absolute cheerfulness. It is this cheerfulness that sharpens observation and stirs the speaker for further activity.

The second stanza hints at the presence of someone else who is asked to hear by the speaker the faintly blowing horns of the Elfland. The sounds are at first thin and clear, then thinner and clearer whose echoes can be heard in the fields lying across. There is apparently nothing to suggest time – interval. But the thin sound and the elfland point to the onset of twilight – the light is there still, but like sounds it is also dying, taking leave of the world.

The identity of the listener is finally revealed in the third stanza – the speaker is addressing his beloved. He asks her now to enjoy the fainting sound of the echoes. But he also asks her to observe how the echoes move not only from hill to field or to river, but from soul to soul where they grow eternally. This is a unique experience of something transient acquiring eternity by sheer beauty.

16.4.4 Appreciation

The world of Nature maintains a course of life which is quite independent of an individual’s way of life and experiences. And yet at times there may be an identity between the two. Tennyson captures such moments in his lyrics beautifully. A number of his lyrics are good examples of pathetic fallacy, of the world of Nature reflecting the moods of the poet or the persona.

You must take note of the role of the dynamic verbs which Tennyson uses to describe the moment-to-moment changes in the scene – falls, shakes, leaps, flying, dying, blowing, replying, flying. The light and the sounds are not static. They have their own natural movement which, in turn, affects the objects within their range. But more important is the impact they have on the speaker.

16.5 TEARS, IDLE TEARS

The popularity of this lyric is the proof of the value of its content. Though occurring in a dramatic context and sung by the maid of the princess as a routine duty it dwells on man’s feeling of loss which is the cause of the flow of tears. Tears express a feeling that may be spontaneous; but they may emerge from a powerful emotion that lies suppressed in humdrum life. Any touching sight can however bring it on the surface of consciousness and make us cry.

In The Princess the maid's song is surprisingly occasioned by the enchanting view of the palace. It must have created a feeling of awe and wonder in the maid also. But instead of bursting into a song that could express the shock of her delight, she chooses to sing a mournful song. The simplicity with which she touches on death and separation drawn not only a kindred feeling from the listeners; it makes them think of suffering as a vital fact of life.

16.5.1 Poem

Tears, idle tears, I know not what they mean,
Tears from the depth of some divine despair
Rise in the heart, and gather to the eyes,
In looking on the happy Autumn-fields,
And thinking of the days that are no more.

Fresh as the first beam glittering on a sail,
That brings our friends up from the underworld,
Sad as the last which reddens over one
That sinks with all we love below the verge;
So sad, so fresh, the days that are no more.

Ah, sad and strange as in dark summer dawns
The earliest pipe of half-awaken'd birds
To dying ears, when unto dying eyes
The casement slowly grows a glimmering square
So sad, so strange, the days that are no more.

Dear as remember'd kisses after death,
And sweet as those by hopeless fancy, feign'd
On lips that are for others; deep as love,
Deep as first love, and wild with all regret,
O Death in Life, the days that are no more.

16.5.2 Glossary

Autumn fields	:	fields full of ripening corn in autumn.
glittering	:	shining brightly
the underworld	:	the place under the earth where people are believed to go when they die glimmering	:	shining with a faint light
casement	:	a window

Similes

- fresh as the first beam glittering on a sail
- sad as the last which reddens over one
- sad and strange as in dark dawns
- Dear as remembered kisses after death

All these similes are quite unusual – they do not compare like objects; there is comparison between a state of mind and a natural phenomenon or a scene. Fresh, sad, strange, dear are adjectives which have been concretized in this way.

16.5.3 Discussion

The most arresting phrase in this lyric is divine despair, a paradoxical expression. Normally, despair cannot be linked with anything divine. To do so is to clearly refer to human limitation and this is what Tennyson does. The past cannot be recaptured. The tears that come to eyes spring from the realization that the happy days cannot be brought back.

Sadness became a part of Tennyson's life after the death of Arthur Hallam; but Tennyson was not lugubrious poet. He was reflective in nature, a person who took interest in philosophy and science. Naturally, every emotion to him was a subject of not only feeling but of study also. "I know not what they mean" – this line is indicative of the rational tendency that was always active in him. He makes therefore the speaker to understand the emotion behind the tears.

You should also notice that the tears have originated from a sight of the happy autumn fields, that is, of a seasonal movement that helps crops ripen and grow. It is this scene of richness and abundance that reminds of the like days that have slipped away. Happiness is locked only in memory now, lingering, of course, as a permanent feeling over which time have no control.

Do you notice a touch of irony in the phrase – idle tears? It can be a common sense version of becoming sentimental. But the things that are supposed to cause tears are not so insignificant. This creates a tension which adds to the merit of the poem. Why? Simply because the intellectual effort that is required to understand it makes the sentiment valuable.

After the tone has been set, the speaker goes on elaborating the qualities of the happy days which she is reminiscing. In the first place, they appear to be as fresh as the first sun rays falling on a ship. The freshness of the morning scene on a ship appears to Tennyson – from personal experience of voyages – to be more memorable. Memory alone helps a man bring back his friends from the underworld. But it is not only fresh, there is overwhelming sadness when the moment of loss is recaptured in totality.

There is abrupt change in the scene in the last two stanzas where the speaker alters the persona from a living person to that of one who is awaiting death. A dying person's sensitiveness to the music of the birds of the dawn is not lost, but the music seems to have become strange. The consciousness of leaving the world it is that makes the faculty of sight and hearing rather keener – to the dying eyes the big windows of the room seem to have become a glimmering square.

The perspective of death continues in the last stanza. The hint that the speaker is thinking not only of days that are no more, but also of a beloved who is no more is clear now – the kisses, the tokens of love, become painfully sweet; all fancies connected with love acquire a poignancy now. This what is Death in life – the condition of hopeless separation.

16.5.4 Appreciation

About popular pieces of creative writing it can be said that they touch universal chord. Being in a state of tears is quite normal for a person when he is separated from his love. And when this separation has been caused by death it is difficult to seek consolation. Tennyson takes up this very situation in this lyric in which he develops this very idea of being inconsolable, the idea of being in incurable unhappiness.

What sustains this short poem is a unique blend of argument and feeling. The feeling is justified by argument, by parallels also between the state of mind of the speaker and the immediate surroundings. The autumn fields, the beam glittering on a sail, the half-awakened birds constitute the immediate world of the speaker. They provoke the feelings of loss and stimulate the memory.

The cadence is created by simple, familiar monosyllabic words – so sad, so strange, so fresh, thinking, glimmering, glittering are not exactly alliterative, but they weave a pattern of evanescence which is part of the theme.

16.6 ULYSSES

Ulysses is also known as Odysseus. He was a king of Ithaca and he participated in the Greek war against Troy. After the siege of Troy he was returning home along with a number of soldiers in a ship. But he had angered Poseidon who, in turn, caused tempests and many obstructions that forced Ulysses to wander to many places. His wife Penelope and his son Telemachus were anxiously waiting for his arrival. In fact, Telemachus had already left home in search of his father.

The poem tells us that Ulysses is close to Ithaca. In spite of being so close to his home he is not happy. His wanderings have been quite fruitful as he came into contact with people of different countries from whom he gathered a lot of knowledge. He has now a feeling that he should continue this pursuit of knowledge. To lead a peaceful life at home would be quite a dull thing. He is also worried about his subjects who love only pleasure and care for material things.

Ulysses however hopes that his son can be taught to handle the political affairs and give a new orientation to his people. And after his son is ready, Ulysses will have time for more wanderings in order to have more knowledge.

This love for knowledge in a king who has suffered a lot not only makes the character of Ulysses distinguished; it gives a philosophical edge to the poem and takes us to a glorious aspect of Greek civilization. There is a grandeur in this quest for knowledge which touches us.

16.6.1 Poem

Ulysses

IT little profits that an idle king,
 By this still hearth, among these barren crags,
 Match'd with an aged wife, I mete and dole
 Unequal laws unto a savage race,
 That hoard, and sleep, and feed, and know not me.
 I cannot rest from travel: I will drink
Life to the lees: all times I have enjoy'd Greatly, have suffer'd greatly, both with those
 That loved me, and alone; on shore, and when Thro' scrudding drifts the rainy Hyades 10
Vext the dim sea: I am become a name;
 For always roaming with a hungry heart
 Much have I seen and known; cities of men
 And manners, climates, councils, governments,
 Myself not least, but honour's of them all;
 And drunk delight of battle with my peers,
 Far on the ringing plains of windy Troy.
 I am a part of all that I have met;
 Yet all experience is an arch wherethro'
 Gleams that untravell'd world, whose margin fades 20
 For ever and for ever when I move.
 How dull it is to pause, to make an end,
 To rust unburnish'd, not to shine in use!
 As tho' to breath were life. Life piled on life

Were all too little, and of one to me
 Little remains: but every hour is saved
 From that eternal silence, something more,
 A bringer of new things; and vile it were
 For some three suns to store and hoard myself,
 And this grey spirit yearning in desire 30
 To follow knowledge, like a sinking star,
 Beyond the utmost bound of human thought.
 This is my son, mine own Telemachus,
 To whom I leave the sceptre and the isle
 Well-loved of me, discerning to fulfil
 This labour, by slow prudence to make mild
 A rugged people, and thro' soft degrees
 Subdue them to the useful and the good.
 Most blameless is he, centred in the sphere
 Of common duties, decent not to fail 40
 In offices of tenderness, and pay
 Meet adoration to my household gods,
 When I am gone. He works his work, I mine.
 There lies the port: the vessel puffs her sail:
 There gloom the dark broad seas. My mariners,
 Souls that have toil'd, and wrought, and thought with me
 That ever with a frolic welcome took
 The thunder and the sunshine, and opposed
 Free hearts, free foreheads-you and I are old;
 Old age hath yet his honour and his toil; 50
 Death closes all: but something are the end,
 Some work of noble note, may yet be done,
 Not unbecoming men that strove with Gods.
 The lights begin to twinkle from the rocks:
 The long day wanes: the slow moon climbs: the deep Moans round with many voices. Come, my friends,
 'Tis not too late to seek a newer world.
 Push off, and sitting well in order smite
 The sounding furrows; for my purpose holds
 To sail beyond the sunset, and the baths
 Of all the western stars, until I die.
 It may be that the gulfs will wash us down:
 It may be we shall touch the Happy Isles
 And see the great Achilles, whom we knew.
 Tho' much is taken, much abides; and tho'
 We are not now that strength which in old days
 Moved earth and heaven; that which we are, we are;
 One equal temper of heroic hearts,
 Made weak by time and fate, but strong in will
 To strive, to seek, to find, and not to yield.

16.6.2 Glossary

- mete and dole : to distribute
I will drink life to the lees : I will experience life to its full extent

scudding drifts	: drifting waves
Hyades	: nymphs forming a group of seven stars in the head of Taurus
Sceptre	: a staff which is the symbol of royal authority
sounding furrows	: loud stormy waves
Achilles	: the greatest of Greek heroes

16.6.3 Discussion

The poem begins with the early formulations of thoughts of Ulysses as he nears Ithaca. His memory of his wife, country and his people is clearer – he sees his wife now as an old woman; his own country not so flourishing as he left; and he is quite unhappy with his subjects whose life is centered in physical and material pleasures. He cannot imagine himself now becoming part of this listless scene in his country. It is true that he has suffered; but what he has seen by way of people and civilizations has filled him with great curiosity – he has learnt much that has transformed him from a mere king and a fighter to a man who wishes to understand the forces of this creation. He has met all classes of beings, peculiar men, gods and goddesses and this experience has already enriched him. He cannot think of being settled in a place and taking care of mundane things. He fondly remembers the things that he has seen and thinks of his personality as being moulded by them all. Has he seen all? He is convinced that this universe does not allow any body to see all – it is so constructed that only a part of the vast universe can come to a man's view.

He visualizes his ideas in the form of similes and metaphors – all experience is an arch, to follow knowledge, like a sinking star. The horizon is symbolized in the arch, the visible junction of the earth and the sky. There is a definite hint that this small view is not the full view; its imperfection is quite perceptible. And the sinking star is Ulysses himself, battered by war, age and sundry worries of the world. Yet the task of gathering more and more knowledge seems to him the only proper goal of life. There is a nobility in this craving that sets Ulysses quite apart not only from his subjects but also from other kings who have been interested in mere territorial conquests.

Had it been merely a wish it would not have been of any importance. But the thoughts of Ulysses are backed by determination – he has made up his mind to hand over the rule of the kingdom to his son, Telemachus, in whose abilities he has full confidence; he has also a hope that his subjects may be subdued by Telemachus in due course and their energies could be channelized in the right direction. He is also certain that Telemachus would be fulfilling all religious duties after his death.

Finally, he addresses his fellow mariners who have given their best to all his undertakings and exhorts them to seek a newer world. That is, he wants them not to be satisfied with a dull domestic life, but to explore new worlds that would broaden their view of life. He knows very well that they are also getting old like him. But it is better to end this life in the pursuit of greater knowledge than of material happiness.

16.6.4 Appreciation

It is a wonderful poem in which Tennyson makes a historical speaker touch upon issues of contemporary life. It is a fact that Ulysses was a legendary wanderer, an adventurous, fearless person who was forced by circumstances to go to strange places and meet strange people.

Tennyson therefore sees in him the prototype of the modern researcher or explorer. The scientific developments of his time were a thing of serious interest to him, and in his poetry he has paid tribute to the spirit of scientists and researchers who were expanding the area of human knowledge. In Ulysses, Tennyson sees such a figure who is willing to devote the whole of his life to exploration.

The poem has a dramatic structure – the development of the speech of Ulysses is entirely guided by the progress of his thoughts in course of his journey to Ithaca. The first point is the coming of the landmarks of Ithaca into his sight which stirs his memory; the second point is the rise of a conflict in his mind between his kingly duties and his appetite for knowledge which he acquired in the course of his wanderings; the third forms his decision in the fulfillment of which he seeks cooperation from his mariners.

As far as possible Tennyson tries to recapture the Homeric idiom– simple similes, a vigorous narrative style with appropriate pauses and shifts of mood and characterization through a long speech. A lot of associations are there in the poem with the ship and the voyages – shore, scudding drifts, vessel, sail, dark broad seas, sounding furrows, gulfs. They form the register of an accomplished voyager, ringing with authenticity of experience.

The command of blank verse is an important feature of the poem. It helps Tennyson follow every movement of the feelings and thoughts of Ulysses in a dramatic manner.

17.0 OBJECTIVES

In this unit you will be reading two well-known poems of Robert Browning. These poems will give you an understanding of Browning's poetry which holds a distinguished place because of its optimistic note.

On reading this Unit you will be able to:

- appreciate the distinctive qualities of Browning's poetry and art;
- understand dramatic monologue which Browning exploited to portray the tensions within a character's psyche;
- understand the differences between Tennyson and Browning, the poets who were products of the same age.

17.1 INTRODUCTION

Robert Browning was only three years younger than Tennyson. And yet the differences between the two poets are so big that they seem to be writing in two different ages.

Tennyson, you must have seen, is basically an emotional poet, responding to the beauty and pain of life. His involvement with the polemics of his times was also deep: he was as much concerned with politics of democracy as with scientific researches of his time that had begun to instil doubts into the minds of the people. Robert Browning's concerns were never so comprehensive. An intense personal life made him inclined to study characters belonging to aristocracy, the priestly and the artistic classes in whom he noticed contradictions and paradoxes but also a zest for life.

He wrote a few lyrics in which you will notice the argumentative tone of John Donne. But he is chiefly famous for his dramatic monologues, a few too long to be read in one sitting. These poems are generally about Italian figures from different classes of the society. Their passions, adventures and tensions create a lot of interest: they do touch upon issues of morality and psychology but Browning takes them in his stride and does not let us feel disturbed. This cheerful spirit of Browning has endeared him to modern poets though his poems are considered to be difficult on account of wide-ranging allusions.

17.2 ROBERT BROWNING: LIFE AND WORKS

Robert Browning was born in 1812. His father worked in the Bank of England and was a man of literary interests. He had a vast collection of books in his personal library. Robert Browning’s mother was a nice musician. It was natural for Robert Browning to be interested in literature and music. Before he entered University College, London he had acquired proficiency in French, Italian, Greek and Latin. However, he left the college without a degree.

In his youth Browning was greatly influenced by Shelley – his poetry and his atheism. He did not remain an atheist for long but he continued to be a radical like Shelley. In 1845, Browning met Elizabeth Barrett in London. When her father objected to their marriage, they eloped to Italy, the country that fascinated Browning.

Browning had started writing quite early. His first published work was a long poem – Pauline in which he tried to imitate Shelley’s style. He attracted critical attention by Men and Women in 1855. The Ring and The Book is an ambitious poem of his in which he justified the ways of God through extended blank verse monologues. These were greatly admired by Ezra Pound and T.S. Eliot.

His dramatic monologues portray a great variety of characters speaking to a silent listener about themselves at some important moment in their lives. It is not actually what they say that is important, more important are the things which they do not speak of directly but which are revealed through their tone and the implications of what they think and do. Browning died in 1889 and was buried in Westminster Abbey.

17.3 POEM: SOLILOQUY OF ‘THE SPANISH CLOISTER’

Gr-r-r – there go, my heart’s abhorrence!
 Water your damned flower-pots, do!
 If hate killed men, Brother Lawrence,
 God’s blood, would not mine kill you!
 What? your myrtle-bush wants trimming?
 Oh, that rose has prior claims –
 Need its leaden vase filled brimming?
 Hell dry you up with its flames!

At the meal we sit together
Salve tibi! I must hear
 Wise talk of the kind of weather,
 Sort of season, time of year:
 Not a plenteous cork-crop: scarcely
 Dare we hope oak-galls, I doubt:
 What’s the Latin name for ‘parsley’?
 What’s the Greek name for Swine’s Snout?

Whew! We’ll have our platter burnished,
 Laid with care on our own shelf!
 With a fire-new spoon we’re furnished,
 And a goblet for ourself,
 Rinsed like something sacrificial
 Ere ’tis fit to touch our chaps –
 Marked with L for our initial!
 (He-he! There his lily snaps!)

Saint, forsooth! While brown Dolores
 Squats outside the Convent bank
 With Sanchicha, telling stories,
 Steeping tresses in the tank,
 Blue-black, lustrous, thick like horsehairs
 - Can't I see his dead eye glow,
 Bright as 'twere a Barbary corsair's?
 (That is, if he'd let it show!)

When he finishes refection,
 Knife and fork he never lays
 Cross-wise, to my recollection,
 As do I, in Jesu's praise
 I the Trinity illustrate,
 Drinking watered orange-pulp –
 In three sips the Arian frustrate;
 While he drains his at one gulp.

Oh, those melons? If he's able
 We're to have a feast! so nice!
 One goes to the Abbot's table,
 All of us get each a slice.
 How go on your flowers? None double?
 Not one fruit-sort can you spy?
 Strange! – And I, too, at such trouble,
 Keep them close-nipped on the sly!

There's a great text in Galatians,
 Once you trip on it, entails
 Twenty-nine distinct damnations,
 One sure, if another fails.
 If I trip him just a-dying,
 Sure of heaven as sure can be,
 Spin him round and send him flying
 Off to hell, a Manichee?

8

Or, my scrofulous French novel
 On grey paper with blunt type!
 Simply glance at it, you grovel
 Hand and foot in Belial's gripe:
 If I double down its pages
 At the woeful sixteenth print,
 When he gathers his greengages,
 Ope a sieve and slip it in't?

Or, there's Satan! – one might venture
 Pledge one's soul to him, yet leave
 Such a flaw in the indenture
 As he'd miss till, past retrieve,
 Blasted lay that rose-acacia
 We're so proud of! Hy, Zy, Hine ...
 'St, there's Vespers! Plena gratia
 Ave, Virgo! Gr-r-r – you swine!

17.3.2 Discussion

The portraiture of ecclesiastical figures in a comic and satiric light has been in vogue in English literature since Chaucer who, through his prioress and monk, drew attention to their inadequacies, their virtual unsuitability for such duties because of their indulgence in material pursuits and luxurious living.

Robert Browning also observed the life of many persons working in the church. He found it in direct conflict with the principles and the code of conduct of the church. And yet as was his wont he expressed his disapproval in a gentle and humorous manner, taking misdemeanour in quite a light way.

In this poem the anonymous Spanish monk's attempt to denigrate his fellow monk, Lawrence, is a successful exercise in dramatic irony, the many allegations of the speaker reflecting actually his own flawed character. The speaker, in a bitter upsurge of jealousy, tries to tear apart Lawrence through the details of his routine activities – gardening, dining habits, conversation, love affairs and Christian duties. But anger and envy are in themselves unchristian feelings, exposing the character of the speaker himself. Lawrence is portrayed as a glutton and as a person of loose morals, carrying out a clandestine affair with one or two local women. But the very tone in which these allegations are made point to the lapses of the speaker in all these areas.

In the last two stanzas the speaker declares his intention of further damning the soul of Lawrence. This is again an unchristian desire. A true Christian must try for salvation of individuals: he is not to do anything that leads to damnation. Moreover, the means that the cloister speaks of – the French novels – suggest that he is himself hooked on to such reading to satisfy his vicarious urges.

A sort of progress of the evil thoughts of the cloister is discernible in this poem of nine stanzas. In the first stanza he speaks of the healthy gardening activities of Lawrence that provoke him into a spiteful mood – Hell dry you up with its flames. This is quite unwarranted as Lawrence is shown doing his work with great care. Then follows the lunch-time scene in which Lawrence is shown as a glutton but also as a skilled conversationalist. In fact, a glutton rarely shows interest in conversation while he is gorging on food. There is thus a discrepancy between facts and cloister's reporting that catches our attention. The reference to Dolores and Sanchicha, the two local women, shows that the speaker is himself enamoured of their 'tresses blue black lustrous'. The details of theological debates in the course of drinking fruit-juices are amusing. And more damning are the plans of trapping Lawrence by inciting him to read French novels. Finally, in the last stanza, there is direct invocation of Satan, an act that is against Christian faith.

17.3.3 Appreciation

The poem reminds of the personal satires written by Dryden and Pope. But Robert Browning takes one step further in making the speaker an object of satire. This is possible because of the dramatic monologue form where the speaker's tone yields an insight into his own character. Technically speaking, this poem is not a dramatic monologue as there is no listener here. It is a soliloquy. But the variation of tone and mood resembles the style of dramatic monologue, and there is a focus on the temperament and the character of the speaker.

A more significant thing, you should notice, is the use of Lawrence's voice also, creating a dramatic interval within the poem, enabling us to compare the two voices, that is, of the Spanish cloister and of Lawrence.

The use of colloquial phrases – there go, my heart's abhorrence, oh, that rose has prior claims, oh, those melons! – help the reader recreate every movement of the scene from the garden to the dining table. They also provide a glimpse into the changing mood of the speaker from anger to mirthful jest. They are a means of striking communication with the reader at an informal level.

There are high sounding words and phrases also – Jesus praise, the Trinity, Arian, Galatians, Manichee – connected with the Bible and the theological debates of the Victorian age. They make only pompous statement, a show on the part of the speaker of his acquaintance with controversies of his time. A monk who joined the church to enjoy the pleasures of life without honest work had to justify his position by these tricks.

Anyway, the poem is an entertaining piece – a triumph of poetic art that could present something ridiculous in style.

17.4 POEM: ANDREA DEL SARTO

Andrea del Sarto

(Called 'The Faultless Painter')

But do not let us quarrel any more,
 No, my Lucrezia; bear with me for once:
 Sit down and all shall happen as you wish.
 You turn your face, but does it bring your heart?
 I'll work then for your friend's friend, never fear,
 Treat his own subject after his own way,
 Fix his own time, accept too his own price,
 And shut the money into this small hand
 When next it takes mine. Will it? tenderly?
 Oh, I'll content him, – but to-morrow, Love!
 I often am much wearier than you think,
 This evening more than usual, and it seems
 As if – forgive now – should you let me sit
 Here by the window with your hand in mine
 And look a half-hour forth on Fiesole,
 Both of one mind, as married people use,
 Quietly, quietly the evening through,
 I might get up to-morrow to my work
 Cheerful and fresh as ever. Let us try.
 To-morrow, how you shall be glad for this!
 Your soft hand is a woman of itself,
 And mine the man's bared breast she curls inside.
 Don't count the time lost, neither; you must serve
 For each of the five pictures we require:
 It saves a model. So! keep looking so –
 My serpentine beauty, rounds on rounds!
 – How could you ever prick those perfect ears.
 Even to put the pearl there! oh, so sweet –
 My face, my moon, my everybody's moon,
 Which everybody looks on and calls his,
 And, I suppose, is looked by in turn,
 While she looks – no one's: very dear, no less.
 You smile? why, there's my picture read made,
 There's what we painters call our harmony!
 A common greyness silvers everything –
 All in a twilight, you and I alike
 – You, at the point of your first pride in me
 (That's gone you know), – but I, at every point;
 My youth, my hope, my art, being all toned down
 To younder sober pleasant Fiesole.
 There's the bell clinking from the chapel-top;
 That length of convent-wall across the way
 Holds the trees safer, huddled more inside;
 The last monk leaves the garden; days decrease,
 And autumn grows, autumn in every-thing.
 Eh? the who'e seems to fall into a shape

As if I saw alike my work and self
 And all that I was born to be and do,
 A twilight-piece. Love, we are in God's hand.
 How strange now, looks the life he makes us lead;
 So free we seem, so fettered fast we are!
 I feel he laid the fetter: let it lie!
 This chamber for example – turn your head –
 All that's behind us! You don't understand
 Nor care to understand about my art,
 But you can hear at least when people speak:
 And that cartoon, the second from the door
 – It is the thing, Love! so such things should be –
 Behold Madonna! – I am bold to say
 I can do with my pencil what I know,
 What I see, what at bottom of my heart
 I wish for, if I ever wish so deep –
 Do easily, too – when I say, perfectly,
 I do not boast, perhaps: yourself are judge,
 Who listened to the Legate's talk last week,
 And just as much they used to say in France.
 At any rate 'tis easy, all of it!
 No sketches first, no studies, that's long post:
 I do what many dream of, all their lives,
 – Dream? strive to do, and agonize to do,
 And fail in doing, I could count twenty such
 On twice your fingers, and not leave this town,
 Who strive – you don't know how the others strive
 To paint a little thing like that you smeared
 Carelessly passing with your robes afloat, –
 Yet do much less, so much less, Someone says,
 (I know his name, no matter) – so much less!
 Well, less is more, Lucrezia: I am judged.
 There burns a truer light of God in them,
 In their vexed beating stuffed and stopped-up brain,
 Heart, or whate'er else, than goes on to prompt
 This low-pulsed forthright craftsman's hand of mine.
 Their works drop groundward, but themselves, I know,
 Reach many a time a heaven that's shut to me,
 Enter and take their place there sure enough,
 Though they come back and cannot tell the world.
 My works are nearer heaven, but I sit here.
 The sudden blood of these men! at a word –
 Praise them, it boils, or blame them, it boils too.
 I, painting from myself and to myself,
 Know what I do, am unmoved by men's blame
 Or their praise either. Somebody remarks
 Morello's outline there is wrongly traced,
 His hue mistaken; what of that? or else,
 Rightly traced and well ordered; what of that?
 Speak as they please, what does the mountain care?
 Ah, but a man's reach should exceed his grasp.

Or what's a heaven for? All is silver-grey,
 Placid and perfect with my art: the worse!
 I know both what I want and what might gain,
 And yet how profitless to know, to sigh
 'Had I been two, another and myself,
 'Our head would have overlooked the world!' No doubt.
 Yonder's a work now, of that famous youth
 The Urbinate who died five years ago.
 ('Tis copied, George Vasari sent it me.)
 Well, I can fancy how he did it all,
 Pouring his soul, with kings and popes to see,
 Reaching, that heaven might so replenish him,
 Above and through his art – for it gives way;
 That arm is wrongly put – and there again –
 A fault to pardon in the drawing's line,
 Its body, so to speak: its soul is right,
 He means right – that, a child may understand.
 Still, what an arm! and I could alter it:
 But all the play, the insight and the stretch –
 Out of me, out of me! And wherefore out?
 Had you enjoined them on me, given me soul,
 We might have risen to Rafael, I and you!
 Nay, Love, you did give all I asked, I think –
 More than I merit, yes, by many times.
 But had you – oh, with the same perfect brow,
 And perfect eyes, and more than perfect mouth,
 And the low voice my soul hears, as a bird
 The fowler's pipe, and follows to the snare –
 Had you, with these the same, but brought a mind!
 Some women do so. Had the mouth there urged
 'God and the glory! never care for gain.
 'The present by the future, what is that?
 'Live for fame, side by side with Agnolo!
 'Rafael is waiting: up to God, all three!
 'I might have done it for you. So it seems:
 Perhaps not. All is as God over-rules.
 Beside, incentives come from the soul's self;
 The rest avail not. Why do I need you?
 What wife had Rafael, or has Agnolo?
 In this world, who can do a thing, will not;
 And who would do it, cannot, I perceive: Yet the will's somewhat – somewhat, too, the power –
 And thus we half-men struggle. At the end,
 God, I conclude, compensates, punishes.
 'Tis safer for me, if the award be strict,
 That I am something underrated here,
 Poor this long while, despised, to speak the truth.
 I dared not, do you know, leave home all day,
 For fear of chancing on the Paris lords.
 The best is when they pass and look aside;
 But they speak sometimes; I must bear it all.

Well may they speak! That Francis, that first time,
 And that long festal year at Fontainebleau!
 I surely then could sometimes leave the ground,
 Put on the glory, Rafael's daily wear,
 In that humane great monarch's golden look, –
 One finger in his beard or twisted curl
 Over his mouth's good mark that made the smile,
 One arm about my shoulder, round my neck,
 The jingle of his gold chain in my ear,
 I painting proudly with his breath on me,
 All his court round him, seeing with his eyes,
 Such frank French eyes, and such a fire of souls
 Profuse, my hand kept plying by those hearts, –
 And, best of all, this, this, this face beyond,
 This in the background, waiting on my work,
 To crown the issue with a last reward!
 A good time, was it not, my kingly days?
 And had you not grown restless but I know
 'Tis done and past; 'twas right, my instinct said;
 Too live the life grew, golden and not grey,
 And I'm the weak-eyed bat no sun should tempt
 Out of the grange whose four walls make his world.
 How could it end in any other way?
 You called me, and I came home to your heart.
 The triumph was – to reach and stay there; since
 I reached it ere the triumph, what is lost?
 Let my hands frame your face in your hair's gold,
 You beautiful Lucrezia that are mine!
 'Rafael did this, Andrea painted that;
 'The Roman's is the better when you pray,
 'But still the other's Virgin was his wife –
 Men will excuse me. I am glad to judge
 Both pictures in your presence; clearer grows
 My better fortune, I resolve to think.
 For, do you know, Lucrezia, as God lives,
 Said one day Agnolo, his very self,
 To Rafael I have known it all these years
 (When the young man was flaming out his thoughts
 Upon a palace-wall for Rome to see,
 Too lifted up in heart because of it)
 'Friend, there's a certain sorry little scrub
 'Goes up and down our Florence, none cares how,
 'Who, were he set to plan and execute
 'As you are, pricked on by your popes and kings,
 'Would bring the sweat into that brow of yours!
 'To Rafael's! – And indeed the arm is wrong.
 I hardly dare yet, only you to see,
 Give that chalk here – quick, thus the line should go!
 Ay, but the soul! he's Rafael! rub it out!
 Still, all I care for, if he spoke the truth,
 (What he? why, who but Michel Agnolo?

Do you forget already words like those?)
If really there was such a chance, so lost, –
Is, whether you're – not grateful – but more pleased.
Well, let me think so. And you smile indeed!
This hour has been an hour! Another smile?
If you would sit thus by me every night
I should work better, do you comprehend?
I mean that I should earn more, give you more.
See, it is settled dusk now; there's a star;
Morello's gone, the watch-lights show the wall,
The cue-owls speak the name we call them by.
Come from the window, love, – come in, at last,
Inside the melancholy little house
We built to be so gay with. God is just.
King Francis may forgive me: oft at nights
When I look up from painting, eyes tired out,
The walls become illumined, brick from brick
Distinct, instead of mortar, fierce bright gold,
That gold of his I did cement them with!
Let us but love each other. Must you go?
That Cousin here again? he waits outside?
Must see you – you, and not with me?
Those loans?
More gaming debts to pay? you smiled for that?
Well, let smiles buy me! have you more to spend?
While hand and eye and something of heart
Are left me, work's my ware, and what's it worth?
I'll pay my fancy. Only let me sit
The grey remainder of the evening out, Idle, you call it, and muse perfectly
How I could paint, were I but back in France,
One picture, just one more – the Virgin's face,
Not yours this time! I want you at my side
To hear them – that is, Michel Agnolo –
Judge all I do and tell you of its worth,
Will you? To-morrow, satisfy your friend.
I take the subjects for his corridor,
Finish the portrait out of hand – there, there,
And throw him in another thing or two
If he demurs; the whole should prove enough
To pay for this same Cousin's freak. Beside,
What's better and what's all I care about,
Get you the thirteen scrudi for the ruff!
Love, does that please you? Ah, but what does he,
The Cousin! what does he to please you more?
I am grown peaceful as old age tonight.
I regret little, I would change still less.
Since there my past life lies, why alter it?
The very wrong to Francis! – it is true
I took his coin, was tempted and complied,
And built this house and sinned, and all is said.
My father and my mother died of want.

Well, had I riches of my own? you see
 How one gets rich! Let each one bear his lot.
 They were born poor, lived poor and poor they died:
 And I have laboured somewhat in my time
 And not been paid profusely. Some good son
 Paint my two hundred pictures let him try!
 No doubt, there's something strikes a balance. Yes,
 You loved me quite enough, it seems tonight.
 This must suffice me here. What would one have?
 In heaven, perhaps, new chances, one more chance –
 Four great walls in the New Jerusalem,
 Meted on each side by the angel's reed,
 For Leonard, Rafael, Agnolo and me
 To cover – the three first without a wife,
 While I have mine! So – still they over-come
 Because there's still Lucrezia, – as I choose.
 Again the Cousin's whistle! Go, my Love.

17.4.1 Glossary

- Wearier : more tired
Fiesole : a beautiful town in the north of Florence where Andrea del Sarto is settled
Serpentining : like a coiled serpent, also very glossy
Fettered : bound by chains, not in a position to move freely
Madonna : a statue or painting of Virgin Mary, the mother of Jesus
Agnolo : Michael Angelo, the Renaissance Italian painter

17.4.2 Discussion

Andrea del Sarto, called the faultless painter for his technical perfection, was the court painter of king Francis of France, in the sixteenth century. The king sent him with large funds to Italy to purchase Italian works of art. But Andrea del Sarto settled in a comfortable house in Florence with that money and never returned to France. Although Michael Angelo and Raphael were legendary painters of Italy at this time, Andrea del Sarto earned distinction for his minute attention to details. He was therefore called the faultless painter, that is a painter in whose work everything was in perfect order.

The long poem is an example of dramatic monologue. On an evening when Andrea del Sarto is with his wife, Lucrezia, he turns introspective, thinks of his successful career, his betrayal of the French king and, basically, of a serious drawback of his that does not let him have a higher inspiration inspite of technical superiority. And he concludes that his mercenary outlook and his anxiety to keep his wife satisfied are the reasons behind his being at this low level in the world of art. A tone that alters between elation over achievement and then of frustration over a major failure dramatizes the mental conflict of Andrea del Sarto and lays bare several layers of his consciousness.

The pathetic appeal – do not let us quarrel any more – with which the poem begins is an index of Andrea del Sarto's state of mind. He further requests

Lucrezia to come closer to him so that he could watch Fiesole from the window of his house in a posture of intimacy and wake up the next day cheerful and fresh and finish a painting exactly according to the terms of the commission. It would be a great satisfaction for Andrea del Sarto to put 'the money into this small hand'. While art has been a means of livelihood for many, Andrea del Sarto knows very well that he built up his career by fraud: he took money from Francis in the name of purchasing paintings but he used it to construct a house for himself and to fulfil the needs of his wife.

This knowledge or this feeling of guilt has brought no perceptible change in the outlook of Andrea del Sarto. To save a little money on a model he can use Lucrezia to whom his attachment is almost slavish.

For a moment, as he looks out of the window, at the beauty of Fiesole, he hears the last bells of the church and feels the chill of autumn in the wind. He can see lucidly 'autumn in everything', that is, an inevitable decay of powers, faculties and creativity. In this moment he can view all his work as being 'a twilight piece', that is, lacking brightness and splendour. This is to suggest that this specific moment is the articulation of an experience that has been with him for a long time. He has been living with this sense of failure for long and it is only now that he finds a release in these terms.

Andrea never forgets the supreme worth of the paintings of Raphael, Leonardo da Vinci and Michaelangelo simply for the reason that their works were inspired from an inner source. That source has dried up in Andrea del Sarto. He can very carefully draw something, making it exact and accurate. But the insight that leads to production of great work of art is out of his grasp. To be acutely conscious of this lapse comes from an understanding of art. And it is quite pathetic to note that an artist, in spite of being conscious of this flaw in him, can never overcome it.

To add to this note of pathos there is the infidelity of his wife who has fallen for a cousin, waiting to give a slip to her husband, come out and meet him. Andrea cannot have any restraining influence over his wife. So he has to come to terms with this also and he would rather let his wife enjoy this affair than quarrel openly with her. His degradation is complete. He may take satisfaction in being called a faultless painter, but his life is in a shambles.

17.4.3 Appreciation

As a poet Robert Browning possessed a keen insight in every aspect of art – the devotion that an artist should have towards his work, the mastery over the craft and a moral outlook. Without these three elements the work of an artist would be lacking in vitality and purpose. But his long association with poets, painters and musicians, which Italy had in abundance, gave him acquaintance with the shady side of artistic business also. He must have learnt with pain that an artist could perform for sheer mercenary motives and nothing else. The success could be valuable in terms of monetary gain and fame, but in the process the artist destroyed himself. It is this experience of the moral failure of the artist which is central to the poem.

The poem is a confession on the part of Andrea del Sarto who had great artistic promise. But he was ruined by one basic flaw – he could not devote himself to art. He further compromised his integrity by cheating King Francis and by attaching himself to a woman to whom money and pleasure counted above everything.

Andrea del Sarto admits to have sold himself to keep Lucrezia satisfied. But is she satisfied? The betrayal to art and to the patron king haunts him back now not only in the sense of failure as an artist, but as a failure in life as a whole. An artist has his life in art – it is art alone that is his controlling destiny. To forget art and to lose oneself in materialistic pursuits is to move towards death.

Apart from presenting a case-study of Andrea del Sarto in such self-deprecating terms the poem is a verdict on a class of artists who allow themselves to be trapped either by sensual pleasures or material ambitions. Art is simply incompatible with physicality or materialism. Beyond the details of craft, art has a spiritual centre, a view of life of man and nature. This view remains open only to those artists who remain committed to the principle of art, to its spirituality.

Appearing to be comic, ironical and light-hearted, the poem is vindication of this doctrine of art. Robert Browning’s mastery of poetic voice is evidently of a moral nature only disguised in banter and ridicule. Many words and phrases – serpentina, I am judged, a truer light of God, nearer heaven – have a biblical ring. They suggest Andrea’s religious background which has been obliterated by his own acts. There is the memory of Dr. Faustus in his last moment realization – Love, we are in God’s hand/ so free we seem, so fettered fast we are.

17.5 LET US SUM UP

In this unit we studied:

- the life and works of Robert Browning, noting the dramatic monologue that he developed.
- the two poems in which Robert Browning’s contribution to dramatic monologue is well-represented.

17.6 SUGGESTED READING

For further studies in Robert Browning you can refer to the following works: -
W.C. De Vane, A Browning Hand Book, John Murray, 1955
Robert Langbaum, The Poetry of Experience, Chatto, 1957
Ian Jack, Browning’s Major Poetry, Oxford University Press, 1973
J. Briston, Robert Browning, Harvester, 1991

Self-check Exercise I

- 1) Go through the second stanza of the poem. The topics of conversation are mentioned; on the basis of that develop your own idea. A part of it is continued in the sixth stanza also.
- 2) The details of various food-items and drinks are given in the fifth and the sixth stanzas.
- 3) Take help of the last part of Discussion.

Self-check Exercise II

- 1) Andrea del Sarto is presented as an artist who has sacrificed art for commercial success. At the root of this is, however, his passion for Lucrezia, his wife, to whom only pleasure and fashionable living matter. It is to keep her happy that Andrea pocketed the money give to him by King Francis; he constructed a house in Fiesole with this money and turned to a style of painting that could bring him quick success. He creates demand by working hard and maintaining a high level of accuracy in matters of form. The formal perfection appeals immediately to the public who acclaim him for being technically perfect.

But Andrea had good training. At this height of his career he comes to realize that his so-called perfection is a ruse to cheat the people. It is not an outcome of following the artistic principle. There is thus a great sense of honesty in his admission. Moreover, his references to Michaelangelo and other great painters reveal the understanding of spiritual foundation of art.

Andrea is, therefore, filled with remorse, guilt and a painful realization of truth together with a very frustrating sense of complete incapacity. His submission to the fancies and adventures of his wife makes him a farcical figure, though his sense of guilt does elevate him a little.

- 2) See the early parts of Discussion.
- 4) Consult Appreciation.
- 6) Browning is basically different from Tennyson in retaining an optimistic view of life, in developing dramatic monologue, in the range of his characters, and in keeping himself untouched by the religious-political issues that were being hotly debated in England.

18.0 OBJECTIVES

After reading this unit you will be able to:

- Write about Matthew Arnold's life and work;
- Discuss Matthew Arnold's poetry in detail with special reference to:
 - i) The Strayed Reveller
 - ii) The Scholar-Gypsy

18.1 INTRODUCTION

In this unit we have discussed Arnold's life in brief as in case of any individual the experience of life certainly shapes the nature of his or her work at least to a certain extent. The two poems discussed here are two of Arnold's choicest creations.

The first poem, though it exhibits a good deal of poetical power, and occasionally depth of thought is often criticised for having either no subject, or being obscure in its subject. It sometimes reads in large part as a versified essay in criticism. It contains much commentary on poets and poetry.

The second poem, "The scholar Gypsy" is considered to be a poem that was based on Joseph Glanvill's recount of 'The Vanity of Dogmatizing'. It opens up on an afternoon in the month of August with the poet recounting his usual chores. It's a lovely poem that showcases the beauty of pastoral chores and life during this century.

18.2 MATTHEW ARNOLD

Matthew Arnold was a writer of many activities, but it is chiefly as a poet and a critic that he now holds his place in English literature. He was the son of the famous head master of rugby, and was educated at Winchester, Rugby and at Balliol College, Oxford, where he gained the Newdigate prize for poetry. Subsequently he became a Fellow of Oriel College (1845). In 1851 he was appointed an inspector of schools, and proved to be a capable official. In 1857 he was elected professor of poetry at Oxford. His life was busily uneventful, and in 1883, he resigned, receiving a pension from the government. Less than five years afterwards he died suddenly of heart disease at Liverpool.

His poetical works are not very bulky. The Strayed Reveller, and Other Poems (1849) appear under the nom de plume of 'A' as did Empedocles on Etna, and Other Poems (1852). Then followed Poems (1853), with its famous critical preface, and New Poems (1863). None of these volumes is of large size, though much of the content is of a high quality. For subject, Arnold is very fond of classical themes, to which he gives a meditative and even melancholy cast common in modern compositions. The nature of his poetry is didactic.

His prose work is large in bulk and wide in range. Of them all his critical essays are probably of the highest value. Essays in Criticism (1865 and 1889) contains the best of his critical work, which is marked by wide reading and careful thought. His judgments, usually sane and measured, are sometimes distorted a little by his views on life and politics. Hence it can be said that Arnold is a more commanding figure and has exercised a wider influence as a prose writer. His earlier life is preoccupied with verse and his later life with prose.

A lot has been said and discussed about all sorts of 'conflicts', 'ambivalences', and 'dichotomies' in Arnold's mind and soul. His early letters to Arthur Hugh Clough, reveal his serious moral engrossment in his thinking about poetry. According to Gottfried, he was deeply troubled about the problems of the viability of the spirit and imagination in a world that was based on utilitarian standards of human behavior. One of the most dominant faiths that he had was that man could find salvation, which according to Arnold meant wholeness and harmony, only through poetry. A very important remark about Arnold is that critical effort and moral passion was employed in writing even in the earliest of his poetry and one should be aware of this fact to understand it properly.

18.3 THE STRAYED REVELLER

18.3.1 Background of the Poem

The Strayed Reveller is an unrhymed lyric poem written in irregular metre, was originally published in Matthew Arnold's first volume of verse, The Strayed Reveller, and Other Poems. This poem has received a very little attention, although it was very important for Arnold who gave it the place of honour in his first volume. It is often regarded as an investigation of the creative process of a poet. The poem is remarkable for its detailed descriptive passages. The poet hero of the Strayed Reveller chose the dangerous world of "natural magic" because he thinks that the god is indifferent and the human life is useless. The Strayed Reveller is an important document in the long argument between Arnold the romantic and Arnold the classicist. It also shows how Arnold's ideas about poetry interconnect with his ideas about God, nature and human life. At the core of the poem is a comparison between divine detachment and true poetic empathy as ways of seeing human life. The best recent critique of the poem finding in it chiefly an analysis of the romantic mode of vision, disagree both about which part of the poem embody the romantic mode and about whether the poem rejects or celebrates it.

18.3.2 The Text

The Strayed Reveller

The Youth

Faster, faster,
O Circe, Goddess,
Let the wild, thronging train
The bright procession
Of eddying forms,
Sweep through my soul!
Thou standest, smiling
Down on me! thy right arm,
Lean'd up against the column there,
Props thy soft cheek;
Thy left holds, hanging loosely,
The deep cup, ivy-cinctured,
I held but now.
Is it, then, evening
So soon? I see, the night-dews,
Cluster'd in thick beads, dim
The agate brooch-stones
On thy white shoulder;
The cool night-wind, too,
Blows through the portico,
Stirs thy hair, Goddess,
Waves thy white robe!

Circe.

Whence art thou, sleeper?

The Youth.

When the white dawn first
Through the rough fir-planks
Of my hut, by the chestnuts,
Up at the valley-head,
Came breaking, Goddess!
I sprang up, I threw round me
My dappled fawn-skin;
Passing out, from the wet turf,
Where they lay, by the hut door,
I snatch'd up my vine-crown, my fir-staff,
All drench'd in dew-

Came swift down to join
 The rout early gather'd
 In the town, round the temple,
 Iacchus' white fane
 On yonder hill.
 Quick I pass'd, following
 The wood-cutters' cart-track
 Down the dark valley;-I saw
 On my left, through the beeches,
 Thy palace, Goddess,
 Smokeless, empty!
 Trembling, I enter'd; beheld
 The court all silent,
 The lions sleeping,
 On the altar this bowl.
 I drank, Goddess!
 And sank down here, sleeping,
 On the steps of thy portico.

Circe.

Foolish boy! Why tremblest thou?
 Thou lovest it, then, my wine?
 Wouldst more of it? See, how glows,
 Through the delicate, flush'd marble,
 The red, creaming liquor,
 Strown with dark seeds!
 Drink, thee! I chide thee not,
 Deny thee not my bowl.
 Come, stretch forth thy hand, thee-so!
 Drink-drink again!

The Youth.

Thanks, gracious one!
 Ah, the sweet fumes again!
 More soft, ah me,
 More subtle-winding
 Than Pan's flute-music!
 Faint-faint! Ah me,
 Again the sweet sleep!
 Circe.

Hist! Thou-within there!
 Come forth, Ulysses!
 Art tired with hunting?
 While we range the woodland,
 See what the day brings.

Ulysses.

Ever new magic!
Hast thou then lured hither,
Wonderful Goddess, by thy art,
The young, languid-eyed Ampelus,
Iacchus' darling-
Or some youth beloved of Pan,
Of Pan and the Nymphs?
That he sits, bending downward
His white, delicate neck
To the ivy-wreathed marge
Of thy cup; the bright, glancing vine-leaves
That crown his hair,
Falling forward, mingling
With the dark ivy-plants—
His fawn-skin, half untied, Smear'd with red wine-stains? Who is he,
That he sits, overweigh'd
By fumes of wine and sleep,
So late, in thy portico?
What youth, Goddess,-what guest
Of Gods or mortals?

Circe.

Hist! he wakes!
I lured him not hither, Ulysses.
Nay, ask him!

The Youth.

Who speaks? Ah, who comes forth
To thy side, Goddess, from within?
How shall I name him?
This spare, dark-featured,
Quick-eyed stranger?
Ah, and I see too
His sailor's bonnet,
His short coat, travel-tarnish'd,
With one arm bare!—
Art thou not he, whom fame
This long time rumours
The favour'd guest of Circe, brought by the waves?
Art thou he, stranger?
The wise Ulysses,
Laertes' son?

Ulysses.
 I am Ulysses.
 And thou, too, sleeper?
 Thy voice is sweet.
 It may be thou hast follow'd
 Through the islands some divine bard,
 By age taught many things,
 Age and the Muses;
 And heard him delighting
 The chiefs and people
 In the banquet, and learn'd his songs.
 Of Gods and Heroes,
 Of war and arts,
 And peopled cities,
 Inland, or built
 By the gray sea.—If so, then hail!
 I honour and welcome thee.

The Youth.

The Gods are happy.
 They turn on all sides
 Their shining eyes,
 And see below them
 The earth and men.
 They see Tiresias
 Sitting, staff in hand,
 On the warm, grassy
 Asopus bank,
 His robe drawn over
 His old sightless head,
 Revolving inly
 The doom of Thebes.
 They see the Centaurs
 In the upper glens
 Of Pelion, in the streams,
 Where red-berried ashes fringe
 The clear-brown shallow pools,
 With streaming flanks, and heads
 Rear'd proudly, snuffing
 The mountain wind.
 They see the Indian
 Drifting, knife in hand,
 His frail boat moor'd to
 A floating isle thick-matted
 With large-leaved, low-creeping melon-plants
 And the dark cucumber.
 He reaps, and stows them,
 Drifting—drifting;—round him,
 Round his green harvest-plot,
 Flow the cool lake-waves,

The mountains ring them.
They see the Scythian
On the wide stepp, unharnessing
His wheel'd house at noon.
He tethers his beast down, and makes his meal—
Mares' milk, and bread
Baked on the embers;—all around
The boundless, waving grass-plains stretch, thick-starr'd
With saffron and the yellow hollyhock
And flag-leaved iris-flowers.
Sitting in his cart
He makes his meal; before him, for long miles,
Alive with bright green lizards,
And the springing bustard-fowl,
The track, a straight black line,
Furrows the rich soil; here and there
Cluster of lonely mounds
Topp'd with rough-hewn,
Gray, rain-blear'd statues, overpeer
The sunny waste.
They see the ferry
On the broad, clay-laden
Lone Chorasmian stream;—thereon,
With snort and strain,
Two horses, strongly swimming, tow
The ferry-boat, with woven ropes
To either bow
Firm harness'd by the mane; a chief
With shout and shaken spear,
Stands at the prow, and guides them; but astern
The cowering merchants, in long robes,
Sit pale beside their wealth
Of silk-bales and of balsam-drops,
Of gold and ivory,
Of turquoise-earth and amethyst,
Jasper and chalcedony,
And milk-barred onyx-stones.
The loaded boat swings groaning
In the yellow eddies;
The Gods behold him.
They see the Heroes
Sitting in the dark ship
On the foamless, long-heaving
Violet sea.
At sunset nearing
The Happy Islands.
These things, Ulysses,
The wise bards, also
Behold and sing.
But oh, what labour!
O prince, what pain!

They too can see
 Tiresias;—but the Gods,
 Who give them vision,
 Added this law:
 That they should bear too
 His groping blindness,
 His dark foreboding,
 His scorn'd white hairs;
 Bear Hera's anger
 Through a life lengthen'd
 To seven ages.
 They see the Centaurs
 On Pelion:—then they feel,
 They too, the maddening wine
 Swell their large veins to bursting; in wild pain
 They feel the biting spears
 Of the grim Lapithæ, and Theseus, drive,
 Drive crashing through their bones; they feel
 High on a jutting rock in the red stream
 Alcmena's dreadful son
 Ply his bow;—such a price
 The Gods exact for song:
 To become what we sing.
 They see the Indian
 On his mountain lake; but squalls
 Make their skiff reel, and worms
 In the unkind spring have gnawn
 Their melon-harvest to the heart.—They see
 The Scythian: but long frosts
 Parch them in winter-time on the bare stepp,
 Till they too fade like grass; they crawl
 Like shadows forth in spring.
 They see the merchants
 On the Oxus stream;—but care
 Must visit first them too, and make them pale.
 Whether, through whirling sand,
 A cloud of desert robber-horse have burst
 Upon their caravan; or greedy kings,
 In the wall'd cities the way passes through,
 Crush'd them with tolls; or fever-airs,
 On some great river's marge,
 Mown them down, far from home.
 They see the Heroes
 Near harbour;—but they share
 Their lives, and former violent toil in Thebes,
 Seven-gated Thebes, or Troy;
 Or where the echoing oars
 Of Argo first
 Startled the unknown sea.
 The old Silenus
 Came, lolling in the sunshine,

From the dewy forest-coverts,
This way at noon.
Sitting by me, while his Fauns
Down at the water-side
Sprinkled and smoothed
His drooping garland,
He told me these things.
But I, Ulysses,
Sitting on the warm steps,
Looking over the valley,
All day long, have seen,
Without pain, without labour,
Sometimes a wild-hair'd Mænad—
Sometimes a Faun with torches—
And sometimes, for a moment,
Passing through the dark stems
Flowing-robed, the beloved,
The desired, the divine,
Beloved Iacchus.
Ah, cool night-wind, tremulous stars!
Ah, glimmering water,
Fitful earth-murmur,
Dreaming woods!
Ah, golden-haired, strangely smiling Goddess,
And thou, proved, much enduring,
Wave-toss'd Wanderer!
Who can stand still?
Ye fade, ye swim, ye waver before me—
The cup again!
Faster, faster,
O Circe, Goddess.
Let the wild, thronging train,
The bright procession
Of eddying forms,
Sweep through my soul!

Matthew Arnold

Glossary

- Circe : In Greek mythology Circe is a goddess who turned Odysseus's men temporarily into swine but later gave him directions for their journey home.
- Ulysses : Ulysses is derived from Ulixes, the Latin name for Odysseus, a character in ancient Greek literature. He is known to be a legendary Greek king of Ithaca and a hero of Homer's Odyssey http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Epic_poetry
- The Youth : The aspiring poet the transformation of whom forms the central part of the poem.

The transformation of a young man into a poet is the account that is at the core of this poem, though the story does not appear to dominate the whole poem at any point of its narrative flow. The poem is in form of a dialogue. It's a dialogue between a youth and Circe. The young man enters in the world of poetic creation and holds the cup of wine with a trembling hand. Goddess Circe welcomes him to take deep plunge in the sea of lyrical design.

The poem deals with the nature of the poet, incorporating two themes that were very common in nineteenth-century romanticism: the pinnacle of the artist and the agony of the artist. It is assumed that when Arnold wrote the speeches of the youth, he must have had a poet like Keats in mind. This is because Arnold at some point of time had observed to Clough in his letters that Keats was 'consumed' by the desire for 'movement and fullness', which was the same desire chanted by the intoxicated reveller.

The youth implores the Goddess to sweep his soul with the wild and bright procession of "eddying form". Arnold has also brought in the famous character of Ulysses in course of their dialogue. The subsequent stanza gives long colorful portrayal of the world of transition by the youth in course of his self-narrative. For Arnold the question how the poet sees is never separated from what he sees.

On the whole however the poem remains unclear. A major problem with the poem is the fact that it seems to violate the critical principles which Arnold was trying to develop at the time he was composing it. Although the poem has been written in dramatic form, it is marked with slight central action and is heavily overlaid with decoration. Similar is the case with the descriptive passages that are supposed to represent examples of the variety of human existence but become elements of digression because of their length and sensuous elaboration.

The reveller almost describes poetry as 'a true allegory of the state of one's own mind in a representative history'. Arnold was himself against this view. According to him if a poet became what he sang, then he sang himself in allegorical representation.

All these factors force us to think as to why Arnold, who himself was considered to be a reformer as far as poetry was concerned chose a poem with evident flaws as the title poem of his first volume of poetry. However we can also think that he was very well aware of what he was doing and chose the indirect means of irony and allegory rather than 'thinking aloud' in verse to which he objected.

The use of his legend of Circe has also often been questioned. According to Gottfried, although this is modern Circe who is refined, she still remains the dangerous seducer. So the reveller who was a youthful poet earlier, driven by his naturally ardent nature, went astray and willingly submitted to the Circean influence. The accusing questions of Ulysses further in the poem make it clear that the effect of Circe on the young poet was evil. She even denies that she led him astray. Towards the end of the poem, the reveller, does nothing but cries for more wine.

18.4 THE SCHOLAR-GYPSY

18.4.1 Background of the poem

‘The Scholar Gypsy’ is based on a story about a scholar who abandoned academic life to join a band of gypsies. The various places and landmarks mentioned in the poem are all actual ones situated around Oxford. The Shepherd is summoned to the hills to untie the wattle cotes: sheepfolds built of wattles or interwoven twigs; neither to leave his wistful flock unfed nor let his bawling fellows rack their throats nor allow the cropped grasses shoot another head. However, when the fields are calm and still and tired men and dogs all gone to rest, one can see only the white sheep cross the strips of the moon blanch’d green, the Shepherd must again renew the quest; the search for the Scholar Gypsy who is believed to be still haunting the vicinity.

18.4.2 The Text

The Scholar-Gypsy

Go, for they call you, shepherd, from the hill;
 Go, shepherd, and untie the wattled cotes!
 No longer leave thy wistful flock unfed,
 Nor let thy bawling fellows rack their throats,
 Nor the cropp’d herbage shoot another head.
 But when the fields are still,
 And the tired men and dogs all gone to rest,
 And only the white sheep are sometimes seen
 Cross and recross the strips of moon-blanch’d green.
 Come, shepherd, and again begin the quest!

Here, where the reaper was at work of late—
 In this high field’s dark corner, where he leaves
 His coat, his basket, and his earthen cruse,
 And in the sun all morning binds the sheaves,
 Then here, at noon, comes back his stores to use—
 Here will I sit and wait,
 While to my ear from uplands far away
 The bleating of the folded flocks is borne,
 With distant cries of reapers in the corn—
 All the live murmur of a summer’s day.

Screen’d is this nook o’er the high, half-reap’d field,
 And here till sun-down, shepherd! will I be.
 Through the thick corn the scarlet poppies peep,
 And round green roots and yellowing stalks I see
 Pale pink convolvulus in tendrils creep;
 And air-swept lindens yield
 Their scent, and rustle down their perfumed showers
 Of bloom on the bent grass where I am laid,
 And bower me from the August sun with shade;
 And the eye travels down to Oxford’s towers.

And near me on the grass lies Glanvil's book—
 Come, let me read the oft-read tale again!
 The story of the Oxford scholar poor,
 Of pregnant parts and quick inventive brain,
 Who, tired of knocking at preferment's door,
 One summer-morn forsook
 His friends, and went to learn the Gypsy-lore,
 And roam'd the world with that wild brotherhood,
 And came, as most men deem'd, to little good,
 But came to Oxford and his friends no more.

But once, years after, in the country-lanes,
 Two scholars, whom at college erst he knew,
 Met him, and of his way of life enquired;
 Whereat he answer'd, that the Gypsy-crew,
 His mates, had arts to rule as they desired
 The workings of men's brains,
 And they can bind them to what thoughts they will.
 'And I,' he said, 'the secret of their art,
 When fully learn'd, will to the world impart;
 But it needs heaven-sent moments for this skill.'

This said, he left them, and return'd no more.—
 But rumours hung about the country-side,
 That the lost Scholar long was seen to stray,
 Seen by rare glimpses, pensive and tongue-tied,
 In hat of antique shape, and cloak of grey,
 The same the gipsies wore.
 Shepherds had met him on the Hurst in spring;
 At some lone alehouse in the Berkshire moors,
 On the warm ingle-bench, the smock-frock'd boors
 Had found him seated at their entering,

But, 'mid their drink and clatter, he would fly.
 And I myself seem half to know thy looks,
 And put the shepherds, wanderer! on thy trace;
 And boys who in lone wheatfields scare the rooks
 I ask if thou hast pass'd their quiet place;
 Or in my boat I lie
 Moor'd to the cool bank in the summer-heats,
 'Mid wide grass meadows which the sunshine fills,
 And watch the warm, green-muffled Cumner hills,
 And wonder if thou haunt'st their shy retreats.

For most, I know, thou lov'st retired ground!
 Thee at the ferry Oxford riders blithe,
 Returning home on summer-nights, have met
 Crossing the stripling Thames at Bab-lock-hithe,
 Trailing in the cool stream thy fingers wet,
 As the punt's rope chops round;
 And leaning backward in a pensive dream,

And fostering in thy lap a heap of flowers
Pluck'd in shy fields and distant Wychwood bowers,
And thine eyes resting on the moonlit stream.

And then they land, and thou art seen no more!—
Maidens, who from the distant hamlets come
To dance around the Fyfield elm in May,
Oft through the darkening fields have seen thee roam,
Or cross a stile into the public way.
Oft thou hast given them store
Of flowers—the frail-leaf'd, white anemony,
Dark bluebells drench'd with dew of summer eves,
And purple orchises with spotted leaves—
But none hath words she can report of thee.

And, above Godstow Bridge, when hay-time's here
In June, and many a scythe in sunshine flames,
Men who through those wide fields of breezy grass
Where black-wing'd swallows haunt the glittering Thames,
To bathe in the abandon'd lasher pass,
Have often pass'd thee near Sitting upon the river bank o'ergrown;
Mark'd thine outlandish garb, thy figure spare,
Thy dark vague eyes, and soft abstracted air—
But, when they came from bathing, thou wast gone!

At some lone homestead in the Cumner hills,
Where at her open door the housewife darns,
Thou hast been seen, or hanging on a gate
To watch the threshers in the mossy barns.
Children, who early range these slopes and late
For cresses from the rills,
Have known thee eyeing, all an April-day,
The springing pasture and the feeding kine;
And mark'd thee, when the stars come out and shine,
Through the long dewy grass move slow away.

In autumn, on the skirts of Bagley Wood—
Where most the gipsies by the turf-edged way
Pitch their smoked tents, and every bush you see
With scarlet patches tagg'd and shreds of grey,
Above the forest-ground called Thessaly—
The blackbird, picking food,
Sees thee, nor stops his meal, nor fears at all;
So often has he known thee past him stray,
Rapt, twirling in thy hand a wither'd spray,
And waiting for the spark from heaven to fall.

And once, in winter, on the causeway chill
Where home through flooded fields foot-travellers go,
Have I not pass'd thee on the wooden bridge,

Wrapt in thy cloak and battling with the snow,
 Thy face tow'rd Hinksey and its wintry ridge?
 And thou has climb'd the hill,
 And gain'd the white brow of the Cumner range;
 Turn'd once to watch, while thick the snowflakes fall,
 The line of festal light in Christ-Church hall—
 Then sought thy straw in some sequester'd grange.

But what—I dream! Two hundred years are flown
 Since first thy story ran through Oxford halls,
 And the grave Glanvil did the tale inscribe
 That thou wert wander'd from the studious walls
 To learn strange arts, and join a Gypsy-tribe;
 And thou from earth art gone
 Long since, and in some quiet churchyard laid—
 Some country-nook, where o'er thy unknown grave
 Tall grasses and white flowering nettles wave,
 Under a dark, red-fruited yew-tree's shade.

—No, no, thou hast not felt the lapse of hours!
 For what wears out the life of mortal men?
 'Tis that from change to change their being rolls;
 'Tis that repeated shocks, again, again,
 Exhaust the energy of strongest souls
 And numb the elastic powers.
 Till having used our nerves with bliss and teen,
 And tired upon a thousand schemes our wit,
 To the just-pausing Genius we remit
 Our worn-out life, and are—what we have been.

Thou hast not lived, why should'st thou perish, so?
 Thou hadst one aim, one business, one desire;
 Else wert thou long since number'd with the dead!
 Else hadst thou spent, like other men, thy fire!
 The generations of thy peers are fled,
 And we ourselves shall go;
 But thou possessest an immortal lot,
 And we imagine thee exempt from age
 And living as thou liv'st on Glanvil's page,
 Because thou hadst—what we, alas! have not.

For early didst thou leave the world, with powers
 Fresh, undiverted to the world without,
 Firm to their mark, not spent on other things;
 Free from the sick fatigue, the languid doubt,
 Which much to have tried, in much been baffled, brings.
 O life unlike to ours!
 Who fluctuate idly without term or scope,
 Of whom each strives, nor knows for what he strives,
 And each half lives a hundred different lives;
 Who wait like thee, but not, like thee, in hope.

Thou waitest for the spark from heaven! and we,
Light half-believers of our casual creeds,
Who never deeply felt, nor clearly will'd,
Whose insight never has borne fruit in deeds,
Whose vague resolves never have been fulfill'd;
For whom each year we see
Breeds new beginnings, disappointments new;
Who hesitate and falter life away,
And lose to-morrow the ground won to-day—
Ah! do not we, wanderer! await it too?

Yes, we await it!—but it still delays,
And then we suffer! and amongst us one,
Who most has suffer'd, takes dejectedly
His seat upon the intellectual throne;
And all his store of sad experience he Lays bare of wretched days;
Tells us his misery's birth and growth and signs,
And how the dying spark of hope was fed,
And how the breast was soothed, and how the head,
And all his hourly varied anodynes.

This for our wisest! and we others pine,
And wish the long unhappy dream would end,
And waive all claim to bliss, and try to bear;
With close-lipp'd patience for our only friend,
Sad patience, too near neighbour to despair—
But none has hope like thine!
Thou through the fields and through the woods dost stray,
Roaming the country-side, a truant boy,
Nursing thy project in unclouded joy,
And every doubt long blown by time away.

O born in days when wits were fresh and clear,
And life ran gaily as the sparkling Thames;
Before this strange disease of modern life,
With its sick hurry, its divided aims,
Its heads o'ertax'd, its palsied hearts, was rife—
Fly hence, our contact fear!
Still fly, plunge deeper in the bowering wood!
Averse, as Dido did with gesture stern
From her false friend's approach in Hades turn,
Wave us away, and keep thy solitude!

Still nursing the unconquerable hope,
Still clutching the inviolable shade,
With a free, onward impulse brushing through,
By night, the silver'd branches of the glade—
Far on the forest-skirts, where none pursue,
On some mild pastoral slope
Emerge, and resting on the moonlit pales

Freshen thy flowers as in former years
 With dew, or listen with enchanted ears,
 From the dark dingles, to the nightingales!

But fly our paths, our feverish contact fly!
 For strong the infection of our mental strife,
 Which, though it gives no bliss, yet spoils for rest;
 And we should win thee from thy own fair life,
 Like us distracted, and like us unblest.
 Soon, soon thy cheer would die,
 Thy hopes grow timorous, and unfix'd thy powers,
 And thy clear aims be cross and shifting made;
 And then thy glad perennial youth would fade,
 Fade and grow old at last, and die like ours.

Then fly our greetings, fly our speech and smiles!
 —As some grave Tyrian trader, from the sea,
 Descried at sunrise an emerging prow
 Lifting the cool-hair'd creepers stealthily,
 The fringes of a southward-facing brow
 Among the Ægæan Isles;
 And saw the merry Grecian coaster come,
 Freighted with amber grapes, and Chian wine,
 Green, bursting figs, and tunniessteep'd in brine—
 And knew the intruders on his ancient home,

The young light-hearted masters of the waves—
 And snatch'd his rudder, and shook out more sail;
 And day and night held on indignantly
 O'er the blue Midland waters with the gale,
 Betwixt the Syrtes and soft Sicily,
 To where the Atlantic raves
 Outside the western straits; and unbent sails
 There, where down cloudy cliffs, through sheets of foam,
 Shy traffickers, the dark Iberians come;
 And on the beach undid his corded bales.

Glossary

- Wattled cotes : The poet here urges to free the flock of sheep from its shed and let be liberated. This symbolism of liberation from any sort of binding is there from the beginning in the poem.
- Glanvil's Book : Ranulf de Glanvill (sometimes written Glanvil was Chief justice of England during the reign of King Henry II and reputed author of a book on English law
- Oxford Scholar poor : The Vanity of Dogmatizing by Glanvil was a reaction to scholasticism, the rigid analytical methodology then in vogue in universities across Europe, and it features a poverty-stricken scholar.

Godstowbridge : Godstow Bridge is a road bridge across the river Thames in England at Godstow near Oxford. The poem is replete with such details about the landscape around the university. For example references to landmarks like Cummer Hills or Bagley Wood:

Spark from Heaven : Arnold imagines the scholar Gypsy as a shadowy figure who can even now be glimpsed in the Berkshire and Oxfordshire countryside, waiting for the spark from Heaven, or some theological piece of knowledge to be revealed to him by God, and claims to have once seen him himself.

Matthew Arnold

18.4.3 A discussion

“The Scholar Gypsy” is often known as one of the best and most popular poems of Arnold. A poor Oxford university student constitutes the central character of “The Scholar Gypsy” who abandoned his studies to learn about the supernatural powers of the Gypsy people. Arnold begins the poem in pastoral mode, invoking an unnamed shepherd and describing the beautiful rural scene, with Oxford in the distance. The very first stanza of the poem suggests that something is amiss because the speaker imagines the sheep at night on a “moon blanched green” and then persuades the shepherd to “again begin the quest.” The moon acts like a symbol for the power of imagination and the word ‘quest’ appears to be a very loaded term for the rustic job of a shepherd. The pastoralism of the poem leads immediately to several themes. Most generally it represents, as it does for many poets, an escape from the intolerable world of court or affairs. He then repeats the gist of Glanvill’s story, but extends it with an account of rumors that the scholar Gypsy was again seen from time to time by shepherds, country boys, young girls and reapers etc. around Oxford. Arnold thinks of him as a shadowy figure who can even now be seen from time to time in the Berkshire and Oxfordshire countryside, “waiting for the spark from Heaven to fall”, and claims to have once seen him himself. Arnold certainly romanticizes the Oxford countryside, attributing to it his happiest days. Against this romantic background, then, Arnold places the quest for and of the scholar-Gypsy, which gives added significance to the background. This major English pastoral elegy has been written in a ten-line stanzaic pattern, constituting a total of 250 lines.

Arnold was not sure whether the scholar Gypsy was still alive after two centuries, but then ruled out the thought of his death. He cannot have died like a normal man. Having renounced such a life, he is hence free from the sick fatigue, the languid doubt. The sick hurry and divided aims characterize modern life. The poet implores the scholar Gypsy to avoid all who suffer from it, in case he too should be infected and die. Arnold ends with an extended simile of a Tyrian merchant seaman who flees from the eruption of Greek competitors to seek a new world in Iberia. Since for Arnold Christianity was dead, and nothing seemed to occupy its place that could give meaning to life. This situation resulted in a constant search, loneliness and a void in life. In other words it can be said that it was the confrontation between the wisdom of the heart and the wisdom of head. The head is aware of the real condition of the modern world, but the heart is invariably drawn to the simpler life represented by the scholar and Oxford.

As a poet Arnold at times used to give a record of the sick society in his poems. “The Scholar Gypsy” is also one such poem. In this poem the attitude of Arnold towards the Gypsy is similar to the attitude of an adult towards a child. Arnold appreciates the innocence of the Gypsy and envies it at the same time but finally realises that he could not return to such a stage of innocence. Arnold believed that a child lost its innocence not due to some sin but simply by gaining experience and developing into an adult. The Gypsy similarly was the manifestation of a good that was lost. When Arnold juxtaposes the Gypsy’s composure with the problems of his own age, he is not lampooning the nineteenth century but is rather exploring its spiritual and emotional losses.

At the end it can be said that The Scholar Gypsy is a great modern melancholy and widened and spiritualized into a spirit of mystery and dreams.

18.5 LET US SUM UP

In this unit you read about the life and works of Matthew Arnold and examined two of his poems. You should now be able to examine appreciate and discuss Matthew Arnold’s poems in general and these two poems The Strayed Reveller and The Scholar Gypsy in particular effectively.

18.6 ANSWER TO SELF-CHECK EXERCISES

Now that you have read the poems carefully, try to answer the following questions.

- a) Discuss the central idea of the poem “The Strayed Reveller”.
Ans: Refer to the paragraph in section 18.3.3.
- b) Briefly discuss Arnold’s usage of the legend of Circe in his poem “The Strayed Reveller”.
Ans: Refer to the paragraph in section 18.3.3.
- c) Elaborate upon the theme of the poem “The Scholar Gypsy”.
Ans: Refer to the paragraph in section 18.4.3.
- d) Do you think the Oxford countryside is romanticized in the poem The Scholar Gypsy?
Ans: Refer to the paragraph in section 18.4.3.

19.0 OBJECTIVES

After reading this unit you will be able to:

- Talk about Gerard Manley Hopkins the poet, his life and work.
- Appreciate Hopkins' poem 'Pied Beauty'
- Analyze the thematic as well as technical aspects of 'The Windhover'

19.1 INTRODUCTION

In this unit we will discuss the poetry of Gerard Manley Hopkins, which is said to occupy two worlds. Hopkins was a poet who lived during the latter half of the Victorian period, but whose poetry was published only in 1918, posthumously. He is considered to be a herald of modernist poetry, because of his daring innovations and experimentations in poetic language, technique, and style. Subject wise, he is predominantly the product of his times. He praises the beauty and grandeur of God's creations, explores his spiritual tensions and investigates his relationship with God.

Hopkins uses unusual prosody, compound words, archaic words and complex images in his poems. He also bases his poems on a personal philosophy he had evolved as a part of his religious vocation. The radical nature of his poetry makes it a bit difficult to understand him at a single reading. We have to get introduced to the special features and intricacies of this writer. But once the shell is broken, the kernel is sweet and tasty. Effort has been made in this unit to help you appreciate such intricate poetry.

We have included additional notes which would give you an idea about Hopkins' practice of sprung rhythm and his concepts of inscape and instress. Knowledge of this is a prerequisite in understanding and appreciating Hopkins.

The first poem 'Pied Beauty' which was written in 1887 is a curtal sonnet, which means it is shorter than the traditional sonnet. The poem glorifies God who has created 'Pied Beauty': natural beauty with spots, blotches, dots and speckles. Hopkins is different from the rest of the Nature poets as one who loves things for their unusual quirks, personal oddities and individual qualities.

The second poem 'The Windhover' is another sonnet, but in the traditional mould. The poem gives a magnificent word picture of a falcon or a kestrel in midflight, before it swoops down majestically. Like in most of his poems, Hopkins moves from the creature to the creator, wondering how much more glorious would be God's beauty.

We have adopted different strategies in examining the poems which have been selected for detailed study. The analysis provided along with the first poem in 19.4 will serve as a guide to help you analyse poems on your own during examination. In 19.5 we have adopted a different method which will help you comprehend the text better and learn to appreciate Hopkins' poetry for its technical skill and beauty of images. Read through the unit section by section and do the exercises as you read. Hope you enjoy your journey of discovering Hopkins.

19.2 GERARD MANLEY HOPKINS

(b. 28 July, 1844 Essex, England – d. 8 June, 1889 Dublin, Ireland)

Gerard Manley Hopkins

Gerard Manley Hopkins was born at Stratford, Essex, England, as the eldest of nine children to Manley Hopkins and Catherine Smith, a prosperous and artistic couple. His father was by turn, the proprietor of a marine insurance firm, the British Consul General in Hawaii, Church Warden, and a published writer and reviewer. His mother was greatly fond of music and reading. They were deeply religious High Church Anglicans and Hopkins was inclined towards asceticism from his boyhood.

Hopkins' maternal aunt Maria Smith Giberne taught him to sketch. His talent was promoted by many and his first ambition was to be a painter. His early training in visual arts later helped him when Hopkins became a poet. While he was studying at the Highgate boarding school, he composed his first poem, ‘The Escorial’, at the age of ten, inspired by John Keats.

Hopkins attended the Balliol College, Oxford, where he studied Classics. He won a ‘Double First’ in the subject and was awarded the title, ‘The Star of Balliol’. He forged a lifelong friendship with Robert Bridges at Balliol, which later resulted in Hopkins’ posthumous fame. At Balliol, Hopkins was greatly impressed by the work of Christina Rossetti, befriended writer and critic Walter Pater and became a follower of Edward Pusey, member of the Oxford Movement – all these proved to be seminal influences.

In 1864 he first read John Henry Newman’s Apologia Pro Vita Sua [A Defence of My Life] which is the classic defense by Newman of his religious views and his conversion to Catholicism. Cardinal Newman was a prominent figure in the Oxford Movement which had led to the establishment of Anglo-Catholicism. Two years later in 1866, Hopkins was received into the Catholic Church and within a short while he resolved to join priesthood. His conversion estranged him from his family. As the first step towards his religious life, Hopkins burnt all his poems because he felt that poetry would prevent him from total devotion to his faith. He later reconciled to the idea of a poetic vocation for a priest, on reading the philosophy of Duns Scotus, the medieval theologian. Hopkins joined the Society of Jesus to become a Jesuit father.

Hopkins went to learn theology at St. Beuno’s Jesuit House in North Wales, which had a lasting influence on his creativity. There he came across Welsh poetry from which he fashioned his unique ‘sprung rhythm’. At the encouragement of his superior Hopkins broke his silence of seven years to write ‘The Wreck of the Deutschland’ which praised the heroic self sacrifice of a group of Franciscan nuns whose ship sank in a storm. Though conventional in theme, the poem was daringly experimental, where he realized “the echo of a new rhythm” which he named “sprung rhythm”.

The frown of his face
 Before me, the hurtle of hell
 Behind, where, where was a, where was a place?
 I whirled out wings that spell
 And fled with a fling of the heart to the heart of the Host.
 My heart, but you were dovewinged, I can tell,
 Carrier-witted, I am bold to boast,
 To flash from the flame to the flame then, tower from the grace to the grace
Stanza 3 ‘The Wreck of the Deutschland’

You will notice the uneven lines, rhythmic and verbal effects and unusual word combinations. However, the poem was not published, as it was rejected by the Jesuit magazine.

He continued to write poetry but these were read only in manuscript form by his friends. After working as a parish priest, teacher and preacher in several churches and institutions, Hopkins was appointed Professor of Greek Literature at University College, Dublin. He found the environment uncongenial and he was unhappy and overworked. In 1885, he started writing a series of sonnets beginning with “Carrion Comfort” that mirror his anguish, desolation and frustration and are known as “terrible sonnets”. They showcase the great dilemma he felt in reconciling his immense fascination for the sensuous world and the equally powerful devotion to religious vocation.

Hopkins died of typhoid fever in 1889 with the last words on his lips, “I am happy, so happy” and is buried in Glasnevin Cemetery, Dublin. In 1918, Robert Bridges, his friend who was the poet laureate of Britain at the time, published a collection of his poems. These original, subtle and vibrant verses, with rich aural patterning, displaying imaginative and intellectual depths had a marked influence on the major 20th century poets like T.S. Eliot, W.H. Auden, Dylan Thomas and many others.

Do you find Hopkins’ life interesting? If you wish to know more about his life which has inspired a great deal of critical research, which has whetted curiosity about his great self-denial and his friendships, so much so that some have found evidences of homo-eroticism, you can either refer to the Encyclopaedia or browse online for scholarly articles.

19.3 NOTES

19.3.1 A Note on Sprung Rhythm

To enjoy and appreciate Hopkins, it is necessary to understand the concept of sprung rhythm. ‘Sprung rhythm’ is the term coined by Hopkins to denote a complex system of metrics which he derived partly from his knowledge of Welsh poetry. Hopkins was inspired by the Welsh prosodic feature called ‘cynganedd’ [Pron. k??°haneð] which uses a concept of sound arrangement within one line, using stress, alliteration and rhyme.

Sprung rhythm is opposed specifically to ‘running’ or ‘common’ rhythm, such as the iambic meter, and provides for feet of varying lengths. In running/regular rhythm, stressed and unstressed syllables will alternate in pattern. In sprung rhythm, stressed syllables will occur at regular intervals but the unstressed or slack syllables may vary from one to four.

For instance, in the following line, which is written in iambic meter, you will notice that the first word in each foot is unstressed or slack while the second one is stressed or accented.

[Each foot is separated with the ‘slash’ [/] sign. The unstressed syllables are indicated in normal font while stressed ones are denoted marking them in bold and underlining them.]

The cur/few tolls/ the knell/ of part/ing day [From Gray’s ‘Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard’]

Whereas this example of sprung rhythm given beneath will give you an idea how slack syllables vary in number:

Margaret are you/ grieving

Over Goldengrove/ unleaving [From Hopkins’ poem ‘Spring and Fall’]

Sprung rhythm gave Hopkins’ poetry a masculine vigour which renders it muscular, flexible, vibrant and organic. It reflects the dynamic quality and variations of common speech and creates more acoustic possibilities. Sprung rhythm in many ways anticipates free verse [vers libre] of modern times.

Other features of Hopkins’ poetry:

Hopkins energized language greatly. He dug up archaic and dialectal words and also coined new words. Hopkins was influenced by not only Welsh but also Anglo-Saxon or Old English poetry. Alliterations and Compound terms were features of Anglo Saxon Poetry. Hopkins uses these liberally in his poems.

- 1) Alliteration [repetition of initial consonant sounds in near lying words]:
e.g.: “king/dom of daylight’s dauphin/dapple-dawn-drawn falcon...”; “heart in hiding” etc],
- 2) Assonance [repetition of vowel sounds to create internal rhyming]:
e.g.: rose-moles, finches wings, wimpling wing etc
- 3) Compound words e.g.: ‘couple-colour’, ‘dapple-dawn-drawn’ ‘blue-bleak’ etc.

19.3.2 A Note on Inscape

Hopkins believed that all phenomena in the world possess a unique quality or design. This design is a dynamic one. Thus a tree differed from another tree, a stone from a stone, and a blade of grass from another. This special individualizing quality which he perceived in every single thing, he calls Inscape. Hopkins was influenced by the philosophical concepts of the medieval schoolman, the theologian Duns Scotus. Duns Scotus has used a Latin term 'haecceitas' which denotes the discrete qualities that make it a particular thing – which Hopkins translates as 'thisness'. It is 'thisness' which is prevalent in everything that gives it its special quiddity or essence. The recognition of this inscape in other things is termed Instress. It can be defined as the apprehension of an object in an intense thrust of energy which enables one to realize its specific distinctiveness. Hopkins tries to capture this inscape in his poems. Thus he shows us how "Kingfishers catch fire and dragonflies draw flame": through their special vibrant colours that nature has endowed them, kingfishers and dragon flies enthrall us with their swift movements, and it impresses upon our mind in an instant. Our receipt of their unique quality or inscape into our minds is the instress that occurs in this case. Anybody who has eaten a plum knows how the juice flows into the mouth, at the instant of biting it, suffusing the whole mouth and being with sweetness or sourness. The perception of inscape is just like that! Hopkins' inscape is very much like Wordsworth's 'spots of time,' Emerson's 'moments,' and James Joyce's concept of the 'Epiphany', though Hopkins' concept is fundamentally religious.

Hope you have understood these very important concepts. Now shall we try answering a few questions to see whether you have grasped the 'inscape' of Hopkins' ideas?

19.4 PIED BEAUTY (1877)

19.4.1 Introduction

Beauty is of all sorts. Some may see beauty in the curve of a lady's brow, in the innocence of a baby's face, in the red, red rose that blooms on a thorny plant, in placid lakes or mountain slopes. Hopkins sees beauty in spots, speckles, dots and blotches. In a world where we spend lots of money and time to remove spots from our faces, Hopkins' vision emerges as one of a kind, and helps us see beauty even in motley!

Hopkins wrote this poem in 1877, the year he was ordained as a Jesuit priest. It is a curial sonnet, which means that it is shorter than the usual sonnet, which as you know is 14 lines long. 'Pied Beauty' is 11 lines, the last line, but a stub. Did you know that Shakespeare too has written curial sonnets? But Hopkins's curial sonnets follow a specific pattern based on the Petrarchan sonnet. The octave which is usually eight lines is truncated to six [two tercets each, rhyming ABC] and the sestet is shortened from six lines to a quatrain [four line stanza] and an additional tail piece. This alteration of the sonnet form is quite fitting for a poem advocating originality and contrariness. Let us read the poem and find out what it means. First read the poem aloud that you get a feel of it. Then go through the poem again, slowly this time, reading with the help of the glossary. Don't get intimidated. The analysis will help you to discover the beauty and sense of 'Pied Beauty'.

19.4.2 The Text

PIED BEAUTY

Glory be to God for dappled things —
 For skies of couple-colour as a brindled cow;
 For rose-moles all in stipple upon trout that swim;
 Fresh-firecoal chestnut-falls; finches' wings;
 Landscape plotted and pieced — fold, fallow, and plough;
 And áll trádes, their gear and tackle and trim.

All things counter, original, spare, strange;
 Whatever is fickle, freckled (who knows how?)
 With swift, slow; sweet, sour; adazzle, dim;
 He fathers-forth whose beauty is past change:
 Praise him.

Glossary

dappled	: spotted, speckled, pied, multi-coloured
couple-colour	: two colours
brinded	: also brindled; brownish yellow or gray coat with spots or streaks of darker colour
rose-moles	: reddish spots on the skin
stipple	: pattern of spots; a device in painting which marks a surface with numerous dots or specks trout	: a fish related to salmon

finch	: a small bird
fallow	: uncultivated land
tackle	: equipment or gear for fishing
trim	: equipment
“counter, original, spare or strange”	: things which are unconventional and strange adazzle	: dazzling (Hopkins’ coinage)
fathers-forth	: creates, begets

19.4.3 Analysis of the Poem

‘Pied Beauty’ which is one of Hopkins’ happy poems, is a hymn of creation that praises the creator by praising the created world. It glorifies all the things on this earth that are either ‘pied’ or spotted. The poet thinks that it is a manifestation of God’s creativity. With the eye of a painter, Hopkins vividly sketches in kaleidoscopic variety, all the objects and patterns which provide an example of this kind of beauty.

Hopkins starts with a eulogy of Lord the creator: “Glory be to God for dappled things”. This is followed by an inventory of things which are dappled or spotted. He includes in this list, the sky that is dappled at dawn, with blotches of blue colour splashed against pale white, the contrast described as ‘couple-colour’ by Hopkins. It reminds him of “brinded cow” or ‘brindled’ or ‘piebald’ cow, whose hide is again a contrast of brown against white. Then he describes the trout fish which swims, that has its body painted [stippled] with rose coloured moles. The next image, a complex one, is of a chestnut, the meaty interior cradled within its hard shell falling out, hiding its smouldering brilliance like coals in a fire, black on the outside, but glowing within as it splits and falls. The tiny birds, finches, are multicoloured usually with specks on their wings; and the landscape of a farmland, enclosed in patches, forms a pattern according to the way in which it is cultivated or left fallow or freshly ploughed. The last example in the octave is taken from the world of man, where the tools and equipments of his trade, make a dappled pattern in their variety. Hopkins places man in his context – he is only a part of the extensive natural world. And even human achievements such as trade, gear, tackle and trim, can be seen only as a part of the larger scheme of things.

In the final five lines, Hopkins goes beyond the physical characteristics of the things he has described, and delves into their natures or moral qualities. Thus all things, highly original, unconventional and strange, whether they are freckled or fickle, with all their attributes of swiftness or slowness, sweetness or sourness, brightness or dimness, come from him, the creator. In their multiplicity, the creatures affirm the permanence and immutability of God the father, and inspire the world to “Praise Him.”

Hopkins follows the adulatory style of the Psalmist in the Old Testament in the opening line. Interestingly, he also ends on a note of veneration: “Praise him!” These opening and closing lines with their parallelism, rework the mottoes of Jesuits, “to the greater Glory of God” and “praise to God always”, making the poem akin to a ritual observance, thus giving it a traditional flavour. This tempers the unorthodoxy of the appreciation – the poets’ fascination for dappled or spotted things. The parallelism in the first and the last lines, correspond to the larger symmetry of the poem: the octave, starting with praise, moves on to a laudatory inventory of creatures; the sestet, starts with a description of the characteristics of creatures and ends by praising the creator.

The poem runs on like an extended sentence, the long predicate that resembles a list, at last yields to a striking verb of creation in the penultimate sentence – “fathers-forth” – which is the *volta of the sonnet, leading the reader to acknowledge the ultimate subject, God the creator. It takes the theological position that the great variety in the created world is a testimony to the infinite power of the Creator. It also takes a polemic/political stance against the uniformity and standardization which was a feature of Victorian society, by appreciating differences summed up in “fickle, freckled”. Neither is Hopkins’ appreciation merely an aesthetic one. By juxtaposing ‘fickle’ with ‘freckled’, Hopkins introduces a moral tenor, which imbues a mere physical description with a deeper and denser significance. It calls for an acceptance of unsightly and quirky things as beautiful creations of God. That their particular individualizing attributes are of mysterious derivation is brought to attention by Hopkins in the parenthetical musing: “(who knows how?)”, hinting at its divine origin. Thus Hopkins deviates from conventional romanticism which sees beauty only in conventionally beautiful things.

* Volta: In sonnets, the volta, or turn, is a rhetorical shift or dramatic change in thought and/or emotion.

Hopkins' sprung rhythm adds vitality and vigour to the poem, which races down the list of dappled things. Alliteration sprinkled abundantly in lines such as "Glory be to God", "Fresh firecoal chestnut-falls, finches' wings", "plotted and pieced", "fold, fallow", "tackle and trim", "fickle, freckled" "swift, slow, sweet, sour", and assonance resonating within expressions like "rose-moles", and "finches' wings", impart a great aural felicity to the poem. The poet's boldness in coining new compound expressions like "couple-colour", "fresh-firecoal", adds vividness to the verbal pictures. Hopkins' linguistic experimentations are not mere embellishments. They go beyond their decorative capacity to structurally augment the thematic elements of the poem. Hopkins effectively conveys the inscape of dappled and spotted things through these rich and dense expressions.

19.5 THE WINDHOVER (1877)

19.5.1 Introduction

Have you seen an eagle or a falcon soaring high up in the sky? It is a majestic sight. What differentiates the bird of this family is its capacity to stay immobile in the air for a while without moving its wings, before it suddenly swoops down on to the earth, may be, to catch its prey! It is the hovering of the bird in midair that caught Hopkins' attention which came out as this much anthologized magnificent poem.

The Windhover was written on 30 May, 1877, the same year as 'Pied Beauty', but published only 1918. On rising early one morning, Hopkins happened to see a common kestrel which is also called Windhover because of its tendency to hover. Struck by the majesty of the bird, Hopkins was inspired to write a poem. But as is usual with Hopkins, the creature is but a pretext to perceive the majesty of the creator. Hopkins has used the subtitle To Christ, Our Lord, by which he wishes to call our attention to the greater splendour of God.

Like 'Pied Beauty', 'The Windhover' apotheosizes the glory of creation. If there is a list of images in the first poem, the latter one has a single image of a falcon or a kestrel. But Hopkins presents two facets of this bird, in statis and kinesis, i.e. in stationary position and movement. Written in the Petrarchan mode, the sonnet describes the bird in the octave and then moves on to compare the bird with the greater majesty of Christ, the Lord, in the sestet. Hopkins' devotion to God pours out in passionate words which culminate in two vivid images of self-effacement and self-sacrifice in the last tercet of the sestet.

Hopkins considered 'The Windhover', "the best thing [he] ever wrote". Hopkins avoids the 'same and tame' cadence of conventional poetry which he calls, Parnassian poetry*, and writes in sprung rhythm making his poem come fierce and alive. The poem with its vivid and condensed images, its words twisted out of present day meanings, to accommodate archaic ones, lends itself to several interpretations. We will read more about them when we discuss the poem in detail.

Eagles have fascinated poets before. Here is a short poem by Alfred Tennyson, another Victorian poet, titled 'The Eagle'.

"He clasps the crag with crooked hands;
Close to the sun in lonely lands,
Ring'd with the azure world, he stands.

The wrinkled sea beneath him crawls;
He watches from his mountain walls,
And like a thunderbolt he falls."

It would be good for you to read it and compare it with Hopkins' poem 'The Windhover', after you have read the poem, which is given below. Read the poem carefully, not once but two or three times, with the help of the glossary given beneath.

* Competent Poetry written without much inspiration. As from the heights of Parnassus, mountain sacred to the Muses according to Greek mythology

THE WINDHOVER

To Christ our Lord

I caught this morning morning's minion, kingdom of daylight's dauphin, dapple-dawn-drawn Falcon, in his riding
 Of the rolling level underneath him steady air, and striding
 High there, how he rung upon the rein of a wimpling wing
 In his ecstasy! then off, off forth on swing,
 As a skate's heel sweeps smooth on a bow-bend: the hurl and gliding
 Rebuffed the big wind. My heart in hiding
 Stirred for a bird, – the achieve of, the mastery of the thing!

Brute beauty and valour and act, oh, air, pride, plume, here
 Buckle! AND the fire that breaks from thee then, a billion
 Times told lovelier, more dangerous, O my chevalier!

No wonder of it: sheer plód makes plough down sillion
 Shine, and blue-bleak embers, ah my dear,
 Fall, gall themselves, and gash gold-vermilion.

Glossary

- minion : darling, favourite
- dauphin : [pron: /d??fæn/] crown prince or heir to the throne of France
- Falcon : is a raptor [bird of prey], belonging to the family of falco, with sharp talons and curved beak. The kestrel which belongs to this family has brown coloured plumage. Falcons are used for the hunting game called falconry [pron: /f?k?nr?/] with the help of a trained bird of prey. There is a covert reference to the game in the poem.
- wimpling : with folds, like in a wimple [a gathered headdress for nuns]
- buckle : 1) to fasten; 2) to give way under strain
- chevalier : a knight; a chivalrous man; a cavalier
- sillion : furrow; soil turned over by a plough; “sillion” is a medieval term for the small strip of land granted to monasteries to farm.
- vermillion : a brilliant scarlet red colour

Synopsis: [A synopsis is included here to help you read the poem and understand it better.]

The narrative persona, 'I', captures the image of a falcon in his eye/mind, who is the darling of morning, the crown prince of the kingdom of daylight, who is intensely drawn towards dappled dawn [early morning with streaks of red in the sky], as he rides the air. He looks as if he is riding the thermal* [rolling air], by pulling his wimpling [folding] wings back, like a horseback rider reins in his horse by pulling at it. And then, from his static position, he suddenly swoops down smoothly, gliding like a skater skating in a rink, manoeuvring a curve, hurling himself against the big wind. The heart of the persona, hidden within him, yearned to be like the bird, to achieve its mastery over the elements.

The bird which encapsulates brute beauty, bravery and action with its air [manner], pride, plume [feather], buckles [fastens itself to the greater beauty of God /or/ gives away before the greater beauty of God]. The poet tells Christ, whom he addresses as chevalier, that the fire that breaks at this act of buckling, is a million times lovelier and more dangerous. For, Christ's supreme sacrifice on the cross for the whole of humanity is definitely more glorious than the hunting bird's terrestrial exploits.

But that is not a matter to wonder. For, sheer hard work makes the ploughshare dragged within the sillion [furrows in the farm] shine brightly. Or it may be that even the furrows shine when the plow turns up the dull clods of earth and the new earth glints with minerals. And ash covered embers [blue-bleak], when they break open, they reveal in the gash, their heart of smouldering fire [gold-vermilion].

19.5.3 Discussion

Now that you have read the poem carefully, try to answer the following questions, so that we can discuss the poem.

- a) Record briefly the images that suggest the majesty and grandeur of the Windhover.

.....
.....
.....
.....
.....

[Read the octave: The sight of the kestrel in the mid air, which is majestic like the dauphin, rides like an accomplished horseman, which shows tremendous mastery of movement and fights the big wind, like a cavalier. Then it swoops down in a majestic sweeping motion, showing its mastery over the air.]

*Thermal: an upward current of warm air, used by gliders, balloonists, and birds to gain height.

b) How does the poet establish the supremacy of Christ over the kestrel?

.....
.....
.....

[Kestrel is a majestic bird. In stasis and movement, it shows its majesty and command. The creature is magnificent indeed. But the beauty of the creator is a million times told lovelier. The kestrel is a bird of prey, a raptor, hence dangerous. In its bright plumage, in its command of the situation, in its haughty demeanour, it wins the hearts of the onlookers, who aspire to be like it. But the beauty of Christ is multi-fold, when compared to the kestrel. Christ, who died on the cross, comes across as more dangerous and lovelier through his sacrifice for the whole of mankind. His bravery is one of a kind. Not the physical bravery of the bird, but spiritual bravery, which wins over the soul. If the bird is like a cavalier soldier, fighting the wind, Christ is the chevalier of human hearts.]

3) Do you think that the sonnet form has helped Hopkins to convey his ideas better?

.....
.....
.....
.....

[The sonnet form of the poem is the perfect vehicle for thoughts. The poet is able to convey ideas and paint word pictures in a condensed manner. The structural virtuosity of the Petrarchan mode with its octave and the sestet, works perfectly to convey the images of the Windhover and Christ. The movement from the kestrel to Christ is beautifully executed, with the Volta coming in the sestet. The tercets in the sestet too balance the image of Christ with the two metaphorical images revelatory of his sacrifice.]

19.5.4 Comments

- The ‘I’ mentioned in the poem can be the poet himself, or the persona of the poet.
- The poem is mimetic and visual. The poet tries to capture the movement of the falcon through a series of verbal shots – montages*.
- The word ‘caught’ is extremely significant. The poet does not use tame words like ‘saw’ or ‘beheld’. ‘Caught’ is in keeping with the image of falcon, which catches the prey. It is an epiphanic moment, when the inscape of the bird is ‘caught’ in the mind of the writer, with all its permutations, in a split second.

* Montage is a cinematic term; it is a device in editing, which combines different shots to create a scene.

- The first line is an enjambment – a run on line – which spills over from the first to the second.
- The soundscapes of Hopkins’ poem help us to ‘catch’ the inscape of the bird.
- Notice the alliterative repetition of /d/ sounds in the second line, they sound like a drum roll, accompanying the entry of a king, in this case, the dauphin.
- Also notice the repetition of sibilants in the line: “off forth on swing /As a skate’s heel sweeps smooth on a bow-bend”. Can you hear the sound of the skates cutting through the ice, as it glides over it?
- The bird by rebuffing the wind achieves or masters something in his successful negotiation. It is this act that fascinates the poet, whose heart comes out of hiding. But stepping out of one’s ego and inhabiting another creature, as the poet does here, grants one sacramental joy of being alive.
- Hopkins uses synaesthetic images. The visual, auditory and tactile images are very effectively evoked. We can see, hear, and touch very vividly and clearly.
- The poem captures in detail, words and images of medieval chivalric culture: minion, dauphin, dappled, falcon, wimple, chevalier and sillion.
- Wimple – folded cloth – is part of a nun’s headdress, which presses against her temples and keeps her hair back. In other words, the bird is exulting not only in the freedom of the air, but also in the resistance or the friction offered by it.
- In the line: “Brute beauty and valour and act, oh, air, pride, plume”, in order to make sense, you have to connect ‘brute beauty’ to ‘plume’ [the reddish-brown plumage of kestrel which conveys its brute beauty; ‘valour’ to ‘air’ [air of bravery] and ‘act’ to ‘pride’ [proud act].
- The sonnet is in the Petrarchan mode. Though the sprung rhythm and enjambments used make it appear rather alien to us. The octave presents the bird’s flight. The sestet is an open avowal of the greater majesty of Christ, the chevalier.
- The rhyme scheme is strange and unusual – the octave has one only one rhyme – ‘A’ – since each line ends in ‘-ing’. Though these are not gerund in all the instances [as in ‘king-’, thing etc], the stanza gives us a feeling of continued action. The sestet which consists of two tercets rhymes ‘BCB-CBC’, interlocking the latter idea with the previous one.
- The Volta [turn] of the poem comes with the word “Buckle”.
- The poem is thematically, structurally and syntactically very challenging to the reader. But rewarding too.

19.6 LET US SUM UP

In this unit you have been introduced to the life of Gerard Manley Hopkins, and examined two poems written by him. Both the poems are sonnets, but the first one is a curtal sonnet, while the second is written in the Petrarchan mode. We hope that you will be able to distinguish the features of both. You have also learnt about Hopkins' innovation in prosody, the sprung rhythm. It would be good to analyse the advantages of using sprung rhythm instead of conventional English meters like the iambic. You have also come into touch with Hopkins' concept of Inscape, which we are sure, will make you look at the objects around in a different light, which is the ultimate goal of learning literature: it widens the horizons of the mind.

We also hope that reading these poems has whetted your curiosity and appetite for more of Hopkins' poems. You will find them in anthologies or collections of poems or you can browse the net to read them as they are all available online.

20.0 OBJECTIVES

After reading this unit you will be able to:

- Talk about Hardy the poet, his life and work.
- Appreciate his poems ‘To an Unborn Pauper Child’ and ‘Great Things’
- Understand and analyse D.H. Lawrence, the poet.
- Analyse the thematic as well as formal aspects of ‘Bavarian Gentians’

20.1 INTRODUCTION

This unit will introduce you to Thomas Hardy and D.H. Lawrence, two major writers at the turn of the twentieth century. They were novelists of great repute, but their contributions to the world of poetry are equally seminal and individual. But unfortunately, their reputation as poets was subsumed within their status as novelists. Hardy had made his presence felt by the end of the Victorian era, while D. H. Lawrence who was his younger contemporary started writing at the beginning of the twentieth century. Both wrote novels which created great controversies because they lived in an age that was still in the grip of rigid Victorian moral attitudes. Both wrote poems which are noted for their distinctive voice and idiosyncratic treatment of subjects.

We will be reading about the two poets in detail in the separate introductions to each. Though there is a gap of forty five years between them, we are struck by certain similarities in their disposition and outlook. Both Hardy and Lawrence struggled against Victorian hypocrisy and prudery*. Both had to face censorship for their frank treatment of sex and immorality, though in varying degrees. Both immortalized the counties they came from, in their novels: Hardy made the county of Dorset and nearby lands famous as Wessex, while Lawrence wrote about the Mining town of Eastwood in Nottinghamshire in his novels. Lawrence was greatly influenced by Hardy, and published a study on him. Both died in the third decade of the twentieth century. Hardy in 1928 and Lawrence in 1930 – though Hardy was eighty seven years old and Lawrence just forty four.

In this unit, we will acquaint you with two poems of Thomas Hardy: ‘To an Unborn Pauper child’ and ‘Great Things’. You will notice how Hardy’s philosophies of fatalism and pessimism are deeply mirrored in the first. The second, a breezy little poem – rather uncharacteristic – offers a nice balance, and speaks about the small things that make the poet happy. The poem by D. H. Lawrence that you will read in this unit is ‘Bavarian Gentians’ – a sombre poem, full of beautiful and dense images and mythological allusions. By the end of the unit, you will be able to read, critically assess and appreciate these poems.

To read and understand Hardy and Lawrence one needs to know about the backgrounds from which they hailed. As writers who were influenced by the zeitgeist (the spirit of the times), it is necessary for us to delve into the Victorian age and the early twentieth century, the periods spanning their lifetimes. The next section will offer you an insightful peek into the historical background of the age in which these writers lived – glancing at the political, social and ideological upheavals of the times.

Different strategies have been adopted in examining the poems which have been selected for detailed study. The analysis provided along with the poems will serve as a guide to help you analyse poems on your own during examination. They will also help you comprehend the text better and learn to appreciate Hardy’s and Lawrence’s poetry for their metrical patterns and beauty of images. Read through the unit section by section, pause till you digest what you have read, and do the exercises as you read. Hope you enjoy your journey of discovering the poetic side of these literary giants.

20.2 HISTORICAL BACKGROUND

Now get ready for a swift tour of the Victorian age and the early Twentieth century. Victorian age, the period signifying the reign of Queen Victoria from her accession in 1837 to her death in 1901, was an age of contradictions. On the one hand, it was a period of incredible economic expansion and rapid change. Britain had become the mistress of sea and land, and its capital London had become the first urban capital of the world, the first metropolis. An urban economy based on manufacturing, international trade and financial institutions boomed, and the lay of land changed with a rapidly enlarging city. Transport and communication facilities improved tremendously and distances shrank. England had become the workshop of the world, the world's banker as well as the world's policeman. But on the other hand, it was also an age of paradoxes and uncertainties. The success of the nation reached its pinnacle and then began to wane. By the end of the 19th century, the euphoria, optimism and positivism of the earlier decades started dwindling to be replaced by doubts, scepticism and even pessimism. The gulf between the haves and the have-nots had widened. The traditional villages and towns observed a depletion of population as London and other industrial cities burst at the seams with people gathering there from all over. The phenomenon resulted in the emergence of a new suburbia, with slums and rookeries*. Crime rate accelerated. A series of social reforms were initiated trying to address the problems and issues.

Ideologically too Victorian age sent contradictory signals. While religious and philanthropic movements gathered momentum, the very basis of belief systems crumbled. The concept of creation was questioned following the publication of Charles Darwin's On the Origin of Species in 1859. While family values were lauded and practiced, Queen Victoria herself towering as the emblem of customary domestic values, a bohemian life style started making its presence felt towards the end of the 19th century. These changes are apparent when we survey the literature of the times. Browning, one of the preeminent poets of the Victorian era had deemed that "God's in his Heaven/All's right with the world!" at the heyday of the Victorian period; but pangs of doubt trouble a pessimistic Matthew Arnold three decades later, who sees the present world as "a darkling plain /Swept with confused alarms of struggle and flight, / Where ignorant armies clash by night." World was slowly turning rudderless, with doubt and despair climaxing in the literature of the times.

This is the world inhabited by Hardy. By the turn of the century, decadence had set in. Psychology was recognised as a science after the publication of Sigmund Freud's The Interpretations of Dreams in 1901. Old moral values which had signified the Victorian era eroded as they were held up to question. Victorian age gave place to the Georgian era, an age that witnessed the rapid degeneration of the British Empire after the Boer War in Africa and the emergence of new predicaments which had worldwide repercussions. Russian revolution had taken place and England witnessed the rapid rise of a labour class into power. In the second decade of the century, the World War I erupted when Hardy was in his seventies and Lawrence at the peak of his career. Modernism had dawned and existential philosophies had gained ground in the philosophical realm. The world had truly passed into the chaotic ethos of the twentieth century.

* Rookeries: overcrowded slums of London were known by this name in the 18th and 19th centuries and were the haunt of criminals and prostitutes. (As they were living like crows or rooks, nesting together and filling the surroundings with their hoarse cries)

20.3 THOMAS HARDY

[b. 1840 Upper Bockhampton, Dorset - d.1928 Max Gate, England]

Thomas Hardy was born on 2 June, 1840 in the village of Higher Bockhampton in the county of Dorset, one of the poorest and backward rural counties of England remaining unchanged for centuries. His father, also named Thomas, was a stonemason, builder and a fiddler who used to play in the local parish choir. His mother Jemima was the true guiding star of his life, who though, was a housemaid and a cook before her marriage, was an avid reader of literary books. Hardy inherited his musicality from his father and his love for books from his mother. It is said that Hardy loved solitude and drew his impulses from the natural world around him. He received his schooling first from National school in Bockhampton and later at Mr. Last's Academy in Dorchester, a non-conformist school. Though he showed great academic potential, his formal education came to an end at the age of 16, when he was apprenticed to a local architect, John Hicks.

During his tenure there he came across the Dorchester poet William Barnes who influenced him to write nature poems and Horace Moule, a scholar who encouraged him to read Greek tragedies and contemporary English literature. Darwin's On the Origin of Species had a profound influence on him. In 1862 Hardy moved to London and worked as an assistant architect to Arthur Blomfield who restored and designed churches. He won prizes from the Royal Institute of British Architects and the Architectural Association. Hardy was appointed to oversee the disinterment of graves in the churchyard of St. Pancras Old Church. This event had a great influence on him and he later wrote his 'grave' poems based on this experience. Hardy was drawn into the cultural life of London. He visited museums, galleries, attended plays and operas. He read avidly and started writing poetry. Though the first poems were rejected by publishers, one finally published in the Chambers Journal won him a prize. His poems highlighted his concerns which he had gleaned from reading and observation, and foreshadowed the themes of his later prose fiction. Disillusioned with traditional Christianity, Hardy became more and more aware of human misery and loneliness. His fatalism stemmed from the hard realisation of an uncaring universe and the role of chance in human life.

Disenchanted by London, Hardy returned to his native Bockhampton in 1867, worked for a while as an architect and then gave up his job to pursue a full time career as a writer. His first novel The Poor Man and the Lady was not published, and the next one Desperate Remedies was published anonymously. Under the Greenwood Tree, which followed, was favourably received, as was A Pair of Blue Eyes. Far From the Madding Crowd gained public notice and brought him financial success which was repeated by The Return of the Native.

Thomas Hardy and D.H.
Lawrence

In the meanwhile, Hardy who had experienced several rejections from women, fell in love with Emma Lavinia Gifford, a Cornish lady, and married her. It is believed that A Pair of Blue Eyes was inspired largely by their courtship. They settled at Max Gate, a large Mid-Victorian villa, which Hardy had designed himself, which he considered his ‘country retreat’ – and this became his permanent abode (see image).

Hardy's Map of Wessex

A view of Dorset

Though the couple had a happy and contented life, and shared several passions like travelling and cycling, as years passed, Emma grew estranged from her husband mainly due to the content of his fictional writings and his romantic attachments to artistic young ladies. Lack of offspring might have also be a reason for this. Though The Mayor of Casterbridge, The Woodlanders and other novels had gathered popular as well as critical acclaim, Hardy's last and greatest fictional works Tess of the d'Urbervilles (1891) and Jude the Obscure (1895) shocked, dismayed and outraged the Victorian public with their subject matter. Considered too pessimistic, they accused Hardy of being too preoccupied with sex. Decried as ‘Jude the Obscene’ the hue and cry created by his last novel disturbed Hardy and made him give up writing novels altogether and return to his first love, poetry. Hardy considered poetry to be, “the heart of literature”. In 1898 he published the Wessex Poems.

WESSEX COUNTRY

Wessex is Hardy's fictional universe. (See pictures). Strongly identifying himself and his work with Dorset, Hardy borrowed the name of the old Anglo-Saxon kingdom, coined the names of villages and towns to represent actual places and even provided a map of the area (see images above). His novels were called Wessex novels and turning to poetry, he continued in the same vein. He was fascinated with other features of southern England especially the Stonehenge, the ancient druid rocks (see below), which interest is reflected in his poems like 'The Shadow of the Stone'.

Hardy's poetry wears a pessimistic, fatalistic and existential outlook evoking the dark, rugged landscape of Dorset. It laments the bleakness of human condition. He is one who "holds that if way to the Better there be, it exacts a full look at the Worst", as he states in his poem 'In Tenebris II'. Even the term 'In Tenebris', meaning 'in the darkness', which forms the title of a series of lyrics, highlights the bleak, doomstruck human world. His poems are haunted by a pervasive sense of the forlorn. There are instances in which Hardy's tragic view of life makes him refer to humans as 'Time's Laughingstocks', and point out to 'Life's Little Ironies'. Among Hardy's poems we will be able to identify a number of recurring themes and images. These overarching themes can be divided into three central categories of ghosts, grave and afterlife; God, nature and rural life; passage of time; love and war. His love poems are not traditional romantic love poems – but starker and darker poems of loss, ghosts and transience.

Hardy was inspired by the great panorama of Napoleonic Wars and wrote an epic drama in blank verse titled The Dynasts, published in three parts over five years. It presents Hardy's idea of "evolutionary meliorism", a belief in the power of humankind and a hope in the eventual amendment of the world through human actions. He also wrote lyric poetry which is considered to be his best. He forged a modern and original style combining colloquial diction and rough-hewn rhythms which nevertheless closely followed conventional techniques, paying attention to the musical aspects of language. His greatest poems were written after the sudden death of his wife Emma in 1912. They are considered to be the "finest and strangest celebrations of the dead in English poetry", according to the Hardy biographer Claire Tomalin. Shortly after Emma's death, Hardy married Florence Dugdale, his secretary, who was forty years his junior. But he remained remorseful of Emma's death.

By this time, Hardy's literary authority was acknowledged beyond dispute. A very prolific writer, he has written 14 novels, two plays, more than 40 short stories and over 900 poems. The major collections of his poems include: Wessex Poems, Poems of the Past and the Present (1901), Time's Laughingstocks and Other Verses (1909), Moments of Vision (1917), Satires of Circumstance (1914), Collected Poems (1919) etc. The University of Aberdeen awarded him an honorary degree and in 1910, King George V conferred the Order of Merit on him. In 1912, the Royal Society of Literature awarded him a gold medal. Hardy was visited by several writers at Max Gate and he exercised tremendous influence on writers like James Barrie, Rudyard Kipling, G B Shaw, Virginia Woolf and many others. During the World War I he took active part in campaigns, visiting military hospitals and POW (Prisoner/s of War) camps. His poems on war, with their visceral imagery influenced the War poets like Siegfried Sassoon. After his 87th birthday, Hardy grew weaker and he became ill with pleurisy. He died on 11 January, 1928 and had two simultaneous funerals. His body was cremated and ashes deposited in the Poets' Corner of Westminster Abbey, while his heart was buried alongside Emma in Stinsford Churchyard in Dorchester.

20.4 TO AN UNBORN PAUPER CHILD

20.4.1 Introduction

The poem ‘To an Unborn Pauper Child’ is taken from the collection, Poems of the Past and the Present: Poems of Pilgrimage, published in 1901. In the preface to the collection Hardy noted: “the road to a true philosophy of life seems to lie in humbly recording diverse readings of its phenomenon as they are forced upon us by chance and change.” It is believed that the poem was inspired by an incident that occurred in the Dorchester Magistrate’s Court, which he chanced upon. Hardy read of a pauper woman in the records of the court of petty sessions which said that “she must go to the Union-house to have her baby”, and this occasioned the poem.

Hardy’s poems convincingly convey the sadness of life and mirror the pathos encapsulated in Virgil’s dictum: Sunt lacrimae rerum – “There are tears in things”. There is nothing hopeful about earthly life. In this poem, Hardy adopts an anti-natal stance. He stands with the Greek dramatist Sophocles who said in Oedipus at Colonus, that, “Not to be born is, beyond all estimation, best; but when a man has seen the light of day, this is next best by far, that with utmost speed he should go back from where he came.” Because what is life but “Envy, factions, strife, battles, and murders”. And in the end comes the pitiful lot of the old: “blamed, weak, unsociable, friendless, wherein dwells every misery among miseries.” “To an Unborn Pauper Child” is a dark poem which is meant to be a warning to the yet-to-be born child. It bids the child to stop breathing while still in its mother’s womb and bid good bye to the world. The world is a dark, dreary one full of ‘travails and teens’ - difficulties and sorrows, with nothing alleviating about it. So it is better to sleep the eternal sleep.

There are several other pieces on the birth of young children in English poetry. Hardy’s poem is comparable to William Blake’s ‘Infant Sorrow’ in which the infant says: “Into the dangerous world I leapt”, or Louis MacNeice’s ‘Prayer before Birth’. Yet there are other poems in which we may detect a more optimistic outlook, as in Samuel Taylor Coleridge’s ‘Frost at Midnight’ and W.B. Yeats’ ‘A Prayer for My Daughter’.

Now let’s read the poem and get a hang of the cadences. Written in the traditional rhythmic mode, the poem consists of six stanzas of six lines each, rhyming aabbcc. The first, the second and the fifth lines in each stanza are cast in iambic tetrameter; the third and the fourth in iambic dimeter and the sixth, which is the last line, is fashioned in iambic pentameter, which gives the effect of a grand statement. Iambic is a traditional meter in English language composed of two syllables of which the first syllable unstressed or unaccented and the second one stressed or accented. The last three lines of the first stanza have been scanned for you, which would give you an idea about the three different feet or meter used here. Please note that the end of each foot or meter is indicated with a slash (/) mark. The stressed syllable is highlighted and underlined while the unstressed is indicated in ordinary font.

*The Doom /sters heap (2) – Iambic dimeter

Travails / and teens / around / us here, (4) – Iambic tetrameter

And Time /-Wraiths turn /our song / singsings / to fear. (5) – Iambic pentameter

If you read the poem aloud, you will get feel of the meter as it jolts over the evenly bumpy path of iambic. Use the glossary given beneath the text to understand unfamiliar words.

20.4. 2 The Text

To an Unborn Pauper Child

Breathe not, hid Heart: cease silently,
And though thy birth-hour beckons thee,
Sleep the long sleep:
The Doomsters heap
Travails and teens around us here,
And Time-Wraiths turn our songsings to fear.

Hark, how the peoples surge and sigh,
And laughters fail, and greetings die;
Hopes dwindle; yea,
Faiths waste away,
Affections and enthusiasms numb:
Thou canst not mend these things if thou dost come.

Had I the ear of wombed souls
Ere their terrestrial chart unrolls,
And thou wert free
To cease, or be,
Then would I tell thee all I know,
And put it to thee: Wilt thou take Life so?

Vain vow! No hint of mine may hence
To theeward fly: to thy locked sense
Explain none can
Life's pending plan:
Thou wilt thy ignorant entry make
Though skies spout fire and blood and nations quake.

Fain would I, dear, find some shut plot
Of earth's wide wold for thee, where not
One tear, one qualm,
Should break the calm.
But I am weak as thou and bare;
No man can change the common lot to rare.

Must come and bide. And such are we — Unreasoning, sanguine, visionary —
That I can hope
Health, love, friends, scope
In full for thee; can dream thou'lt find Joys seldom yet attained by humankind!

20.4. 3 An Analysis of the Poem

The poem 'To an Unborn Pauper Child' begins with a shocking injunction. The poet bids the pauper child in his mother's womb not to breathe, but to cease or die silently. To sleep the eternal sleep though its hour of birth is approaching near. The poet warns the child that doomsters or deities of fate are heaping hard times of pain and woe on human life. The spectres of time are turning the spontaneously happy moments (songsingings) to fearful ones. He asks the child to listen to the sighs of countless people. In this world, laughter fails, greetings die in the throat. Hope diminishes; faiths lose their impact and cease to be. Affections freeze and enthusiasms abate. By being born on earth, the child cannot redress these pitiful things.

Hardy says that if he had the attention of the babies in the womb before their time on earth started, and if they in turn had the choice to decide whether they should live or die, he would describe to them the conditions of the earth and ask whether they were willing to be born under these circumstances. But this is a futile desire, as his warning would never reach the baby that is locked away in its mother's womb. None would be able to describe the plan that life has in store for them. And so the baby will be born ignorant of what awaits it in this world, even though earth shattering things are occurring here.

The poet says that he would gladly find some enclosed plot in the wide expanse of the earth, where the child would remain without a tear or disquietude. But the poet admits his incapacity to do this, as he is as weak as the baby. He cannot change the common destiny to a rare one. So, since he is unable to change the fate of the baby or to give warning of what is in store for it, he asks the child to come and dwell on the earth. And because humans are by nature happily optimistic, visionary and not given to reason, he can hope and wish that the baby, once it is born, will live in love, good health, friendship and possibilities galore. He dreams that the child will attain joys which are rarely attained by mankind.

Hardy's fatalism and pessimism is indisputably evident in the poem. The poet begins in utmost despair and speaks in a doom-filled voice that nothing is pleasant or promising for the yet-to-be-born child. But in the last stanza there is resignation in his tone and the poem ends by expressing a fervent prayer that things may be better for the child. Time is perceived as an enemy of man in Hardy’s writings. Curious notions of Fate as Doomsters and of Time as Wraiths which haunt, lend it a note of ominous determinism. Time erodes all such natural positive values as “laughter”, “hopes”, “faiths”, “affections” and “enthusiasms”. While pitted against these positive nouns stand negative verbs: “sigh”, “fail”, “die”, “dwindle”, “waste” and “numb”, which highlight the withering process. Though the poem addresses the unborn ‘pauper’ child specifically, the terrible things he attributes to the world may be applicable to any child born into the world, even though it may be said that without the support systems needed to exist on earth, the lot of a pauper child may be all the more pitiable. Hardy has witnessed several disruptive events in the world, and had seen the various modes of fighting and the aftermath of World War I – and the line “Though skies spout fire and blood and nations quake” might be a reference to the aerial warfare and blitzkrieg* during the World War.

The poem is addressed to the child. It is an ‘apostrophe’: a rhetorical device in the form of an address to someone not present. Many of the stanzas begin with injunctions and interjections: “Breathe not, hid Heart: cease silently”, “Hark!” “Vain vow!” “Must come and bide”. Written in traditional meter and stanzaic pattern, the poem effectively makes use of alliterations such as, “hid Heart”, “cease silently”, “birth-hour beckons”, “Travails and teens” “surge and sigh”, “pending plan”, “wide wold” etc. Personification of Time as Time-wraiths conveys the vagaries of time as well as the tormenting and obsessive nature of the phenomena on human psyche. Provincialisms and archaisms such as ‘teens’, ‘wold’ and ‘fain’ which mean ‘harms’ ‘open land’ and ‘gladly’ respectively lend quaintness of the old world to the poem. There are strange coinages like ‘theeward’, which sound unfamiliar and rather awkward. The rhythm of the iambic meter imparts a rhythmic tone to the poem, similar to the rocking of a cradle. For Hardy, poetry was “emotion put into measure” where “the emotion must come by nature”, but measure must be “acquired by art”. ‘To an Unborn Pauper Child’ is a perfect synthesis of emotion and measure; a splendid blend of nature and art.

20.5 GREAT THINGS (1964)

20.5.1 Introduction

This poem is different from the previous one, and is one of Hardy’s sunnier, springier and simpler poems. Highly nostalgic, the poem speaks about Hardy’s self-indulgent love for things like cider, dance and love, which he labels as “great things”. The poem ‘Great Things’ was included in the collection, Moments of Vision and Miscellaneous Verses, published in 1917. The theme of Moments of Vision, states Hardy, was to “mortify the human sense of self-importance by showing or suggesting, that human beings are of no matter or appreciable value in this nonchalant universe.” But as is often the case, Hardy’s poems within a collection, though often arranged under headings, may divert from their stated purpose.

Here we may see the young Hardy, footloose and fancy-free, or one who is very much in love with the merry aspects of life. He is one who is not torn apart or depressed by the “travails and teens” of life, but flinging into its mirth and gaiety with wholehearted gusto. A very simple poem, it itemizes and states what the things he consider ‘Great’ are! It gives us a glimpse of Hardy country with its references to Weymouth and Ridgeway. We encounter the same sort of simplicity and ebullience that we find in the Scotch poet Robert Burns’ poems like “Auld Lang Syne”. Hardy was a lover of Omar Khayyam and the last book that was read to him just before his death was Edward Fitzgerald’s English translation of it. The hedonistic love that one finds in Rubaiyat comprising wine, women, verse and music is easily observable in ‘Great things’:

“A Book of Verses underneath the Bough,
A Jug of Wine, a Loaf of Bread—and Thou
Beside me singing in the Wilderness—
Oh, Wilderness were Paradise enow!” (Rubaiyat)

The poem consists of four stanzas of eight lines each. The refrain at the end of each stanza is a repetition of the opening statement of each, a slight difference being made by appending ‘O’ in front of the refrain. But the last stanza is an exception, where the stanza begins in a question mode and ends with an emphatic ascertainment of the same. So we can state that the poet has made use of incremental repetition, which is considered to be one of the features of the ballad stanza. The first and fifth lines rhyme (e.g.: thing – summoning; things – flings) as do every second alternate lines in each stanza, (e.g.: me – thirstily – hostelry – me; me – silently – tree – me) lending it a euphonic congruence and cohesion. There are a couple of provincialisms that Hardy uses in the poem. Make a note of them.

Now read the poem, preferably aloud to get a feel of the sounds and the jiggy, toe-tapping rhythm. Read it again with the use of the glossary to understand the meanings and allusions.

Cider/Cyder

Dance

Great Things

Sweet cyder is a great thing,
A great thing to me,
Spinning down to Weymouth town
By Ridgway thirstily,
And maid and mistress summoning
Who tend the hostelry:
O cyder is a great thing,
A great thing to me!

The dance it is a great thing,
A great thing to me,
With candles lit and partners fit
For night-long revelry;
And going home when day-dawning
Peeps pale upon the lea:
O dancing is a great thing,
A great thing to me!

Love is, yea, a great thing,
A great thing to me,
When, having drawn across the lawn
In darkness silently,
A figure flits like one a-wing
Out from the nearest tree:
O love is, yes, a great thing,
A great thing to me!

Will these be always great things,
Great things to me? . . .
Let it befall that One will call,
“Soul, I have need of thee”:
What then? Joy-jaunts, impassioned flings,
Love, and its ecstasy,
Will always have been great things,
Great things to me!

[1. The poet states that sweet cider is a great thing to him. As he passes by Weymouth and Ridgeway feeling thirsty, the mistress and the maid who run the hostelry or the inn, invite him to drink cider. A thing that assuages thirst and is sweet and pleasurable in addition, is definitely a great thing.]

[2. The poet likes dance because it happens in an atmosphere of mirth, gaiety and romance. In candle-lit ambience, with the most suitable partner, one may settle down to night-long celebrations, and return only when the day starts dawning. These pleasurable moments make dance a great thing to him.]

[3. Love is beautiful for assignations and stolen moments in the dark. The lover moves across the lawn in darkness waiting for his partner. The lady love flits to her lover silently like the silent bird flying out of the tree. These secret meetings and trysts add to the romance and mystery of love, and make it a great thing.]

[4. The poet speaks about the inevitable death which would summon all people, one day. So when the final call comes and we are forced to make an exit, all the things that one found joy in when alive, such as joyous travels, impassioned dances and ecstatic love, will become things of the past, but nevertheless would remain precious and great. This philosophy ties it up closely to hedonism, Epicureanism and the concept of ‘carpe diem’ or ‘seize the day’.]

20.5.4 Comments

- It is a ‘feel good’ poem, written in a gay mood. It has the structure, feel and rhythm of a folk song.
- There are elements of hedonism, which is the philosophy or doctrine that states that pleasure or happiness is the highest good.
- The poet describes the pleasure of drinking sweet cider, partaking in dance and being in love.
- These activities have been identified as the sweetest by people in several lands. Omar Khayyam has glorified it. ‘Halavadi’ poets in Hindi Literature have done it. The poets who advocate ‘carpe diem’ or the philosophy of ‘seize the day’ have considered it the highest good.
- The poet imparts a local flavour to the practice of imbibing cider. Drinking cider and ale is an activity that is indulged in by country people. They visit the local pub or hostelry to drink. They are tended by the mistress of the pub or by the bar-maid. These characters impart a local flavour to the poem. The poet roots this activity in the reality of Dorchester by making references to Weymouth and Ridgeway, two important places in Dorset and Hardy world. The verb ‘spinning down’ instils a spirit of jaunty happiness and conveys a mood of tipsiness.
- Dance is the art of passion. Dancing with a partner is one of the happy activities that the people of the west indulge in. Often dances are all night festivities, where one takes turns dancing with various partners. With fast and slow dances such as a tango or a waltz, mood sets in. Candle-lit dances are romantic affairs. The dancers return home only when the day starts breaking. Hardy very poetically describes the day break. Dawn is a party-wrecker who peeps in to spy on the dancers.
- Dorset and whereabouts are always a part of Hardy’s world. References to the local places and terrain sprinkle the poem. The reference to ‘lea’ or open tract of land draws our attention to one of the physical features of Dorset.
- Love is a great thing because of its secretive and romantic nature. Lovers have a clandestine assignation at night in the garden, which is one of the thrills of being in love. The lover waits for his beloved in the darkness and sees the joyous sight of his lady love flitting across the lawn to where he stands with the swiftness of bird which swoops silently from the tree nearby. The poet beautifully invokes the impatience of waiting and the rapture of the meeting. He also conjures up the atmosphere of darkness and secretiveness in which the impatient lovers meet furtively.

- The final stanza brings the reader down to ground realities. Life on earth is transient and death will come inevitably. The poet imagines Death calling out to him when his time is up. But even then, the joy jaunts to drink at pubs, passionate dances and secret meetings of love will always have been great things to him.
- In the last stanza the poem slides from simple present to future perfect, emphasizing the perennial quality of his likes. Whatever happens, these things would always remain great things for him. He wishes that it may be so forever.
- The fifth line of each stanza ends in ‘-ing’, (‘summoning’, ‘dawning’, ‘a-wing’) lending it a sensation of continued activity, that his love for these things is something perennially lasting. In the last stanza this line ends in the plural – ‘flings’ – in tune with the summing up that is being done in that stanza.

20.6 D. H. LAWRENCE

(b. 11 September, 1885, Eastwood, Nottinghamshire – d. 2 March, 1930, Vence, France)

Introduction:

D.H. Lawrence was an iconoclastic writer who revolutionized fiction writing at the beginning of the 20th century with his frank portrayal of sensuality and earned notoriety while he lived. He was a versatile genius who was a novelist, poet, short-story writer, translator, essayist, critic and a painter. Born as the fourth child of Arthur John Lawrence, a barely literate miner and Lydia, a former teacher who passed on her sensitivity and intelligence to her children, Lawrence's formative years were spent in the mining town of Eastwood in Nottinghamshire. This land he called, "the country of my heart" and formed the background of much of his writings. The tensions latent in his family life, especially between his crude father and his sensitive and educated mother, informed his works. He attended the Beauvale Board School and won a scholarship to Nottingham High School.

He worked as a junior clerk in a factory for a few months, but left it after he contracted pneumonia. His friendship with Jessie Chambers burgeoned at this time, as both of them shared a love for books. He also started writing poems and short stories during this period. In 1907 he won a prize in the short story competition in the Nottingham Guardian, the earliest recognition of his talents. In 1908 he received a teaching certificate from the University College, Nottingham.

He left for London to teach at Davidson Road School, Croydon. His talent as a writer was recognized by Ford Madox Ford and he was commissioned to write a story for The English Review, titled the Odour of Chrysanthemums. In 1910 Lawrence's mother, with whom he had a very close relationship, died of cancer, leaving him devastated. During this time, his first novel The White Peacock was completed, and soon he started working on his celebrated novel, Sons and Lovers, which was closely autobiographical in nature. He had broken off his engagement to his childhood friend Louie Burrows in the meanwhile, and decided to become a full time writer.

Lawrence met Frieda Weekley, the wife of his modern languages professor and the mother of three children, and promptly fell in love with her. Frieda was six years older than him and of German parentage. Their elopement created a furore. They first settled in Metz, where the political tensions during the First World War had Lawrence arrested as a British spy. He was released at the intervention of his father-in-law and they left for Italy across the Alps. During their stay in Italy, Lawrence completed Sons and Lovers.

The couple returned to England and Lawrence soon became friends with writers and critics including John Middleton Murray, Katherine Mansfield and the Welsh poet W.H. Davies. They kept on shuttling between the continent and the British Isles. In July 1914, they got married and settled in Zennor, Cornwall. But the local government considered the presence of a controversial writer and his German wife so near the coast to be a war time security threat and banished him from Cornwall. Lawrence was forced to leave Cornwall at three days' notice under the terms of DORA – Defence of the Realm Act. He lived in Derbyshire for a while, shifting from address to address, due to poverty. This wrote his celebrated short story The White Peacock while living there.

Lawrence wrote and completed The Rainbow and Women in Love. The former was suppressed after an investigation into its alleged obscenity. All throughout his life Lawrence had to face censorship. The Rainbow was published only in 1920, and is now considered one of the major English novels with great intellectual subtlety.

After the war, during which he had to suffer trauma at the hand of local authorities, Lawrence began his voluntary self exile – which he terms his 'savage pilgrimage'. He returned to Britain only twice and went travelling all over the world, bitten by wanderlust and writing extensively. His novel Kangaroo relates some of his experiences in Australia as well as his wartime experiences in Cornwall. In 1922, Lawrence settled in a utopian community at Kiowa Ranch, near Taos in New Mexico, where he wrote some of his noted critical articles on American Literature. When his health deteriorated, they were forced to leave New Mexico for Italy. Lawrence completed Lady Chatterley's Lover, his last major novel, which reinforced his notoriety as a writer of pornography. Lawrence defended himself in two of his collections of satirical poems Pansies and Nettles and also in his tract on Pornography and Obscenity.

Lawrence was a great advocate of the bodily instinct. He believed that European civilisation gave too much emphasis to the intellect. In his famous ‘belief in the blood’ speech, Lawrence says: “My great religion is a belief in the blood, the flesh, as being wiser than the intellect. We can go wrong in our minds. But what our blood feels and believes and says, is always true. The intellect is only a bit and a bridle.” In a letter to Ernest Collings, Lawrence writes: “I conceive a man’s body as a kind of flame, like a candle flame, forever upright and yet flowing; and the intellect is just the light that is shed on to the things around.” He is concerned with the mystery of the flame forever flowing, which comes out of practically nowhere, and being itself, it lights up whatever there is around it.

In the final years of his life, Lawrence was exceptionally active, writing poems, essays, reviews as well as producing oil painting. His last important work was Apocalypse, a reflection on the Book of Revelation. He died due to complications of tuberculosis at the Villa Robermond in Vence, France.

Lawrence legacy is vast and varied. Though best known for his novels and short stories, he was also a prolific poet, writing about 800 poems. Though in the beginning, his style is Georgian with well-worn poetic tropes and archaic language, it changed dramatically after the World War I. Influenced by Walt Whitman, Lawrence adopted free verse as his medium, ridding himself of stereotyped movements. Lawrence believed in writing poetry that was “stark, immediate and true to the mysterious inner force which motivated it”. His best known collections are Birds, Beasts and Flowers and Tortoises, in which he deals with nature and natural subjects. ‘Snake’ is one of his most anthologized poems. He also wrote several love poems in the anthology, Look, We have come through! Many of his later poems are in the modernist tradition, though he is different from other modernists. His collections Pansies as well as Nettles contain bitter satires on the moral climate of England. The poems written during the final days were printed posthumously as Last Poems and More Pansies, and contain Lawrence’s most celebrated poems on death, ‘Bavarian Gentians’ and ‘The Ship of Death’.

20.7 BAVARIAN GENTIAN

20.7.1 Introduction

The poem 'Bavarian Gentians' is included in the collection Last Poems and More Pansies. For Lawrence, the phenomenal world of flora and fauna held a mystical aura, often teaching human beings the higher moral values of life. The subject, be it a bird, beast, plant or a flower, stands as a symbol of various facets of human nature. 'Bavarian Gentians' is a poem of death and eternal life. There are two versions of the poem with the texts differing in the latter half.

Written during his last days on earth, the poem stems from the interminable long-suffering wait of D.H. Lawrence as a tuberculosis patient for death to descend on him. The movement towards death is slow and sure. John Keats, another poet whose tragic life was cut off in its prime, bemoans the plight of the world in his poem 'Ode to the Nightingale': "Where youth grows pale, and spectre-thin, and dies", referring to the sad end of his brother who was a tuberculosis patient. Thomas Mann at the end of his novel The Magic Mountain says to his protagonist about the ravages of TB and its almost inevitable excruciating end, "The wicked dance in which you are caught up will last many a sinful year yet, and we would not wager much that you will come out whole." Lawrence too must have felt that he was caught up in its wicked dance. And the only way was to wait to descend into death. Lawrence's poem seduces the reader with the slow dance with blue death using the symbols of the Bavarian gentians.

Bavarian gentians are a rarity. These dark blue flowers are outdoor plants often found in rocky terrain. By taking something decorative and incidental as a flower and turning it into a strong personal symbol which encompasses Lawrencian duality, is a remarkable poetic feat and a triumph of genius. Lawrence is famous for presenting different sides of a single image – he yokes contraries together as metaphysical poets do. Here the Bavarian Gentians symbolize Pluto's gloom of death and darkness and yet they are torches that shed bright blue light of life as a torch, showing the way to death.

"The poem itself is a complex web, a trance like dream that suggests both a gravitation toward death and a transcendence beyond it", says Ferris. The cadence of the poem is haunting in its ruminant mood, made possible by repetition of words and phrases, and its spiraling motion suggesting descent into death. Written in vers libre or free verse, with a liberal use of enjambement or run-on lines, and extended sentences with appended clauses, the poem captures in its stylistic peculiarities, the slow and inexorable movement towards death.

Now read the poem with the help of the glossary, and see whether you are able to capture the sadly entrancing mood of the poem.

20.7.2 The Text

Bavarian Gentians

Not every man has gentians in his house in Soft September, at slow, Sad Michaelmas.

Bavarian gentians, big and dark, only dark darkening the daytime torchlike with the smoking blueness of Pluto's gloom, ribbed and torchlike, with their blaze of darkness spread blue down flattening into points, flattened under the sweep of white day torch-flower of the blue-smoking darkness, Pluto's dark-blue daze, black lamps from the halls of Dis, burning dark blue, giving off darkness, blue darkness, as Demeter's pale lamps give off light,
lead me then, lead me the way.

Reach me a gentian, give me a torch let me guide myself with the blue, forked torch of this flower down the darker and darker stairs, where blue is darkened on blueness. even where Persephone goes, just now, from the frosted September to the sightless realm where darkness was awake upon the dark and Persephone herself is but a voice or a darkness invisible enfolded in the deeper dark of the arms Plutonic, and pierced with the passion of dense gloom, among the splendor of torches of darkness, shedding darkness on the lost bride and groom.

Glossary:

- Bavarian Gentian : is a blue tubular flower. It is a typical, personal Lawrencean symbol. [See picture above]
- Michaelmas : [pron. /mik^hlms/] is a Christian feast that celebrates the Archangel Michael, and is held on September 29th. It is associated with the coming of autumn.
- Pluto : The Roman God of the underworld. In Greek mythology he is called Hades which is also a name for the underworld.

Hades was Zeus' brother. He abducted and forcibly wedded his niece Persephone, the daughter of Demeter, the Goddess of Harvest and Grain. Demeter was devastated and searched for her daughter high and low. But when Demeter finally succeeded in finding Persephone, it was found that she had eaten some pomegranate seeds, the food of the deceased. Hence she was forced to return to the underworld for one third of every year. It is believed that Demeter mourns her separation from her daughter during this time which is considered the reason for autumn and winter on earth. So, in the poem, September, which is the advent of autumnal season, is the time of the descent of Persephone into hell, into the arms of waiting death.

(Persephone is Proserpina in Roman and Demeter is Ceres; while Pluto is Hades in Greek – it is not clear why Lawrence has mixed up the Roman and Greek mythological names.)

- Ribbed : with something resembling a rib supporting or strengthening a part; ridged. In this case, the petals are ridged.

Demeter

Demeter- Persephone & Hermes

Pluto & Persephone

- Demeter : Also called Ceres. Goddess of harvest and grain. Fertility Goddess.
- Dis : Another name for Hades.
- Persephone : Also called Kore, daughter of Demeter; Proserpina in Roman mythology, abducted by Pluto or Hades.

20.7.3 Analysis

‘Bavarian Gentians’ is a deep and dense poem invoking darkness of death, loaded with personal symbolism and interwoven with mythological allusions. Lawrence makes use of an extraordinary symbol – that of Bavarian Gentians; one which embodies and reinforces Lawrencian duality of death and life, darkness and light.

The poem begins with a casual yet unusual two line statement by the poet who comments upon the rarity of the flower. It is not found in every house at Michaelmas during ‘soft September’. Michaelmas which falls on the 29th of that month heralds the coming of the autumnal season. The poet defines Michaelmas as slow and sad, underscoring the relentless advent of chilly frost of September as determined as death making steady progress on him. His use of “frosted September” later in the poem testifies to the chill. The adjectives “soft”, “slow” and “sad” that the poet uses in the line, beautifully and poignantly convey the feeling of the silent, inexorable and dismal creeping of death.

Gentians are big and dark. Their blue darkness is brilliant like torchlight, evoking the blueness of Pluto’s darkness. Contrarily, their intense blue darkens the daytime during which they flower. Lawrence uses an oxymoron ‘blaze of darkness’ to convey this contradictory nature. His sharp powers of observation capture every single feature of the flower, from its ribbed, tubular torchlike shape, to its blue petals flattened to a point, making it blaze forth like a torch, spreading blue darkness, invoking the trance of Pluto’s underworld. He calls them black lamps from the halls of Dis, burning dark blue, which contrary to Demeter’s pale lamps of the day, give off only darkness. It is then that the poet openly states about the journey he himself is about to undertake into Pluto’s dark realms. All these minutely detailed descriptions from the beginning were leading to this imperative “Lead me then, lead me the way” making clear the function of the Bavarian Gentians for him. The task of the gentian is to show him the way, blazing forth as a torch, lighting his descent to the halls of Dis.

The poet clearly equates the gentian with a torch. He wants to be guided by this blue forked torch down the dark stairs, getting darker still as he descends. Just as Persephone goes to visit her bridegroom in the Hades at the advent of autumn, after spending her time on the earth during spring and summer seasons, he is ready to make his fated journey during the “first-frosted September”, which is a phrase that Lawrence uses in another version of the poem. He wants to go into those dismal and sightless realms where darkness is awake upon the dark. Like Persephone, the lost bride, who is nothing but a voice in the darkness, is enveloped and pierced with the passion of dense gloom by Pluto, Lord of the underworld and the king of darkness, lying awake and waiting to enfold her in his strong arms and celebrate their nuptials in the chamber lit with torches of darkness, the poet too envisages being enveloped in the eternal arms of darkness.

Death turns celebratory. While life on the earth is painful, eternal repose in the enveloping darkness of death is like being in the hands of one's lover. Lawrence's identity fuses with that of Persephone who celebrates her nuptials with her eternal lover. Lawrence seems to say that we are all brides to death, virgins to be pierced with the passion of dense gloom, to be enveloped in "the arms Plutonic". Using the symbolism of the phantasmal underworld of classic mythology, Lawrence invokes the transcendental nature of death. The blue gentian is the body of man, lit with living flame. It is with the help of this flame that one can seek eternal repose in the arms of death. And the reason why everyone has not "gentians in his house in soft September" is because not everyone knows how to be truly alive in the flesh.

Written in free verse, the continuous enjambement or run-on lines spilling from one to another, to the end of each stanza, invokes the feel of a meandering and spiraling movement of a descent downwards, keeping in tune with the motif of a journey. As Milton describes it in Paradise Lost, Bavarian Gentians makes "darkness visible". Lawrence has been able to capture the intensity and density of a palpable darkness through the reiteration of words "blue" and "blueness" and "dark" and "darkness" throughout the poem. The use of soft sibilants and liquid sounds creates a feel of being lovingly cocooned in the "embalmed darkness". Heavily alliterative and reiterative, the poem is able to conjure up a trance-like mood, slowly and hypnotically gravitating towards the vortex of death. The pathos of the final line inherent in the expression "the lost bride" is reverted by the reference of her conjoining with her groom. Though Persephone is lost to the earth, as man is at death, she reaches the safe haven of the arms of her Plutonic lover, suggesting that 'heaven' lies in the warm embrace of death for man too, thus emphasizing the transcendental nature of death.

20.8 LET US SUM UP

In this unit you were introduced to two poets – Thomas Hardy and D.H. Lawrence – both of them remarkable and controversial novelists, but consummate poets nonetheless.

Two poems of Hardy, both as different from each other as chalk and cheese, introduced you to the varied moods and themes of this great poet. The first one pessimistic, tender, exhortatory, fatalistic and brooding, speaks to an unborn pauper child, while the next one celebrates and glorifies pleasurable activities such as drinking cider, candle-lit dancing and amorous trysts, as great things. The poem by Lawrence uses the symbol of Bavarian Gentians and the classical mythology of Pluto and Persephone to convey the duality of life and death. You were introduced to the stylistic features of each poem and were taught to analyse them critically. The introductory notes on the age as well as the poets, we hope, must have given you an exhaustive background knowledge as well as whetted your appetite to learn more about them. You may refer to encyclopaedias and critical works available in your study centres and local libraries as well as check out for on-line reference material available.

20.9 ANSWERS TO SELF-CHECK EXERCISES

Self-check Exercise I

- 1) That of an Architect. His home Max Gate.
- 2) Wessex. After the old Anglo-Saxon kingdom.
- 3) Tess of the d'Urbervilles and Jude the Obscure.
- 4) Wessex Poems
Poems of the Past and the Present
Moments of Vision or any others mentioned in the Introduction
- 5) The Dynasts. The Napoleonic Wars.
- 6) Fatalism & Pessimism

Self-check Exercise II

- 1) Not to breathe, cease silently, sleep the long sleep, though the birth hour is near.
- 2) The doomsters heap troubles and pains, time-wraiths turn pleasant moments to fearful ones. It is a world where laughter fails, greetings die, hope dwindles, faiths waste away, affections and enthusiasms numb.
- 3) The vow that if he had the capacity to reach out to souls still in their mothers' wombs, that he would inform them of all the trouble that awaits them in this world, which is "Life's pending plan".
- 4) The poem wavers between sympathy, despair and hopelessness and ends on a note of resignation and hope.
- 5) Since the child will be born contrary to the poet's wishes, he should come and live on this earth. And being happy and optimistic in disposition, he hopes that the child attains full health, love, friends and possibilities on earth and finds joys which are seldom attained by mankind.

Self-check Exercise III

- a) abcbabab
- b) The presence of these ladies conveys a local flavour and creates a feel of the English pub atmosphere.

- c) It is a great thing because it is night-long revelry with suitable partners in candle-lit ambience, returning only at daybreak.
- d) Love is full of romantic interludes in the darkness, where the lover clandestinely awaits his lady-love in the garden, when she flits towards his side silently like a bird.
- e) The final stanza posits the question whether the things mentioned in the previous stanza such as cider, dance and love would remain great things to him. He says that when the inevitable Death calls upon him, these things would still have remained great things to him.

Self-check Exercise IV

- 1) The mining town of Eastwood in Nottinghamshire
- 2) Sons and Lovers
- 3) Kangaroo
- 4) 'The Savage Pilgrimage'
- 5) Walt Whitman, the American Poet
- 6) He says that, the flesh is wiser than the intellect. We may go wrong in our minds, but what the blood feels, believes and says, is true.
- 7) Look, We have come through!
- 8) Pansies and Nettles
- 9) 'Bavarian Gentians' and 'The Ship of Death'

Self-check Exercise V

- 1) It means that not everyone knows how to be truly alive in the flesh
- 2) Michaelmas refers to the advent of the autumnal season, and symbolically points out to the commencement of man's slow journey towards death.
- 3) Because of their shape of the flower and its petals and also its colour. The dark blue blaze of the flattened petals, converging to a point like a flame of the torch, the tubular shape of the flower, reminiscent of a torch, and the dark blue colour of the flowers make this imagery apt.
- 4) He wishes to use the flower as a torch to guide him and lead him down to the netherworld of darkness, to show him the way taken by Persephone to reach her dismal lover.
- 5) Persephone descends to the sightless world of the dark into the enveloping arms of her lover who is waiting for her in the chambers lit with the splendour of torches of darkness to celebrate the nuptials and be pierced with the passion of dense gloom.
- 6) Enjambement, use of sibilants and liquid sounds, alliteration and reiteration etc. (refer to the last paragraph of the analysis)

INTRODUCTION TO BLOCK 5

MODERNISM AND POSTMODERNISM: A HISTORICAL PERSPECTIVE

The first half of the twentieth century in English literature was dominated by 'Modernism'. It was a break away from the Victorian and Edwardian style of narration, description and rational exposition in prose and poetry in favour of a stream-of-consciousness portrayal of personality, dependence on imagery as a means of communication and an eclectic use of mythology from European and sometimes also Indian culture in the structures of works of art. There were local factors such as the concentration of population in the megapolises like London, Birmingham and Leeds and the consequent problems associated with over population but the immediate intellectual influence came via France of the Symbolists and the Surrealists.

The Symbolist Movement in French literature refers to the period c 1880 – 95. It came as a reaction against the Realism and Naturalism of Balzac, Stendhal, Flaubert and Zola who valued 'sincerity' above the Romantic love for 'liberty'. The Realists and the Naturalists both shared the belief that the middle and lower classes of their time provided subjects for literary treatment. The Symbolist Movement refers primarily to works of the poets Mallarmé, Verlaine, Rimbaud and, Laforgue, the dramatists Villiers de L'Isle Adam and Maurice Maeterlinck and, the novelists Joris-Karl Huysmans and Édouard Dujardin. In poetry the Symbolists reacted against the Parnassians, led by Leconte de Lisle, who valued restraint, descriptive precision and objectivity as against the extravagance of the Romantics. The Symbolists were influenced by the mystical writings of Swedenborg, the poetry of Baudelaire, the plays of Wagner and the tales of Edgar Allan Poe. The symbolists opted for suggestions and evocations in the place of direct description and explicit comparisons. Arthur William Symons' The Symbolist Movement in Literature (1899) was a major attempt by an Englishman to introduce the Movement in England.

One of the most prominent characteristics of Modernism is its bold experimentation in different areas of culture. The French 'Avant-garde' - that is advance guard, fore guard or vanguard - is often considered as the hallmark of modernism. Avant-garde traces its history back to Dada and the Cabaret Voltaire in Zurich, Switzerland where in 1916 a group of artists from war torn Europe assembled to demonstrate their art. Dada - in French 'hobby-horse' and in German 'Goodbye' and, 'get off my back' – apparently was a one off name suggested for an experimental art the chief quality of which was its newness. Dada was born out of a reaction to World War I. It rejected reason and logic and opted for nonsense, irrationality and intuition. This is evident also in Cubism in which, for instance, we are expected to appreciate a collage of newspaper cuttings, buttons and knives stuck upon a canvas. Guillaume Apollinaire, the French poet, critic and calligrammetist was an ardent supporter of Dada in poetry and painting. But Dada came under attack from all corners. Theodor Adorno and Max Horkheimer at the Frankfurt School attacked it in their essay 'The Culture Industry: Enlightenment as Mass Deception' (1944). So did Walter Benjamin in his influential essay 'The Work of Art in the Age of Mechanical Reproduction' (1936) berated 'modernism'. 'Their poems are' wrote Benjamin, "'word salad" containing obscenities and every imaginable waste product of language. The same is true of their paintings, on which they mounted buttons and tickets.' Regarding Dada Benjamin went on, 'One requirement was foremost: to outrage the public.'

Surrealism founded in Paris in 1924 stood on less contested grounds. 'I have always been amazed' wrote André Breton in his first Surrealist Manifesto (1924), 'at the way an ordinary observer lends so much more credence and attaches so much more importance to waking events than to those occurring in dreams . . . the dream finds itself reduced to a mere parenthesis, as is the night'. He went on, 'I believe in the future resolution of these two states, dream and reality, which are seemingly so contradictory, into a kind of absolute reality, a surreality, if one may so speak. It is in quest of this surreality that I am going, certain not to find it but too unmindful of my death not to calculate to some slight degree the joys of its possession'. Surrealistic art is about the depths of human psyche and thus of human personality. In 1929 Salvador Dali joined this movement introducing illusionistic 'dream' imagery indebted to Freud. Breton in his Surrealist Manifesto of 1929 tried to reconcile Freud and Marx. Among those who joined the group in the late thirties were Herbert Read and Hugh Sykes Davies.

Strange as it may sound, scientific theories and literary creeds of a given period show some kind of family resemblance. Donne's poetry in the seventeenth century expresses the doubt and confusion of the Astronomical Revolution led by Nicolaus Copernicus, Johann Kepler, Tycho Brahe and, Galileo Galilee. Newtonian physics and the confidence and certainty about our knowledge of the universe and the euphoria evident in the arts in the Long Eighteenth Century - the Age of Reason, neoclassicism and the Enlightenment - are in tune with the spirit of the age. Modernism - Dada, Cubism and, Surrealism - in art and the works of Albert Einstein and Max Planck who gave respectively the Theories of Relativity and Quantum Mechanics together reflect the Zeitgeist of the age. From the Theories of Relativity we gained the ideas of spacetime continuum, time dilation, length contraction, universal speed limit and mass-energy equivalence. We learnt from Planck that particles are discrete packets of energy with wave-like properties. The word 'quantum' derives from Latin, meaning 'how great' or 'how much'. There is a family resemblance between Breton's surrealism and the tilt in modern physics from the solid facts of 'nature's laws' in classical physics towards, for the common people, often confusing facts such as spacetime continuum or particles as discrete quanta of energy. The works of Planck, Paul Dirac, Enrico Fermi, Erwin Schrodinger and Satyendranath Bose made not only a scientific but also a cultural impact immediately on the West but gradually on the East as well. We cannot go into the details of these comparisons of the arts and the sciences in this brief introductory note. Nonetheless these are a few seeds of ideas that will germinate and grow within you in course of time.

The late fifties of the twentieth century saw the birth of new fields of enquiry in physics in America which influenced the West – 1. the Communication or Information Theory of Claude Shannon, a mathematician and electronic engineer and, 2. the Chaos Theory of the mathematician and meteorologist Edward Lorenz. Later in the mid-seventies, came Fractal Geometry of the French mathematician Benoit Mandelbrot. These have made Western culture profoundly different from that of the first half of the twentieth century. The advent of the Information Age and the Knowledge Society about which we hear so often was initiated by scientists such as Shannon and the English Alan Turing. Influence of Fractal Geometry on our culture remains to be seen in times to come.

The winds of change in the late fifties of the last century were felt in the United States which was recorded by Daniel J Boorstin, an American historian, in The Image: A Guide to Pseudo-Events in America (1961). Pseudo-events are activities that serve little or no purpose. The Italian Umberto Eco saw in Western culture a tendency for fabricating false reality or hyperreality which is to be consumed as real. This is the art of a consumerist culture. Brand X shows that one is fashionable.

In The Postmodern Condition: A Report on Knowledge (1979) Jean-François Lyotard (1924 -98) opines thus:

Our working hypothesis is that the status of knowledge is altered as societies enter what is known as the postindustrial age and cultures enter what is known as the postmodern age.

‘This transition’ Lyotard goes on, ‘has been underway since at least the end of the 1950s, which for Europe marks the completion of reconstruction.’ Lyotard is thinking about the reconstruction of Europe after the Second World War (1939 - 45). Lyotard points out at the ‘merchantilisation of knowledge’ knowledge as an ‘informational commodity’ as it is now, as never before, indispensable to worldwide competition for power. This new feature of our culture has led us to a paralogy – a movement against an established way of reasoning. We witness in our culture today a distrust of metanarratives or grand narratives, a comprehensive explanation of historical meaning, experience or knowledge that promises a society legitimation through the expected completion of that idea.

Fredric Jameson’s (b. 1934) Postmodernism or The Cultural Logic of Late Capitalism (1991) is a landmark study of Western culture in the sixties and thereafter. He points out that postmodernist art is marked by depthlessness. He illustrates his point by comparing Van Gogh’s ‘A Pair of Shoes’ with Andy Warhol’s ‘Diamond Dust Shoes’. While the former invites interpretation, a construction of the peasant world and their difficult life the latter does not offer anything beyond what we see. A modern work such as Edvard Munch’s ‘The Scream’ reifies the modern experience of angst and alienation whereas in postmodern works of art feelings wane, there is ‘the waning of affect’.

It would be a good idea to bear these general directions of thought while reading the literature of the twentieth century.

21.0 OBJECTIVES

After you have read this unit, you will be able to:

- Critically respond to W.B. Yeats's life and works.
- Understand Yeats's poetry in relation to Irish politics and history of his time.
- Appreciate the relationship between form and content of his poetry.
- To examine Yeats's contribution to poetic modernism.
- Examine the poems "To a Shade," "No Second Troy," and "The Second Coming."

21.1 INTRODUCTION

In this unit, we will have first look at W.B. Yeats's life and works. Yeats lived a long and eventful life. There was a direct connection between his social, and political life and the kind of literature he wrote. Therefore understanding his life may hold some key to comprehending his poetry.

The first poem in this unit is "To a Shade," which Yeats wrote to commemorate the great Irish nationalist Charles Stuart Parnell. As a nationalist Yeats was greatly influenced by this revolutionary leader, and his passion for the independence of Ireland. Let us see by reading this poem what kind of tribute does the poet pay to this revered leader.

The second poem is titled “No Second Troy.” As the title suggests, the poem makes a reference to the Greek epic Iliad that celebrates the war of Troy. The poem is, however, not about Iliad but Ireland of Yeats’s times. Yeats compares his beloved Maud of Gonne to the mythical Helen of Troy. Read the poem to find out why Yeats does so.

The third poem in this unit is “The Second Coming.” It is one of the most anthologized of Yeats’s poems. It presents the Yeatsian theory of history through his symbol of gyre. It has Christian connotations. Instead of the second coming of the Christ, the poem announces the coming of a monstrous figure with the body of the lion and head of a man as an anti-Christ.

You are advised to read the poems before you read other sections of the unit.

21.2 WILLIAM BUTLER YEATS (1865-1939)

W.B. Yeats will go down in history as perhaps the greatest Irish writer ever. He was more than a poet; he wrote plays as well as prose, worked as an anthropologist and folklorist, was one of the theatre-managers at Abbey Theatre that he founded along with Lady Gregory, organized political meetings and lectures for the Irish movement for independence. However, with all his other accomplishments, he would be remembered mostly for his poetry that runs into numerous volumes. In his interview to The Paris Review in 1994, Seamus Heaney talks about the impossibility of ignoring Yeats in any assessment Irish poetry, and that he had to be included in his acceptance speech of the Noble Prize. Yeats both observed and influenced the political and literary history of Ireland, since the 1890s to his death. Working as a nationalist poet for almost half a century from the 1889 to 1939, he either took part or closely watched critical developments of that era such as the formation of the Irish National Theatre Society (later named as the Abbey Theatre), Irish Home Rule Movement, Easter Rising of 1916, and the Irish War of Independence, also called the Anglo-Irish War, that was fought between 21 January 1919 and 11 July 1921. Though, Yeats was averse to political violence, and never took part in any violent struggle against the British colonial forces, he tirelessly worked for cultural nationalism, reviving the oral and folk tradition of Ireland, as well as writing plays and poetry on nationalistic themes. The ambivalent streak in his poetry and personality is evident in the following lines from his poem “Man and Echo,” in which he painfully wonders if his play, Kathleen Ni Houlihan, inspired young Irish men and women to violence and death in the Easter Uprising of 1916:

All that I have said and done,
Now that I am old and ill,
Turns into a question till
I lie awake night after night
And never get the answers right.
Did that play of mine send out
Certain men the English shot?

So, Yeats’s influence on Irish politics remains undeniable. Paying tribute to the key role the poet played in securing the independence of Ireland, Oliver St John Gogarty said, and “If it had not been for W.B. Yeats, there would be no Irish Free State!” He was appointed to the first Irish senate in 1921. He also served a second term in 1925.

Yeats was a major force in the English poetic tradition. Though remaining astutely Irish in outlook, he wrote in the tradition that he inherited from Blake and Shelley calling himself “the last romantic.” However, in the second decade of the 20th century, he along with T.S. Eliot and Ezra Pound radically transformed English poetry, making it suggestive and symbolist. In the process, he made himself a key figure in the European Modernism.

In his search for poetic truth, Yeats also came under the influence of Indian philosophy and poetry, especially through the Upanishads and the poems of Rabindranath Tagore.

Now let us look at his life in more detail.

W.B. Yeats was born in Dublin, now the capital of Ireland, on June 13, 1865. His father, John Butler Yeats, was a painter of modest success, and belonged to a respected family line of Protestant aristocrats and clergymen. Yeats, the poet, was named after his grandfather William Butler Yeats, who was a rector at Tullyish. Yeats’s mother, Susan Yeats, belonged to a family of business men in County Sligo on the west coast of Ireland. Though qualified as a barrister, the poet’s father decided to move to London with a hope to become a painter. However, Susan Yeats, unhappy with her husband’s decision, chose to live for some months every year from 1867 to 1873 at Sligo. Living with his grandparents and uncles at seaside Sligo, and with his father in London, Yeats and his five siblings came into contact with two completely different worlds- urban and the center of colonial Britain, London, and the typical Irish rural world, that evoked his postcolonial imagination quite early in life.

In his early lyrics, composed in the 1890s, Sligo inspired Yeats to write about the Irish landscape filled by lakes, hills, clouds and streams, which was a counterfoil to the colonial, urban, and metropolitan culture represented by London. In the most famous lyric from this phase of Yeats’ oeuvre, “The Lake Isle of Innisfree,” the poet says,

I will arise and go now, for always night and day
I hear lake water lapping with low sounds by the shore;
While I stand on the roadway, or on the pavements grey
I hear it in the deep heart’s core.

The beautiful island of Innisfree, with a lovely stretch of woodland, was in Lough Gill, about three miles away from Sligo. To the north of Sligo, a few miles away, was Ben Bulbin, the mountain with a waterfall. Under this mountain lay the Drumcliff Churchyard, which the poet wished to be the place of his burial. He expressed this wish in his poem Under Ben Bullben (1939)

Under bare Ben Bulbin’s head
In Drumcliff Churchyard, Yeats is laid

In London, the young Yeats came across artists and intellectuals who came to visit his father, and who talked about philosophy, religion, and arts, whereas at Sligo, Yeats came to know the Pollexfens and Middletons, the loving uncles, aunts and cousins, who introduced him to the world of intense feeling, practical living amidst Irish nature, and folktales and fairies. The poet's father would say: "By marriage with the Pollexfens, I have given a tongue to the sea cliffs." Yeats would, for the rest of his life, remember Sligo as attached with childhood bliss, Irish family traditions, and folk and oral traditions of Ireland.

In 1881, financial hardships forced the family to return to Ireland. They took a cottage in Howth, a village on the sea shore, some 10 miles northeast of Dublin. The young Yeats accompanied his father daily to London by train, where in his studio; the father read aloud poems of Shakespeare, Byron, Shelley, and Keats. Yeats grew fascinated with Blake, Shelley and Byron, as the romantic wielded great influence on his poetic sensibility early on. He wrote in their imitation. As a boy, he was captivated by Shelley's Alastor, a poem about the idealist and passionately romantic as well as visionary hero, also a poet, who turns his back upon the world completely disillusioned with it.

Yeats's romantic tendencies, his belief in imagination, and his belief in poetry and literature as the truest form of self-expression led him to regard himself as the most authentic voice of Irish renaissance or the Irish Literary Revival. His reading of the romantics and the Irish oral folklore had produced in him a strong belief in spiritual self as against the intellect, the former he identified with Ireland and the latter with Britain.

Yeats's first collection of verse The Wanderings of Oisín (1889) announced the arrival of a truly original poet, of exceptional imagination that could transform Irish myths and legends into contemporary narratives. He adopted myths, ballads, and folktales, and used their diction and rhythm in his poems. Oisín, the warrior poet from Irish mythology, ultimately sees through the mystery of the three islands that tempt in him in the beginning, and he returns to Ireland, "in the house of the Fenians, be they in flames or at feast."

Yeats's primary interest in the 1890s lay in starting a cultural revolution in Ireland that could inspire and support the political revolution against Britain. In 1896, he joined the Irish Republican Brotherhood, and began organizing conferences, delivering speeches and writing articles about the future of Ireland. In 1897, he met Lady Gregory and Edward Martyn, and formalized a manifesto of the Irish Literary Theatre, which was renamed as Irish National Theatre in 1901, and finally the National Theatre Society (also the Abbey Theatre) in 1904. Yeats not only wrote for this theatre, but also served as its managing director along with Gregory and Synge. He saw the theatre as a movement to foster culture nationalism, as the manifesto, Our Irish Theatre, says,

We propose to have performed in Dublin...certain Celtic and Irish plays...to bring upon the stage the deeper thoughts and emotions of Ireland. We will show that Ireland is not the home of buffoonery and of easy sentiment, as it has been represented, but the home of an ancient idealism.

In the collection of poems published as The Wind among the Reeds (1899), Yeats continued to explore the contraries and antithesis as the central trope of his poems, which would in fact remain so throughout his career. The quotidian and the ideal, dreams and reality, soul and intellect, mythology and contemporary Ireland return as subjects of his poems.

Yeats met Maud Gonne in 1889 and fell in love with her, but his love remained unrequited all his life. Maud Gonne was a fiery nationalist, who played an active role in the struggle for independence. She was also a fine actress, and played the role of the Cathleen, the old woman and the symbol of Ireland herself, in Yeats's postcolonial play Cathleen Ni Houlihan. But she chose John MacBride, the revolutionary who was executed for his role in the Easter uprising, over Yeats. In his poem Easter 1916, Yeats commemorated the death of MacBride and other revolutionaries in the Easter uprising, while also denouncing the use of violence for securing the independence of Ireland.

Yeats wrote some wonderful love lyrics to remember his love for Maud Gonne. For example, in "Adam's Curse," he says

I had a thought for no one's but your ears:
That you were beautiful, and that I strove
To love you in the old high way of love;
That it had all seemed happy, and yet we'd grown
As weary-hearted as that hollow moon.

With In the Seven Woods (1904), there are indications of a shift in Yeats's style, as he begins advancing towards a modernist poetics. But it is only after meeting Ezra Pound that a radical change in his poems; they come across as less ornamental, and become suggestive, sparse, and symbolist. Yeats had always been a symbolist. As early as 1900, in his essay, "The Philosophy of Shelley's Poetry," he writes:

It is only by ancient symbols, by symbols that have numberless meanings besides the one or two the writer lays emphasis upon, or the half-score he knows of, that any highly subjective art can escape from the barrenness and shallowness of a too conscious arrangement, into the abundance and depth of Nature.

However, it was his meeting with Ezra Pound that brought a change into Yeats's poetry from a romantic use of symbols to the very texture of the poems becoming elusive, concrete and suggestive. He stayed with Pound during winters from 1913-1916. They shared a cottage in Sussex, and Pound read and edited his poems. Through Pound's research, Yeats also came to know about the Japanese Noh drama, and learned from it the obscure and symbolist style that rejected naturalism. From now on, Yeats wrote poems that used concrete images, which were sparse and associative. He employed words and objects that resonated with suggestive meanings. He could do this by avoiding abstract words and traditional metaphors. The collection Responsibilities (1914) demonstrated these developments in his poetry. His subsequent volumes of verse The Wild Swans at Coole (1919), and Michael Robartes and the Dancer (1921) further revealed the maturity of Yeats's style, suggestive a rich blending of passionate speech and symbolist energy.

Yeats was bestowed the Noble Prize for Literature in 1923. However, some of his best poems were yet to be written. For all his life, Yeats had been working on a system of thought, a metaphysical framework that was antithetical to the reason-dominated modern Western thought. He found no solace in Christianity, and hence ruminated Neo-Platonism, occultism, theosophy, kabalistic thought, Rosicrucian systems, mysticism, Indian philosophy etc, for an alternate system that would symbols to his poetry. He also learnt spiritualism from Mohini Chatterjee, the Indian theosophist. With Madame Blavatsky, he experimented in occultism, particularly the telepathic connections with the immortal Tibetan saints. Yeats had already learnt a great deal from Indian philosophy. He had read the Upanishads as well as Patanjali's Yoga-sutra-s with his Indian guru, Purohit Swami. Yeats wrote 'Preface' to the former, and 'Introduction' to the latter, when his guru translated these works. It was his interest in the Indian philosophical traditions that had inspired him to receive Tagore's Gitanjali with great excitement in 1912-13.

Yeats passionate pursued the esoteric systems of thought as an answer to the modern, rationalist and mechanized intellectual frameworks. He articulated this philosophical system in his prose work A Vision (1925), which provided the themes, personalities, and symbols, and geometrical diagrams of the cycles of history, that he in his later poetry. The Tower (1928) contained some of his most famous poems: "Sailing to Byzantium," "Among School Children," "Leda and the Swan," and the title poem.

21.3 TO A SHADE (1913)

21.3.1 Introduction

The poem “To a Shade” appeared in the collection Responsibilities (1914). It commemorates Charles Stewart Parnell, a radical Protestant leader, inarguably the most influential Irish politician of the 19th century. He founded the Irish Parliamentary Party, and led various movements against British colonialism, inside and outside the parliament, most significant of which were the Home rule movement, and the land reform agitation. However, his adulterous affair with Katherine O’Shea, wife of Captain William O’Shea, which came to light when the husband sought divorce, shocked both England and the Catholic dominated Ireland. Most of the members of his party shunned him, which brought a sudden downfall of his illustrious political career in December 1890. He died on October 6, 1891, merely a little more than a three months of his marriage with Katherine. However, Parnell continued to be remembered as the greatest Irish leader of his era.

The poem rues the ingratitude of the Dubliners towards Parnell. For all his great sacrifice and service rendered to Ireland, he is a forgotten figure of the past. The Parnell monument, and the sea, as well as the sea gulls and the bleak Dublin houses might respond to a visit by the leader’s spirit, but for the people of Dublin, the leader, who once inspired generations of Irish people, is an obsolete figure, whom some of them brought to disgrace.

The poem also indicts Dubliner's lack of loyalty and respect for Hugh Lane, a painter, and an Irish nationalist of great esteem.

21.3.2 The Text

IF you have revisited the town, thin Shade,
Whether to look upon your monument
(I wonder if the builder has been paid)
Or happier-thoughted when the day is spent
To drink of that salt breath out of the sea
When grey gulls flit about instead of men,
And the gaunt houses put on majesty:
Let these content you and be gone again;
For they are at their old tricks yet.

A man
Of your own passionate serving kind who had brought
In his full hands what, had they only known,
Had given their children's children loftier thought,
Sweeter emotion, working in their veins
Like gentle blood, has been driven from the place,
And insult heaped upon him for his pains,
And for his open-handedness, disgrace;
Your enemy, an old foul mouth, had set
The pack upon him.

Go, unquiet wanderer,
And gather the Glasnevin coverlet
About your head till the dust stops your ear,
The time for you to taste of that salt breath
And listen at the corners has not come;
You had enough of sorrow before death—
Away, away! You are safer in the tomb.

Shade : a ghost

Glasnevin : Glasnevin Cemetery in Dublin, where Parnell is buried

Simile : a figure of speech that compares a thing with another thing unlike it, with an intention to make the description more clear as well as beautiful.

Read the poem and its analysis all over again, and answer the following questions.

21.3.3 Analysis

The poem is addressed to the ghost of Parnell in three stanzas of unequal length. The first stanza has 9 lines, the second 10, while the third contains 7 lines. This corresponds to the uneven progress of the thought of the poem, and the tonal undulation through it. The first stanza concerns Parnell, the second stanza remembers Hugh Lane, while the third moves back to Parnell.

The first stanza begins with a conditional clause, which determines the structure the rest of the stanza. The poet tells the ghost that if it has come back to Dublin merely to a look at his monument, or to enjoy the evening sea breeze, or to watch the sea gulls flutter, or the bleak Dublin houses looking beautiful, it should be satisfied. If not, or if it expects more, it should get back to its tomb, because the Dubliners are still the same crafty, mercantile, and distrustful people, busy at their intrigues.

In the second stanza, the poet alludes to Hugh Lane, the contemporary painter, who was devoted to the well being of Ireland, being close to the Irish nationalists. Like Parnell, he could have inspired generations of Irish children with great thoughts. If he was allowed to pursue his dreams for Ireland, he could have instilled sweet emotions in them through his art, but his efforts too were met with insults and injury by resentful characters such as William Martin Murphy.

In the third stanza, the poet advises the ghost to depart unnoticed covering his head with a bedspread, for the people of Dublin would only insult him, as they had before he died. The poet asks him to return to his tomb, a safer place for him to be in.

Written on 29 September 1913, “To a Shade” compares well with another poem written in the year titled “September 1913.” In both poems, Yeats attacks the self-serving nature of the Dublin middle class, mercantile and selfish, with no sensitivity to the sacrifices of the great leaders of the Irish nationalist movement. In September 1913, while disparaging the present Irish people, he exalts the memory of John O’Leary, a 19th century nationalist and member of the Irish Republican Brotherhood, who was arrested in Britain for his involvement in the anti-colonial activities:

Romantic Ireland is dead and gone
It’s with O’Leary in the grave

“To a Shade” begins in the manner of a talk, a style that Yeats had mastered; it gave him great possibilities to unravel the antithesis and contraries running through the speaker’s mind. In a 1913 letter to his father, he wrote:

I have tried to make my work convincing with a speech so natural and dramatic that the hearer would feel the presence of a man thinking and feeling.

The opening line contains mild accents, and a caesura, which creates a rhythmic break in speech, to help the speaker express a feeling of dejection and suppressed anger. The parenthesis in the third line is a colloquial speech:

(I wonder if the builder has been paid)

It works as an aside, giving a sense of actual talk. The use of personal pronouns “you” and “I” reinforces the effect of the speaking in conversations with the spirit of Parnell, while being heard by the readers. The poet ironically mock the false and pretentious respect shown to the memory of Parnell in the form of the monument constructed on O’Connell Street. Addressing Parnell’s spirit as “thin Shade,” the poet, however, suggests him that if it chose to visit Dublin again, it might be content still with the look of the monument, a symbol of the Dubliner’s hypocrisy. With the help of concrete nature images such as the “salt breath out of the sea,” the grey gulls,” and “the gaunt houses,” the poet presents nature as an antithesis to the town. Parnell’s spirit might find solace in the natural sights, but it might be for utter dejection if it wants to visit the Dubliners, as they are back at the old habits of scheming against the Irish heroes.

Yeats associates the memory of Parnell with another major nationalist figure from the 19th century, Hugh Lane, who sought to contribute to Ireland through his art, as Parnell did through his political activism. The painter was Yeats’s hero, because for the poet the cultural revival of Ireland was critical for its independence from the colonial rule. Like Parnell, Lane would have engendered great thoughts and sweet emotions in the future generations of his country. Lane worked so that a gallery of contemporary art could be established in Dublin. He wanted to put for exhibition some of his impressionistic paintings, but his efforts were thwarted and he was not allowed permission to put them in the city gallery. Moreover, his wish to work as a curator of the National History Museum of Ireland was also opposed and defeated. The poet singles out William Martin Murphy, the owner of the newspaper, The Irish Independent as the sort of people who defamed a national hero like Lane, and the kind of people who brought disgrace to Parnell. Therefore, he appropriately snubs Murphy as

An old foul mouth that had slandered you had set
The pack upon him

Parnell is buried in Glasnevin Cemetery in Dublin. The poet implores his spirit to return to his tomb. The poet imagines the spirit in the person of Parnell, and advises it to wear a Glasnevin bedspread around his head, because, if identified, the people would show no respect or hospitality to him. As the Dubliners do not yet have “gentle blood” flowing in their veins, which these two heroes could have made possible, it is not yet time for Parnell to even enjoy the taste of the sea breeze or visit his neglected monument.

The form of the poem sustains its theme. It is through alliteration such as “grey gulls,” and “salt breath out of the sea,” that the poet conveys concrete imageries. Assonance is also used to similar effects. For example in the following line, where the ‘o’ sound is repeated in musical pattern:

Whether to look upon your monument

The poet uses a simile to convey the great contribution of Irish heroes like Hugh Lane to the Irish society:

Sweeter emotion, working in their veins
Like gentle blood, has been driven from the place,

The simile “like gentle blood” communicates how the cultural revival augmented by artists like Lane transformed the very character of Irish future generation by instilling true values in them.

The rhyme and rhythm of the poem is rather irregular. The first two stanzas follow a set rhyme scheme, but the third is completely uneven. An irregular rhythmic pattern is used to suggest the tone of the poem which is cynical, angry, and even bitter. It almost forces the reader to pause and think about the ingratitude of the Dubliners towards their national heroes.

21.4 NO SECOND TROY (1910)

21.4.1 Introduction

The poem “No Second Troy” was published in the collection The Green Helmet and Other Poems (1910). The subject of the poem is the unrequited love of the poet for Maud Gonne, the beautiful and Irish nationalist firebrand, who he met in 1889, and instantly fell in love with. Though she was Yeats’s friend, and collaborated with him as actor in the Irish plays the writer produced at the Abbey Theatre, and Yeats would often visit her and show her his poems, she never returned his love. However, Yeats remained fascinated by her beauty and personality all his life. After her husband Major John McBride's death in the 1916 Easter uprising, Yeats again proposed to Gonne, hoping that she might accept his love, but she again turned down his proposal. There upon, he proposed to her daughter, but was to be disappointed yet again.

In "No Second Troy," Yeats works admits his infatuation for Gonne, while successfully coming out of the provocation to blame her for causing him emotional misery by refusing his love. In order to express the extraordinary beauty of Gonne, Yeats invokes a comparison with Helen of Troy, the most beautiful and controversial woman of the classical world, who was the cause behind the Trojan War, as sung in Homer's Iliad.

However, the poet goes beyond his romantic attraction towards Gonne. In his elevation of the beauty of Gonne and his 'misery, even as he brings Helen in the context, the poet snubs the middle class Irish people, who lack the ability and resolution to understand her extraordinary character and personality, and rise to her expectations. The age itself does not deserve Maud Gonne, who is so much like the Helen of Troy.

21.4.2 The Text

Why should I blame her that she filled my days
With misery, or that she would of late
Have taught to ignorant men most violent ways,
Or hurled the little streets upon the great,
Had they but courage equal to desire?
What could have made her peaceful with a mind
That nobleness made simple as fire,
With beauty like a tightened bow, a kind
That is not natural in an age like this,
Being high and solitary and most stern?
Why, what could she have done being what she is?
Was there another Troy for her to burn?

21.4.3 Analysis

The poem is structured by four rhetorical questions. Grammatically, it is grouped into two sections of five lines each, followed by two lines. In the first five lines, using the first rhetorical question, the poet absolves Maud Gonne from blame of being the cause of his misery, as well as for exciting the unworthy men to chaotic violence. In the second group of five lines, posing the second rhetorical question, the poet ironically states that the middle class Irish people, had no moral strength to equal their 'desire' of a free Ireland, and wonders how a woman of such noble and tranquil mind as well as exceptional character and beauty as Maud Gonne could find peace in an age so mean. In the last two lines, containing the third and fourth rhetorical questions, the poet makes explicit her comparison with Helen of Troy, but regrets metaphorically that Ireland was no Troy to burn for Gonne, as Troy had done for Helen.

The poem comes across as Yeats's attempt to reconcile with the rejection by Maud Gonne by overcoming the consternation caused by his unrequited love to blame her. In the same imaginative sweep, however, he also sees an opportunity to resent finds the Sinn Fein men, the rabble that found the better of Maud Gonne as was their leader, and wife of John MacBride, the Irish nationalist was executed for his role in the Easter Uprising. Yeats no doubt disliked MacBride; even in the poem "Easter 1916" written on the Uprising, Yeats could not hide his jealousy and dislike for MacBride:

This other man I had dreamed
A drunken, vain-glorious lout.
He had done most bitter wrong
To some who are near my heart
Yet I number him in the song

To Yeats, the coarse and plebian mob that Gonne led in different revolutionary activities, and who she chose over the love of Yeats hardly deserved a royal mind and classic beauty that she embodied:

, or that she would of late
Have taught to ignorant men most violent ways,
Or hurled the little streets upon the great,
Had they but courage equal to desire?

The juxtaposition of the images "little street" and "the great" confirms Yeats's faith in the aristocratic lineage, and his enthusiasm for the traditional Irish society under the protection of the aristocratic lords. The agents of nationalism therefore for him should have been noble and valiant men of the upper class rather than the "ignorant men," who have no physical or moral "courage equal to desire."

The poet employs two similes to suggest the nobility of Gonne's mind and her extraordinary beauty:

What could have made her peaceful with a mind
That nobleness made simple as fire,
With beauty like a tightened bow, a kind
That is not natural in an age like this,

It is the exalted nature of her mind, as pure "as fire," as well as her physical "beauty like a tightened bow" that that gives her superiority over the crowd, and makes her presence out of place "in an age like this." In the simile "beauty like a tightened bow," the word/object "bow" transforms into a symbol of sternness and grace, a mix of austerity and passionate action, restraint and violence.

In the final movement of the poem, Yeats wonders what would Maud Gonne do knowing what she is, as there was no another Troy to burn for her.

The poem is in the form of a sonnet, with an exception. It does not have the couplet that ends a sonnet. It has 12 lines, whereas a sonnet has 14 lines. Shakespeare's sonnet no. 126 only has 12 lines rather than 14. Unlike grammatically, the rhyme scheme structures the poem into three quatrains of 4 lines each: abab, cdcd, efef. The metre employed, as in a sonnet, is that of iambic pentameter, in which five stressed syllables each follow an unstressed syllable. In other words, an iambic pentameter line would contain 10 syllables set in a pattern in which an unstressed syllable is followed by a stressed syllable:

What could have made her peace-ful with a mind

21.5 THE SECOND COMING (1920)

21.5.1 Introduction

In Christianity, the phrase ‘the Second Coming,’ refers to the Second Coming of Christ, his return to the earth as prophesied in the gospels. It is believed that in ‘end of the world’ or apocalypse, withhis coming, the Messianic Age of peace and happiness will be established.

The poem is, however, based on a vision of the poet about the coming of an anti-Christ. This prophetic event suggests the advent of a civilization opposite to the present Christian civilization. The present civilization has lasted for 2000 years, and is now coming to an end as signaled by widespread violence, bloodshed, and a period of great anarchy.

In “The Second Coming,” Yeats integrates mythology and history into an organic whole. He abstracts a mythological system out of history, as well as reads history in terms of myth. While Yeats borrowed widely from Greek and Irish mythology, he had long been working on his personal mythology, an imaginative system to comprehend history and civilization, as well as the modern reality dominated by violence and bloodshed during the World War I, and the Anglo-Irish war. His efforts materialized in a prose work called A Vision, which was published in 1925. However, in his numerous poems prior to his publication of A Vision, Yeats had already expressed many of his ideas and images. The poem “The Second Coming” is one such poem, which employs the concept of a cyclic creation and destruction of the world, as an alternative to Christian doctrines about creation and the dissolution of the world. As an expression of the Yeatsian apocalypse, it announces the coming of the anti-Christ, and in the process, subverts the Christian notion of revelation. In his earlier poems such as “Easter 1916,” Yeats had already expressed a revelatory vision antithetical to the Christian doctrines:

All changed, changed utterly:
A terrible beauty is born.

“The Second Coming” was written in 1919. It was first published in The Dial, an American magazine, in November 1920. In same year, it appeared in the collection of Yeats’s verse called Michael Robartes and the Dancer.

21.5.2 The Text

Turning and turning in the widening gyre
The falcon cannot hear the falconer;
Things fall apart; the centre cannot hold;
Mere anarchy is loosed upon the world,
The blood-dimmed tide is loosed, and everywhere
The ceremony of innocence is drowned;
The best lack all conviction, while the worst
Are full of passionate intensity.

Surely some revelation is at hand;
Surely the Second Coming is at hand.
The Second Coming! Hardly are those words out
When a vast image out of Spiritus Mundi
Troubles my sight: somewhere in sands of the desert
A shape with lion body and the head of a man,
A gaze blank and pitiless as the sun,
Is moving its slow thighs, while all about it
Reel shadows of the indignant desert birds.
The darkness drops again; but now I know
That twenty centuries of stony sleep
Were vexed to nightmare by a rocking cradle,
And what rough beast, its hour come round at last,
Slouches towards Bethlehem to be born?

Glossary

- Gyre : a spiral or cone. In the Yeatsian system, the rotation of a gyre represents the movement of both history and the human mind.
- Spiritus Mundi : a “spirit world,” or a storehouse of images and symbols that creative people share, according to Yeats.
- Bethlehem : a Palestinian city, located near Jerusalem. According to the New Testament, it is the birthplace of Jesus Christ.
- Apocalypse : a prophetic or visionary revelation about events of great devastation and violence, such as described in the Apocalypse, the Book of Revelation in The Bible.

Having read the poem and its analysis, now answer the following questions.

21.5.3 Analysis

The poem is written in 21 stanzas, divided into two stanzas. The first stanza contains 8 lines; while the second has 14 lines. It is unconventional in structure. However, its structure compliments the development of its theme. The two stanzas divide the poem into two parts: the first part being an intense reflection on the violence and disorder of the society is shorter, and give way to the fuller projection of the nightmarish vision in the second part, which is as long as sonnet. The first stanza presents interconnected images of a fragmented world living in the midst of confusion, anarchy, and violence. Through the image of the falcon flying free out of the control of the falconer, who may be taken as a symbol of a unifying being, the God, poet presents an impression of a murderous world let loose without control. The spiral movement of the gyre upon reaching its end at its widest expanse is occasioned by mindless violence. It acts as a symbol for ‘the end of world’ phase of human history characterized by anarchy and bloodshed. The innocence of the world is overtaken by violence. The people with quality and ability who could bring some order to the society are apathetic, while the worst are driven by frenzy, escalating social disorder and violence.

The second stanza separates from the first stanza by the images abruptly forming in the mind of speaker-poet as he reflects upon the panorama of violence and chaos. The massive scale of destruction makes him predict and utter that certainly the return of the Christ, his “Second Coming” is imminent. It here that the speaker has an extremely disturbing vision of grotesque figure, “the rough beast” emerging out of “Spiritus Mundi,” the creative unconscious shared by the poets and visionaries. This repulsive figure, the anti-Christ, with a lion body and a human head, is spotted in a desert scene. Its eyes are remorseless and blank, as indifferent as that of the sun, unlike the benevolent eyes of the Christ. It is a stark and nightmarish vision. As this figure moves its beastly things, the desert birds of prey hover about it, even as darkness descends on him. The poet infers that this horrendous figure, the signaler of the new history, had been lying dormant as if in “a stony sleep” for the last “twenty centuries” when the Christian civilization lasted. As this civilization ends with enormous violence and chaotic scenes all around, it’s time for this creature to come out of its “rocking cradle,” and walk towards Bethlehem, where Christ was born, to be born and inaugurate the new civilization.

The meaning, images, and symbols of the poem are based on the geometrical figures that lie in the background. The first line refers to the expanding gyre:

Turning and turning the widening gyre

Yeats imagines a pair of antithetical gyres, locked into each other, as constituting opposite progress of human history. One of the gyres or cones is widening, while the other is tapering. He associates the widening gyre with the elevating flight of the falcon:

The falcon cannot hear the falconer;
Things fall apart; the centre cannot hold;

Yeats had used the flight of the bird as an image of the widening gyre of history in his earlier poems as well, such as “The Wild Swans at Coole”:

I saw, before I had well finished,
All suddenly mount
And scatter wheeling in great broken rings
Upon their clamorous wings.

The widening gyre represents the historical progress of 2000 years that had begins with the birth of the Christ. It is at this point, that the world order is all well, as the ‘falcon’ is well within the control of the falconer, stationed at the pointed base of this gyre. But as this gyre moves ahead and up, widening further and higher, the ‘falcon’ soars higher and higher and loses the control of the ‘falconer’. What this image symbolizes is breakdown of the social order, the destruction of all institutions and moral values that the Christian civilization stood for:

Things fall apart; the centre cannot hold;

As the widening gyre widens the contracting gyres narrows up, the widened end of the first gyre is met with the narrowest point of the second gyre, antithetical to the first. The second gyre, also in progress antithetically to the first, is therefore spoken by the poet lying in “twenty centuries of stony sleep.” It is at this point that the second gyre or cycle of history will begin its widening movement producing values antithetical to the Christian civilization. The Western civilization at the contemporary moment, at the widest opening of its historical gyre is the worst where,

Mere anarchy is loosed upon the world,
The blood-dimmed tide is loosed, and everywhere
The ceremony of innocence is drowned;
The best lack all conviction, while the worst
Are full of passionate intensity.

These lines and the sentiments they convey bring to our mind the poem “No Second Troy” that we have already analyzed:

or that she would of late
Have taught to ignorant men most violent ways,
Or hurled the little streets upon the great,
Had they but courage equal to desire?

The tone of the lines in this stanza is somber as well as cynical. Though tirelessly working for the Irish independence, Yeats detested the violence perpetuated by the radical nationalist groups. By the “best” who “lacked conviction” the poet obviously means the middle class Irish people, who had turned away from the nobility of character represented by the aristocracy, and busying themselves in mercantile activities, had turned a blind eye to the chaos and disorder in Ireland. By the “worst” that are “full of passionate intensity” he refers to the mob driven by frenzy and irrational passion that turned themselves against the true heroes of Irish nationalism like Charles Stewart Parnell, J.M.Synge, and Yeats himself. These lines also present a picture of the World War Europe, of massive violence, bloodshed, and loss of hope in humanity.

The tone of the lines is somber as well. “The blood-dimmed tide” is an intense image symbolizing horrific violence as well as opacity of scene that submerges and overwhelms all innocence of human kind.

In Yeats’s philosophy, these figures do not simply represent movements of history. They also symbolize the subjective and objective forces within the individual. The widening gyre stands for the objective or ‘primary’ force or attribute of an individual as well as civilization. The new world order, which is imminent, would represent the subjective or the ‘antithetical’ force governing the individual or the civilization. The widening spiral of history, as also the individual existing in this history, is scientific, rational, democratic, and mechanical, while values antithetical to these will be associated with the second pattern of history and the individual living in it. Yeats says in his A Vision:

After an age of necessity, truth, goodness, mechanism, science, democracy, abstraction, peace, comes an age of freedom, fiction, evil, kindred, art, aristocracy, particularity, war.

The second stanza sets off an escalation in the tone, as well as takes the theme to a visionary level. It takes the readers to a desert scene to stage the “Second Coming,” not of Christ but of the anti-Christ. This figure symbolizes paganism, destruction, irrationality, passion, evil- in short values that would destroy modernity, or the modern civilization ruined by excessive use of reason and rationality. The term “Spiritus Mundi” is a technical coinage in Yeats’s esoteric philosophy. It refers to the “world spirit.” In a description found in “An Image from a Past Life,” Yeats calls the “Spiritus Mundi” “a general storehouse of images which has ceased to be a property of any personality or spirit.” In the poem, it refers to the inner eye or the creative unconscious out of which evolves the desert scene in which appears that

A shape with lion body and the head of a man,
A gaze blank and pitiless as the sun,
Is moving its slow thighs...

The poet presents a nightmarish spectacle as the horrific man-beast walks its animal thighs slowly towards Bethlehem to herald the onset of the new history and civilization. As it walks above it sway “the indignant desert birds.” This image connects these lines with the first stanza. The solitary falconer, who is noble and gracious, has been replaced by a group of desert birds of prey.

In the final lines, the poem mixes the dark and nightmarish vision of the beast with the Christian myth of the Second Coming of the Christ. As if like Christ, the grotesque beast “its hour come round at last” moves towards Bethlehem to be born. But whereas Christ’s Second Coming is associated with the beginning of the Messianic Age of happiness and peace, the rough beast signals the continuation of violent history and civilization.

The poem has been composed in blank verse. The metre is not regular throughout the poem; however, generally, the poem in iambic pentameter.

Self-check Exercise 1

- 1) W.B. Yeats's father was John Butler Yeats. He was a painter of meager success in Dublin and London.
- 2) Living with his maternal grandparents and uncles in County Sligo on the West coast of Ireland, Yeats's personal as well as poetic personality was shaped by his perceptions of the Irish landscape, and the rural life animated by folklore. His early attachment with the Irish country side, and his reception of the folktales in the Irish cottages influenced the formation of his postcolonial sensibility.
- 3) In early part of his career, Yeats was influenced by the British romantic poets, especially William Blake, and P.B. Shelley. He later became associated with Ezra Pound as his poetry turned modernist in style.
- 4) Yeats strongly believed in the strengths of cultural nationalism as an anti-colonial movement. He was instrument in the establishment of Irish Literary Theatre (1897) with Lady Gregory and Edward Martyn, which later became the Abbey Theatre. It staged plays on nationalistic themes. He also organized public meetings, gave lectures, and wrote pamphlets against the colonial government.
- 5) By 1912, Yeats's poetry had entered the modernist phase, and it coincided with his meeting with Ezra Pound in 1913. His poems became suggestive, and complex with esoteric symbols and concrete imageries. His diction became precise, simple, clear and sparse. In short, his poetry became elusive and indirect.
- 6) Yeats was drawn towards the Indian philosophy and poetry. He had studied Patanjali's Yogasutra-s, and the Upanishads with the help of his mentor Purohit Swami. He also greatly admired The Geetanjali of Rabindranath Tagore. In the Indian philosophy, he found an alternative to the mechanized, commercialized, and rationalist Western civilization.

Self-check Exercise 2

- 1) The poem is addressed to the ghost of Charles Stewart Parnell, the most prominent Irish politician of the later 19th century. Another Irish hero referred to in the second stanza is Hugh Lane, a painter, and a nationalist, who made efforts to establish Dublin's Municipal Gallery of Modern Art. Both these personalities earned great respect for Yeats for their contribution to Irish nationalism.

- 2) It is the selfishness of the middle class Dubliners and their ingratitude that is responsible for the neglect of the memory of these two illustrious Irish heroes. In their lifetime, they become the target of the scheming and intriguing people around them. Parnell met his downfall in the aftermath of the exposure of his affair with a married woman, who had not yet taken divorce. Hugh Lane, on the other hand, who could have inspired generations of Irish children by his art work, fell due to intrigues of certain individuals like William Martin Murphy. If Parnell had continued as a leader of the Irish Parliamentary Party, he could have served Ireland far longer.
- 3) The poet advises the ghost of Parnell to cover his head while returning to its tomb, to save itself from the embarrassment caused by the lack of regard and respect from the people, even when they recognize him.
- 4) The poem is rendered in a colloquial style. It is characteristic of the Yeatsian talk, a mode Yeats mastered, whereby he would present the speaker in conversation with a persona. Naturally, therefore, the diction is simple and clear. He uses poetic devices such as personification, simile, and alliteration. The phrase “salt breath out of the sea” is an instance of personification. He uses alliteration when he, for example, sets up a repeated pattern of ‘g’ and ‘s.’ His use of simile in the phrase ““like gentle blood” intensifies the poet’s feeling for Hugh Lane.

Self-check Exercise 3

- 1) Helen of Troy was daughter of the Greek god Zeus, and Leda, wife of Tyndareus, the king of Sparta. The seduction of Leda by Zeus in the form of a swan is the subject of Yeats’s poem “Leda and Swan.” Helen was abducted by Paris, the Prince of Troy, which resulted in the Trojan War fought between the Greek states and Troy.
- 2) The title gives a unity to the thought of the poem. The poem is a comment on the fallen values of the time. Even as Ireland desperately needs a cultural and political revolution against the colonial occupation of Britain, the middle class is too engrossed in its mechanical routine and mercantile ambitions to worry about the country. Comparing Maud Gonne with Helen, Yeats says though she is equally beautiful and noble, Ireland is not the place she deserved, as it would not be truly inspired as Troy was by Helen. There would be ‘no second Troy.’
- 3) The poet reprimands the Irish people of his age to be a violent mob, lacking the nobility of mind that Gonne possesses; they lack courage and conviction, and are driven by desires. Therefore, the poet says, Maud Gonne is born with a physical beauty and mental nobility “not natural in this age.”

Self-check Exercise 4

- 1) The title suggests the theme of the poem, the “Second Coming” of the not Christ to announce the beginning of a Messianic Age, but of an anti-Christ, the rough beast, to herald a new world of violence, primitiveness and irrationalism.
- 2) The all-round violence and anarchy, the wiping out of innocence by bloodshed, the unrestrained fury of the mob, whereas the silence of the people holding positions, have given the poet enough evidence that the end of the world is soon.

- 3) In the Christian context, the image of the rough beast, human head with the body of a lion, is a grotesque image. This harbinger of the new age walks slowly towards Bethlehem, while the desert birds of prey hover over his head. These images are used as symbols to suggest the grotesqueness and the violence associated with the new world that is about to begin.
- 4) For example, Yeats's use of the 'falconer' is full of concrete suggestion. Unlike the traditional metaphor, its meaning is not limited merely to a controlling agent, say God. By mixing the image of flying falcon with the spiraling gyre, Yeats could make the metaphor more concrete as well as compressed with associative meanings. the flight of the falcon, symbolize the anarchy of the world, its breaking apart, its loss of spiritual core, while at the same time announcing the end of the world.

22.1 OBJECTIVES

After reading this unit you will be able to:

- write about T.S. Eliot's life and work
- understand T.S. Eliot's poetry with special reference to two of his poems:
 - a) The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock and
 - b) Gerontion.

22.2 INTRODUCTION

T.S. Eliot is one of the most important poets of 20th century. Born on 25th September 1888 in the United States, he died in London on 4th January 1965. His journey between the United States and England was not only a physical movement but also represents his journey of ideas in many ways. His studies at Harvard University can be divided in two phases. In the first phase between 1906 and 1910, he studied languages and literatures of continental Europe along with English literature. This introduced T.S. Eliot to classics of European literature and also to the various literary trends and movements of 19th century French and German literature. The experiments and literary evolution produced by these trends and movements influenced the literary creativity of T.S. Eliot. He was greatly influenced by many French symbolists who evolved a 'new language for poetry'. To some extent, it can be said that under this influence T.S. Eliot's poetry became a poetry of suggestions using evocative and alluding images and symbols.

In the second phase at Harvard (1911 to 1913), he studied philosophy and also did courses of Sanskrit studies. This further increased the canvas of his poetic suggestions and imagery for creating a poetry with various layers of meaning. In this unit we will try to understand the poetry of T.S. Eliot (with the help of two selected poems) while studying his poetic style and processes of creation of meaning. For a better understanding of his poetry, we will first go for a general overview of T.S. Eliot's life and works. Then we will study one of his early poems entitled 'Love song of J. Alfred Prufrock'. After this we will study 'Gerontion' which was written a few years after the 'Love song of J. Alfred Prufrock'. We hope we will be able to understand & discover the poetic genius of T.S. Eliot in the next few pages.

22.3 THOMAS STEARNS ELIOT

He was a great poet of the English language. We will first study about his life and work.

22.3.1 Life and Work

As mentioned earlier T.S. Eliot was an American citizen by birth who died as an English citizen. He was a brilliant student in school and won a gold medal for Latin. He studied at a boarding school in St. Louis and then at Harvard till 1910. During his studies at Harvard he was influenced by lectures of Irving Babbit and George Santayana. He also studied Arthur Symon's book The Symbolist Movement in Literature. This introduced him to the new poetic sensibilities of 19th century Europe. With all these ideas in mind he travelled to Paris and studied for some time at Sorbonne University, Paris in 1910-11. He studied many French poets in France and was so influenced by the French poetic movements that he often wrote French in his poems. Two of his famous poems written in French are – (i) "Lune de Miel" and (ii) "Dans le Restaurant". In his poetic ideas and imagery T.S. Eliot draws heavily from the two famous French poets Charles Baudelaire and Jules Laforgue. In these two French poems of T.S. Eliot the influences of the new language and poetic imagery can be clearly seen.

T.S. Eliot returned to Harvard in 1911 and pursued courses on philosophy. While studying philosophy, he was introduced to the Upanishads of India. This influence can be clearly seen in "the Waste Land" where he uses the 'datta, dayadhvam, damyata' concept borrowed from the Bṛhadaranyak Upanisad. Thus T.S. Eliot had a large canvas on which he drew from original sources in German, French, Italian, Latin, English, Sanskrit and from Greek Classics.

Towards the beginning of the first World War in 1914, T.S. Eliot settled down in London and further studied philosophy in Oxford. By this time he received the intellectual company and patronage of Ezra Pound who recognised his talents and helped him establish as a poet and critic. The poems written before 1912 were already published and Eliot was entering into a different phase of creativity. His earlier poems were published in 1917 in a collection entitled Prufrock and other Observations. "The Waste Land" was published in 1922 in the magazine

The Criterion which was being edited by T.S. Eliot himself. In 1925 the Collected Poems of T.S. Eliot was published. He continued editing The Criterion till 1939 which closed down due to the beginning of second World War. During his stay in England he was drawn to the Anglican church and wrote a lot drawing ideas from Christianity. His poems like “Journey of the Magi” “Ash Wednesday” etc. fall in this category. In 1939 he published Idea of a Christian Society which was an essay in prose depicting many of the ideas represented in his poems and plays. He received the Noble Prize for literature in 1948.

22.3.2 T.S. Eliot’s Poetry

Though T.S. Eliot’s poetry evolved over the years, we find some striking features in his poetic style. We always find an epigraph in the beginning of the poems. These epigraphs can be interpreted variously according to the theme and nature of the poem. Mostly these epigraphs provide a context for the poem which helps us understand the poetic idiom and context of the poem. For example, the epigraph of “The Hollow Men” is “Mistah Kurtz he dead/penny for the Old guy”. In this epigraph there are many historical and literary references along with the poetic idiom Eliot wants to create. Mistah Kurtz is a character of “Heart of Darkness” by Joseph Conrad, and the first line of the epigraph refers to that character. In the second line of the epigraph, Eliot (i) refers to a historical event and also to a (ii) popular tradition in England. This is a line often cried out loudly by children on Guy Fawkes Day which falls on November 5. ‘Old guy’ refers to Fawkes who had conspired to blow up both houses of English Parliament in 1605. This event was known as ‘gunpowder’ plot which had failed. So the second line of the epigraph refers the historical event of 1605 and at the same time uses a popular expression from Guy Fawkes Day celebrations.

Another important feature of Eliot’s poetry is the dramatic nature and portrayal of characters in his poetry. We often find Eliot choosing a character like Prufrock, Sweeney, Gerontion and portraying the character with such idiom and diction that he unravels what lies behind the action and beneath the appearance. Eliot enters into the minds and feelings thus creating various layers of meaning in his poems. For this he alludes to many historical and cultural events and characters. Intertextual allusions are often used to achieve a historical sense and for entering into the realm of feelings. For example, in “Love song of J.Alfred Prufrock”, Eliot makes references to Dante, the Bible and Shakespeare among many others. Similarly, you can see “The Waste Land” making allusions and intertextual references to several sources across cultures.

Just like the Symbolist poets of 19th century Europe, T.S. Eliot uses elements of language and nature as symbols and creates special effects often by juxtaposing the grotesque and the normal.

For example look at these lines from “The Hollow Men”:

“The eyes are not here
There are no eyes here
In this valley of dying stars
In this hollow valley.
This broken jaw of our lost kingdom.”

In the first two lines we find a babbling and repetition of sounds as the lines begin with the similar sounds of ‘The eyes’ and ‘These are’ and then both the lines convey almost similar ideas in such a way as if someone is babbling. This imitation of sound is a feature of symbolists which we find in T.S. Eliot’s poetry.

Then the image of grotesque is created in expression “The broken Jaw” and juxtaposed along with normal poetic expression.

These were some features of T.S. Eliot’s poetry in general. There are some exclusive features of his writing style also. For example, he writes using words and expressions from various languages and literatures and uses them as if they all naturally belong to the English language.

22.4 THE LOVE SONG OF J. ALFRED PRUFROCK

This is a poem written by T.S. Eliot early in his life.

22.4.1 Introduction

This is a poem of about 132 lines and an epigraph of 6 lines taken from the “Inferno” section of Divine Comedy written by the great Italian poet Dante. This is also referred only as “Prufrock” and is one of the earliest poems of T.S. Eliot by which his poetic talent was widely recognised. It was first published in 1915 and is often described as a “drama of literary anguish”. The poem was most probably written in 1910 and 1911.

22.4.2 The Text

The Love Song of J.Alfred Prufrock

S'io credesse che mia risposta fosse
A persona che mai tornasse al mondo,
Questa fiamma staria senza piu scosse.
Ma perciocche giammai di questo fondo
Non torno vivo alcun, s'i'odo il vero,
Senza tema d'infamia ti rispondo.

Let us go then, you and I,
When the evening is spread out against the sky
Like a patient etherized upon a table;
Let us go, through certain half-deserted streets,
The muttering retreats 5
Of restless nights in one-night cheap hotels
And sawdust restaurants with oyster-shells:
Streets that follow like a tedious argument
Of insidious intent
To lead you to an overwhelming question.... 10
Oh, do not ask, "What is it?"
Let us go and make our visit.

In the room the women come and go
Talking of Michelangelo.

The yellow fog that rubs its back upon the window-panes, 15
The yellow smoke that rubs its muzzle on the window-panes
Licked its tongue into the corners of the evening,
Lingered upon the pools that stand in drains,
Let fall upon its back the soot that falls from chimneys, 20
Slipped by the terrace, made a sudden leap,
And seeing that it was a soft October night,
Curled once about the house, and fell asleep.

And indeed there will be time
For the yellow smoke that slides along the street,
Rubbing its back upon the window panes; 25
There will be time, there will be time
To prepare a face to meet the faces that you meet;
There will be time to murder and create,
And time for all the works and days of hands
That lift and drop a question on your plate; 30
Time for you and time for me,
And time yet for a hundred indecisions,
And for a hundred visions and revisions,
Before the taking of a toast and tea.

In the room the women come and go 35
Talking of Michelangelo.

And indeed there will be time
 To wonder, "Do I dare?" and, "Do I dare?"
 Time to turn back and descend the stair, 40
 With a bald spot in the middle of my hair—
 (They will say: "How his hair is growing thin!")
 My morning coat, my collar mounting firmly to the chin,
 My necktie rich and modest, but asserted by a simple pin—
 (They will say: "But how his arms and legs are thin!") 45

Do I dare
 Disturb the universe?
 In a minute there is time
 For decisions and revisions which a minute will reverse.
 For I have known them all already, known them all:
 Have known the evenings, mornings, afternoons, 50
 I have measured out my life with coffee spoons;
 I know the voices dying with a dying fall
 Beneath the music from a farther room.
 So how should I presume?

And I have known the eyes already, known them all— 55
 The eyes that fix you in a formulated phrase,
 And when I am formulated, sprawling on a pin,
 When I am pinned and wriggling on the wall,
 Then how should I begin
 To spit out all the butt-ends of my days and ways? 60
 And how should I presume?

And I have known the arms already, known them all—
 Arms that are braceleted and white and bare
 (But in the lamplight, downed with light brown hair!)
 Is it perfume from a dress 65
 That makes me so digress?
 Arms that lie along a table, or wrap about a shawl.
 And should I then presume?
 And how should I begin?

Shall I say, I have gone at dusk through narrow streets 70
 And watched the smoke that rises from the pipes
 Of lonely men in shirt-sleeves, leaning out of windows?...

I should have been a pair of ragged claws
 Scuttling across the floors of silent seas.

And the afternoon, the evening, sleeps so peacefully! 75
 Smoothed by long fingers,
 Asleep ... tired ...or it malingers,
 Stretched on the floor, here beside you and me.
 Should I, after tea and cakes and ices,
 Have the strength to force the moment to its crisis? 80

But though I have wept and fasted, wept and prayed, Though I have seen my head (grown slightly bald) brought in upon a platter,
I am no prophet – and here's no great matter;
I have seen the moment of my greatness flicker,
And I have seen the eternal Footman hold my coat, and snicker, 85
And in short, I was afraid.

And would it have been worth it, after all,
After the cups, the marmalade, the tea,
Among the porcelain, among some talk of you and me,
Would it have been worth while, 90
To have bitten off the matter with a smile,
To have squeezed the universe into a ball
To roll it toward some overwhelming question,
To say: "I am Lazarus, come from the dead,
Come back to tell you all, I shall tell you all"-
If one, settling a pillow by her head,
Should say: "That is not what I meant at all;
That is not it, at all."

And would it have been worth it, after all,
Would it have been worth while, 100
After the sunsets and the dooryards and the sprinkled streets,
After the novels, after the teacups, after the skirts that trail along the floor-
And this, and so much more? -
It is impossible to say just what I mean!
But as if a magic lantern threw the nerves in patterns on a screen: 105
Would it have been worth while

If one, setting a pillow or throwing off a shawl,
And turning toward the window, should say:
"That is not it at all,
That is not what I meant, at all."

No! I am not Prince Hamlet, nor was meant to be;
Am an attendant lord, one that will do
To swell a progress, start a scene or two,
Advise the prince; no doubt, an easy tool,
Deferential, glad to be of use, 115
Politic, cautious, and meticulous;
Full of high sentence, but a bit obtuse;
At times, indeed, almost ridiculous—
Almost, at times, the Fool.

I grow old.... I grow old..... 120
I shall wear the bottoms of my trousers rolled.

Shall I part my hair behind? Do I dare to eat a peach?
I shall wear white flannel trousers, and walk upon the beach.
I have heard the mermaids singing, each to each.

I do not think that they will sing to me.
I have seen them riding seaward on the waves
Combing the white hair of the waves blown back
When the wind blows the water white and black.

T.S. Eliot

We have lingered in the chambers of the sea
By sea-girls wreathed with seaweed red and brown
Till human voices wake us, and we drown.

22.4.3 Analysis

The title of the poem has two parts “The love song of” and “Prufrock”. The first part “The love Song of “has apparently come from Rudyard Kipling’s poem entitled “The Love Song of Hardyal”.

“Prufrock” comes from the name of company of furniture “Prufrock-Litton company” which existed in the area where Eliot lived during early years of his life. “J” and “Alfred” in the title are inventions of the poet. With these inputs the full name “J. Alfred Prufrock” appears to be an attempt to mimick his own name which he spelt in his initial years as T. Stearns Eliot. If we understand the title in this way then to some extent the poem would appear a biographical poem in which T.S. Eliot expresses his own feelings about the “love” or more specifically about the “lack of love” in his own life during the years when he was composing this poem. The use of the words “Love song” in the title is appropriate as a refrain, which has rhymes and particular rhythm. There is a refrain in the poem:

“In the room the women come and go
Talking of Michelangelo”

Also just like “Love song”, this is a narrative poem in the form of a dramatic monologue. A dramatic monologue is a discourse in which the narrator or the speaker intentionally or unintentionally reveals personal information and feelings. As we have seen earlier, this is a typical feature of T.S. Eliot’s poems.

The epigraph of the poem, originally written by Dante in Italian, can be translated as follows: “If I thought that my reply would be to someone who would ever return to earth, this flame would remain without further movement; but as no one has ever returned alive from this gulf, if what I hear is true, I can answer you with no fear of infamy”. (translation taken from SOUTHAM, B.C., 1965, Fourth Edn. 1981, A students’ guide to the selected Poems of T.S. Eliot, Faber & Falws. London-Bost)

In these lines there is pessimism that the narrator will not be able to come out of his present state and in fact is able to speak only because he feels that he can confide in the listener with no fear of being shamed. And then the poet speaks in the style of a dramatic monologue. The mood of pessimism follows in the ensuing lines of the poem. The first two lines create a lovely atmosphere but the third line destroys it with the grotesque imagery of a “patient etherized upon a table”.

Then the poet goes through the town passing by shabby and unkempt streets and hotels. The streets are as lonely as the evening was lifeless. And this is a long drawn situation which continues like an unending argument presented with unhealthy intentions. In this hopeless situation, the poet does not even question anything. He simply tries to move ahead. But all that he could see further is the aimless movement of women who talk of someone far away in history though very important with his contributions in painting and architecture. This is the refrain in the poem. This refrain refers directly to the lines by Jules Laforgue whose related French lines can be roughly translated as:

“In the room the women go and come
While talking of the masters of Sienne”
[The original French lines are:
“Dans la piece les femmes vont et viennent
En parlant des maitres de Sienne”]

Sienne is a place in Italy known for its contribution to art and architecture. It is worth noting here that Michelangelo was also an Italian painter and artist. In the lines from 15 to 22 we again find “yellow fog” and “yellow smoke” created as an image to express the hopelessness in the life around him which is stifled in the din and bustle of an industrialised city. It is worth recalling here that T.S. Eliot spent his childhood in an industrial suburban town of St. Louis. This imagery of ‘yellow fog’ and ‘yellow smoke’ behaving like a timid cat finally sleeping outside the house is very much like the symbolists of French literature and further enhances the pessimistic feelings in the poem. In the next stanza (lines from 22 to 34), Prufrock assures himself that there will be time to sit and talk with his beloved but the possibility of this meeting is further postponed as the hope for this time is in future. This is expressed by the use of ‘will’ in the verses. Also the time is for “indecisions”, “visions” and revisions which all delay the meeting. And when there is time, it will be for “murder and create”. So there is simultaneously pessimism and hope.

In these lines there appear to be two allusions also, ‘There will be time’ alludes to the poem “To his Coy Mistress” by Andrew Marvell (a poet of 17th century) but the situation is completely different. While in Andrew Marvell’s poem the speaker asks his beloved not to be shy, Eliot’s Prufrock delays the meeting with combination of hope and despair.

The other allusion is “works and days” (line 29) which is a poem of Hesiod, a Greek poet of 7th century B.C. Hesiod uses these words in order to emphasise hard work, righteous living and being guarded against moral decay. Eliot also appears to use them with the same purpose but in a gloomy mood with pessimistic feelings.

The refrain comes again and this repetition is suggestive of the dullness and repetitive nature of events in life.

Then again in the next stanza Prufrock becomes unsure of himself as contrasted to the faith in future of the previous stanza. Prufrock is not sure if he may dare to approach a woman and if at all he dares to do so, he is unsure and afraid of the consequences.

In the ensuing three stanzas Prufrock again emphasizes on the dull and boring situation. He says that he knows all of them; they are the same people with the same decor and demeanour. And in this boring and dull situation, should he take any initiatives? Even the time which appears to be passing in terms of evenings, mornings and afternoons is all measured as one unit in the coffee spoons (which are very small in size). Here T.S. Eliot appears to allude to the philosophy of French thinker Henry Bergson (1859-1941) who proposes that though time is calculated in series of measurable units, actually our consciousness perceives them in a continuum without any succession of measurable duration. Thus past and present are equally real and the entire life of Prufrock is one continuum not consisted of disjoint time units. His past, present and future are real before him.

Another allusion in line 52 is “dying fall” which refers to Shakespeare’s Twelfth Night.

Shakespeare writes:

“If music be the food of love, play on;
Give me excess of it, that, surferting,
The appetite may sicken and so die.
That strain again! It had a dying fall.
O, it came over my ear like the sweet sound,
That breathes upon a bank of violets,
Stealing and giving odour!

T.S. Eliot alludes to the above in the following two lines:

“I know the voices dying with a dying fall
Beneath the music from a farther room.”

The gloomy mood in Shakespeare’s line, “The appetite may sicken, and so die” reverberates in the above two lines of T.S. Eliot.

In the line 70 to 73, there is a description of people who resemble Prufrock in terms of dullness and boredom in life. This is further depicted in lines 74 & 75 as he feels like a “pair of ragged claws” sunken in the sea.

In the lines from 75 to 80, the time passes peacefully and then Prufrock becomes unsure of himself again as he questions “Should I Have the strength to force the moment to its crisis”.

In lines 80 to 85, there is an allusion to John the Baptist by “head brought in upon a platter”. Prufrock imagines that he has lived to a mature age and grown bald and his life remains dull. Then he is dead and that is again of no consequence because he is not a prophet like John the Baptist.

The use of the word “Footman” alludes to death as “Footman” is supposed to be a servant who helps us in the afterlife.

T.S. Eliot continues in the same style depicting the gloominess and dullness in the life of Prufrock whose love song will never be sung as there will hardly be any love in his life. The title of the poem is very satirical in this way and T.S. Eliot continues to describe the life of Prufrock in a style which is characteristically typical to his poetry. We also may draw our attention to the music and babbling in “And how should I presume “(line 61) and “And should I then presume? And how should I begin?” (line 68 & 69). It appears as if the narrator of the dramatic monologue is muttering and babbling to himself. We notice, thus, that in the very first significant poem of his career T.S. Eliot exhibits the stylistic maturity and depth of content which continue to be prominent features of his later poems.

In the stanza lines 87 to 98, the poet questions whether it would be worth interacting with the women of his choice. In the process he again alludes to Marvell's poem "To his coy Mistress" in the line 92 – "To have squeezed the universe into a ball". The second allusion is in line 94. The poet mentions Lazarus who according to the story of the Bible, had come back from the dead. There are two Biblical references alluded here. First, from the Gospel of John chapter 11- according to this Lazarus was raised from the dead by Jesus. The other Biblical reference is from the Gospel of Luke, Chapter 16. According to this, Lazarus, a leprous beggar, went to the heaven after his death whereas Dives, a rich man, was taken to hell. Dives requested that Lazarus be sent to the earth to tell his brothers about the horror of hell and the consequences of their deeds. The request of Dives was denied. Eliot alludes to the Biblical story and conveys his uncertainties in the situation.

The next stanza (line 99 to 110) conveys the same uncertainties while describing the settings around and the movements of women. Then farther in the next stanza, the poet alludes to Shakespeare's Hamlet to convey Prufrock's coyness and uncertainties and indecisiveness. Prufrock is afraid of being considered a 'Fool' – here 'F' is in capital as the poet means a 'court jester' by this word. Prufrock is compared to the character in Hamlet named Polonius who speaks high language. Prufrock, by using similar language, may be considered a joker like the 'Fool' of the English royal court.

In the lines 120 to 132, the poet expresses the realization of the character Prufrock that he is growing old and accordingly there will be changes in his life. There is an allusion to Homer's Odyssey in which Odysseus heard the songs of Sirens who are not singing to him. By this allusion again Eliot refers to Prufrock's situation in which he hears the women and pays attention to them but the women are not talking to him. Towards the end, the poet refers to the satire in the title. The 'Love Song' is being sung but not for Prufrock. This meaning is conveyed by alluding to the Sirens (the mythical women who sing to the sailors in the Greek mythology) who are singing but not for Prufrock.

22.4.4 Style in the Poem

Throughout the poem Eliot uses the conversational language with variation in the length of verses and a lot of repetitions. There are continuous shifts in the train of thoughts, with the help of allusions and varied expressions of feelings. The metaphors used are often novel and show the influence of symbolists.

Glossary

- i) Etherized (in line 3): The old way of putting a patient on anesthesia was called 'etherization'. 'Etherized' means a person who has been made unconscious by this method.
- ii) Tedious (argument) (in line 9): 'Tedious' is used for something which is not interesting and continues for long.
- iii) Insidious (intent) (in line 10): It is an adjective which means something which spreads gradually and causes great harm.
- iv) Sprinkled streets (in line 101): refers to a practice of sprinkling the streets so that the dust of the streets remains settled down.

- v) Sea girls (in line 130): refers to Sirens who, according to the Greek mythology, are women living on mysterious islands singing to lure the sailors.

22.5 GERONTION

It is an important poem of T.S. Eliot representing his feelings and the contemporary disgust over World War I.

22.5.1 Introduction

Gerontion is a poem by T.S. Eliot written with the background of the first World War. This poem was first published in 1920. This is a dramatic monologue of an elderly man through which Eliot views the first World War in the perspective of the 19th century and other developments before World War-I in 20th century. The Title 'Gerontion' comes from a Greek word which means 'a little old man'. Like Prufrock in the poem discussed earlier, Gerontion is a character. Through this character, the poet reveals the psychological dilemma of being unable to make efforts towards change for betterment. The last line of the poem aptly sums up this dilemma of the apparent futility of our existence and struggle for existence. This feeling represents the hopelessness of the World War years and their aftermath.

22.5.2 The Text

Thou hast nor youth nor age
But as it were an after dinner sleep
Dreaming of both.

HERE I am, an old man in a day month,
Being read to by a boy, waiting for rain.
I was neither at the gates
Nor fought in the warm rain
Nor knee deep in the salt marsh, heaving a cutlass, 5
Bitten by flies, fought.
My house is a decayed house,
And the Jew squats on the window sill, the owner,
Spawned in some estaminet of Antwerp,
Blistered in Brussels, patched and peeled in London. 10
The goat coughs at night in the field overhead;
Rocks, moss, stonecrop, iron, merds.
The woman keeps the kitchen, makes tea,
Sneezes at evening, poking the peevish gutter.

I an old man, 15
A dull head among windy spaces.
Signs are taken for wonders. "We would see a sign":
The word within a word, unable to speak a word,
Swaddled with darkness. In the juvenescence of the year
Came Christ the tiger 20

In depraved May, dogwood and chestnut, flowering Judas,
To be eaten, to be divided, to be drunk
Among whispers; by Mr. Silvero
With caressing hands, at Limoges

Who walked all night in the next room; 25
 By Hakagawa, bowing among the Titians;
 By Madame de Tornquist, in the dark room
 Shifting the candles; Fraulein von Kulp
 Who turned in the hall, one hand on the door. Vacant shuttles
 Weave the wind. I have no ghosts, 30
 An old man in a draughty house
 Under a windy knob.
 After such knowledge, what forgiveness? Think now
 History has many cunning passages, contrived corridors
 And issues, deceives with whispering ambitions, 35
 Guides us by vanities, Think now
 She gives when our attention is distracted
 And what she gives, gives with such supple confusions
 That the giving famishes the craving. Gives too late
 What's not believed in, or if still believed, 40
 In memory only, reconsidered passion. Gives too soon
 Into weak hands, what's thought can be dispensed with Till the refusal propagates a fear. Think Neither fear nor courage saves us. Unnatural vices
 Are fathered by our heroism. Virtues 45
 Are forced upon us by our impudent crimes.
 These tears are shaken from the wrath-bearing tree.
 The tiger springs in the new year. Us he devours. Think at last
 We have not reached conclusion, when I
 Stiffen in a rented house. Think at last 50
 I have not made this show purposelessly
 And it is not by any concitation
 Of the backward devils
 I would meet you upon this honestly.
 I that was near your heart was removed therefrom 55
 To lose beauty in terror, terror in inquisition.
 I have lost my passion: why should I need to keep it
 Since what is kept must be adulterated?
 I have lost my sight, smell, hearing, taste and touch:
 How should I use it for your closer contact? 60
 These with a thousand small deliberations
 Protract the profit of their chilled delirium,
 Excite the membrane, when the sense has cooled,
 With pungent sauces, multiply variety
 In a wilderness of mirrors. What will the spider do, 65
 Suspend its operations, will the weevil
 Delay? De Bailhache, Fresca, Mr. Cammel, whirled
 Beyond the circuit of the shuddering Bear
 In fractured atoms. Gull against the wind, in the windy straits
 Of Belle Isle, or running on the Horn, 70
 White feathers in the snow, The Gulf claims,
 And an old man driven by the Trades
 To a sleepy corner.
 Tenants of the house,
 Thoughts of a dry brain in a dry season. 75

22.5.3 Analysis

Typical to T.S. Eliot's style the poem begins with an epigraph taken from Shakespeare's play Measure for Measure, Act III, Scene I:

"Thou hast no youth nor age
But as it were an after dinner sleep
Dreaming of both".

The Duke speaks these lines to Claudio who is a young man sentenced to death. The Duke advises Claudio not to value life highly because life is only conflict, insecurity and cowardice. Eliot uses these lines to describe the feelings of disgust due to the World War. Gerontion exists in a civilisation which is bereft of all human values and is constituted only by conflict and valueless rationalism. The world around Gerontion has no sense of community and is spiritually dry. And death is only a sleep after dinner which will rejuvenate us.

The first two lines of the poem depict the stage of Gerontion. These lines are supposed to have been taken from A.C. Benson's biography of Edward Fitzgerald. The third line refers to 'hot gates' which is a literal translation of the name of a place in ancient Greece-Thermopylae. This place was a strategically important place in ancient Greece which was the scene of many battles. This is a reference to the World War again and till line six, the warlike situation has been described.

The disgust over the contemporary situation in Europe continues in the following lines as the poet talks of the "decayed house" and talks of the important towns of Belgium and England. Brussels and Antwerp are two important towns which had trade relation with London. 'Estaminet' is a French word for café –used in English by soldiers who came back from France and Belgium during the first World War.

The poet describes the life during the War years and expresses his disgust again through words like 'peevish gutter' (lines 11 to 15). 'Gutter' is a splattering fire-this imagery evokes the situation of war.

In the lines 17 -20 there is a reference to the Bible. In Matthew XII, 38, Pharisses cry to Jesus Christ, "Master, we would see a sign from thee" and Jesus Christ replies, "An evil and adulterous generation seeketh after a sign". The poet says that only in 'the present evil situation, "Signs are taken for wonders". Here 'signs' means 'miracles' as found in the Biblical story and Eliot uses the word 'wonders' with the same meaning. He wishes in these lines that religious humane values prevailed in society. Compare the lines 18 & 19 with the following text from the Bible: "And this shall be a sign unto you; ye shall find the Baby wrapped in swaddling clothes, lying in a manger....."

The use of the 'word' in the line 18 is also in reference to the Biblical use of 'word' which means 'logos'. This is a logocentric world and yet there is no 'word' to represent God. The Bible says: "In the beginning was the word, and the word was with God, and the Word was God".

In the lines 21-25, the poet expresses the degradation of human values in society. 'Depraved' means corrupted. 'May' represents the resurgence of life as happens after the winter. The 'dogwood' and 'chestnut' are flowers which convey the idea of sensuality. 'Judas' is a name of plant which has the same name as the Biblical character Judas who is known for 'treachery'. So the expression 'flowering Judas' symbolises the increased treacherous situation in society. Thus the line 21 expresses that in the civilisation created as a consequence of Renaissance (represented by 'May'), there is only corruption and treachery. Here the idea of 'Renaissance' is evoked in order to express the disgust for the Renaissance and Modernist ideas which resulted in the World War.

In the lines 22 and 22, we have to first take the following:

'To be eaten, to be divided, to be drunk

Among whispers;'

The words which follow in the 22rd line are 'by Mr. Silvero'. These three words will have to be read with the next line till the end of line 25 which ends with a semi-colon.

Line 22 along with half of line 22 alludes to the Christian ceremony of Eucharist in which the people at the ceremony eat pieces of bread which symbolise Christ's body and drink wine which symbolises Christ's blood. Thus people are supposed to draw nourishment from Christ. In the context of the poem, people in contemporary society are taking nourishment from the corruption and treachery in society.

Mr. Silvero is an imagined man from the surroundings who gets nourishment from vulgarity and treachery in society. Even if Mr. Silvero visits a place like Limoges, a French town known for its porcelain ware, enamels on copper and oak barrels for the production of cognac, he fails to appreciate the beauty and with his 'caressing hands' only feels the sensuality of the objects around.

In the line 26, there is another imagined foreign figure named Hakagawa who is amidst the Titians. Here the word 'Titians' refers to an Italian painter. Titian is a famous Italian painter who is known for his 'idealised portraits' of beautiful women. Thus Titian symbolises the portrayal of sensual beauty and Hakagawa is among the likes of Titian (the plural form of 'Titians' would symbolise the 'likes of Titian'). Hakagawa is among those who portray beauty but Hakagawa seems only to bow to them thus socialising with them without any appreciation for the beauty and its portrayal.

Madame de Tornquist is another imagined character in the line 26. She is only shifting candles in the dark room thus not getting anything from the 'illumination' of the candle light nor getting involved in a churchlike religious surrounding where one lights and places the candles for receiving the Grace (lines 26-27). In the line 27, Fraulein von Kulp is another imagined female character with a Germanic name who rejects faith. 'Who turned in the hall' in the line 22 represents turning away from the faith of religion. Further, 'vacant shuttles weave the wind' means that nothing productive is happening and there is no substance in anything that is happening around.

In line 30 the words 'I have no ghosts' signify the disbelief in everything that is supernatural. It symbolises the establishment of rationalism with no space for religious faith and values. But this situation leaves Gerontion in a 'house' with no protection as the poet describes in the lines 31-32. 'Draught' means here 'a gust of wind' and the 'draughty house' is the one that is exposed to the 'gust of wind'.

And even the knob of the door is 'windy', that means, the door also is exposed and does not stop the rushing wind.

In the lines from 21 to 31, four characters are introduced Mr. Silvero appears to be a man from Portuguese or Spanish or Italian descent. Hakagawa may be a man or a woman from Japanese origin- certainly a foreigner. Madame de Tornquist appears to be a woman of French origin according to the name. And Fraulien Von Kulp is a woman from Germanic origins. All these characters of foreign origin represent an isolated identity and appear to be inheritors of desolation. All these characters are stuck in such a social and historical situation in which they have nothing to communicate and they seem to be vulnerable like Gerontion who is living in a house which has no protection from the winds. These four characters from various lands appear to symbolise the isolation and desolation in the American land where people from various origins live. They have lost their faith and tradition. And they have no protection from values and tradition in a society which is rational but so bereft of values that the entire rationalism resulted in the World War. And then in the line 33 the poet questions the rationalism and all the knowledge gained in the process by saying , "After such knowledge what forgiveness?". And with all this rationalist knowledge, man has turned away from God and so cannot expect any mercy. And the poet mocks at the knowledge gained from history as history is nothing but a record of all that guides our vanities. The poet expresses these ideas in the lines 33 to 36. Then in the line 36 the poet again starts expressing his disbelief in the knowledge given to us by history. Finally history leaves us in a confused state starving for solutions to our problems. The word 'she' in the line 38 stands for history. This disgust for the rationalist knowledge gained through historical processes and their study continues all through till line 46. In the line 47, the poet alludes to the tree from which Adam and Eve ate an apple by the words 'the wrath bearing tree'. As a consequence of eating the apple, Adam and Eve were expelled from paradise. So the attempt to get knowledge is similar to that attempt to eat fruit from that tree. Knowledge results in tears, wars and suffering.

In the line 48, the poet hopes that 'Christ the tiger' will come and devour us all, as all of us are sinners. Gerontion further says in the lines 49 to 54 that he has not yet completed his understanding of the situation while living in the 'rented accommodation' owned by the Jew. Earlier in line 8, the poet has informed about it through the words, "And the Jew squats on the window sill, the owner". And the poet, through Gerontion, continues to question the contemporary knowledge and historical processes through which we have got this knowledge which has led to the decay of faith and loss of fear to God. This feeling continues till the line 59 and then in the line 60, the poet expresses his uncertainty over the use of all this knowledge to establish faith and the order of Christ. In the lines 61 to 66 and till the first word of the line 67, the poet, through various images, expresses that there appears to be no way out of this disgusting situation. The pessimism seems to have engulfed us world wide- and that is the pessimism which was a consequence of the World War. The proper names used in the line 67 represent the world - almost in the same way as happened earlier in the poem between the lines 21 to 30. And the same pessimistic feeling continues from lines 67 till 73 as the poet refers to various geographical places which contributed a lot in world history since the times of the Great Discoveries by the Europeans. But finally Gerontion, as an old man representing faith and human values, is driven to a corner and lies there in a sleepy sombre state. In the line

74, Gerontion is put along with all the tenants of the 'house' i.e. the world. And in the last line, the poet, through Gerontion expresses his pessimism as the 'thoughts of a dry brain in a dry season'.

22.5.4 Style and Theme

Characteristic to his style, Eliot begins with an epigraph and continues in free verse which has rhythm. He keeps alluding to various thoughts and writings that appeared earlier in his writings. In Gerontion, we can easily identify all the characteristics of Eliot's poetic style as we have studied earlier in this unit.

The central theme of the poem is the pessimism arising out of the World War which happened as a consequence of all the knowledge man acquired since the Renaissance period. In the context the poet desires that the humane religious faith and values which have been lost in historical process of acquiring material wealth and mundane knowledge be established again.

22.6 LET US SUM UP

In this unit we have read about an important poet in the English language who was born in the U.S. and died in England. He is equally an American and English poet who evolved his own poetic style while amalgamating stylistic features, thoughts and imagery from various sources in French, German, English, Indian and Greek among many others.

We studied two of his poems entitled “The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock” and “Gerontion” and have identified the stylistic and the thematic characteristics of Eliot’s poetry in these two poems. This has helped us understand the work and contribution of T.S. Eliot in the English literature with concrete references and examples. We should be now able to study and appreciate Eliot’s poetry in general in terms of theme and style very specific to Eliot’s poetic canvass.
